Yea, every one that trusteth in them."

How sharp the contrast between those pitiful objects and the Strength and Shiel of Israel—a God who might never be worshiped as a graven image or a likeness of anything in heaven above or earth beneath or waters under the earth, a God whom no one hath seen nor can see, a spirit, a person unseen but not unknown, whose presence was near and dear to His people! It was a thought of God entirely inconceivable to the pagan mind. One recalls the words of Titus' soldiers when they sacked Jerusalem, broke into the temple and even dared with polluted foot to profane the Holy of Holies. "Now at last," they cried as they approached that forbidden place, "now at last we shall look upon this God of the Jews." But when, throwing aside the heavy veil, they looked in upon the Holy of Holies they found there no image, no visible form to mark the presence of the invisible God—they found nothing. Whereupon they began to cry, "The secret's out—these men have no god at all—they are atheists!"

Still greater was the contrast between the pagan deities

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

The Life of the Spirit and the Life of Today*

IN her introduction to "The Confessions of Jacob Boehme," a little book which appeared in 1920, Evelyn Underhill wrote: "During the most impressionable period of youth Boehme learned something of the unsatisfactory religious conditions of his time; the bitter disputes and mutual intolerance which divided Protestant Germany, the empty formalism which passed for Christianity. He also came into close contact with the hermetic and theosophic speculations which distinguished contemporary German thought and seemed to many to offer an escape into spiritual regions from the unrealities of institutional religion." And one wonders if she may not have written those words with our own age as well as 1590 in mind. "Bitter disputes, mutual intolerance, empty formalism, theosophic speculations, escape from the unrealities of institutional religion into spiritual regions"—she might have been writing of 1923. In this book of outstanding importance she suggests the escape: the life of the Spirit.

Evelyn Underhill has been since 1907 Mrs. Stuart Moore. Her husband is a London lawyer. Readers of the Oxford Book of English Mystical Verse know her poem, "Immanence," and some of her other work. She has published no less than sixteen volumes, some of them about the mystics Jacopone of Todi and John of Ruysbroeck, and has mastered a literature too little known to America, the writings of Boehme, Catherine, Theresa, and others. Britannica calls her "Mysticism" of 1910 a "brilliant attempt to make a thorough study of the meaning and worth of the mystic way of life." She is the leader of the English mystics. In 1921 Manchester College, Oxford, invited her to lecture on religion, and she was the first woman on the university list. This book is the result of those lectures.

The author uses the results of modern psychological research to explain religious experiences which science has too often ignored. A great deal of modern psychology, she says, will not last; our age suffers from labels, and we use big new words for old experiences, calling confession "psychoanalysis," and sin "primitive instinct," and so on. But psychology has made two great discoveries—the unconscious mind, and the power of suggestion.

The unconscious mind, as Coué called it, which others have called the subliminal self, is all of our personality except the scrap which happens at the moment to be on top. Part of the unconscious she calls the "fore-conscious region," half-lighted, the region of autistic thought. This region, she says, is the region of reverie and meditation and adoration and wonder, of poetry and creativeness. It is a region which belongs to mysticism. In it, under the threshold of attention, we may have contact with the Spirit of God. But we have to prepare ourselves for that contact. We have to make ourselves receptive. That is what prayer is for. Prayer promotes in the mind the suggestible state in which we are receptive of God. Mental prayer especially, which she calls "orison," "a devout intent directed to God," is the first step. "The mind is called in from external interests and distractions; one by one the avenues of sense are closed, till the hum of the world is hardly perceived. Having achieved this, we pass gradually into the condition of deep withdrawal variously called Simplicity or Quiet; a state in which the attention is quietly and without effort directed to God." And here she makes available the rare fund of experiences of the mystics of the past.

Suggestion is the means by which the spiritual world may influence us. The suggestions of God to us are what is known conventionally as "grace," which she defines as "the direct suggestion of the spiritual affecting the soul's life." Coming to us from outside, these suggestions must be worked over in our own subliminal minds until they have become our own possessions. In other words, they must be transformed by our wills into "auto-suggestions." (Here she follows Baudouin and the Nancy school, who teach that hetero-suggestions must always become auto-suggestions before they influence us.) The mystics have long before this time, she says, found the value of short phrases in helping the mind receive and work out a suggestion. Julian of Norwich used to repeat "All shall be well!" Another medieval mystic used to repeat, "Sin! Sin! Sin! Out! Out! Out!"

*The Life of the Spirit and the Life of To-day. By Evelyn Underhill. Published by E. P. Dutton and Company, New York, 311 pages. $2.50.

The importance of the oral repetition of prayers is the basis of the requirement of the Roman Catholic Church that priests read not silently but vocally their daily office.

The mystical experience, then, is by no means a subjective one. The state of receptivity merely prepares us for suggestions from the spiritual world outside us. We know no book which so makes so reasonable the existence of an objective Force touching us when we pray. Some students of psychology have come to feel that prayer is essentially subjective. No! says Mrs. Moore. The subjective state only prepares us for God's suggestions.

Her main point is that the life of the spirit is a wonderful and beautiful and desirable way of living which anyone may find, but which most people miss because they have never heard of it or do not know how to find it. Trance and ecstasy are not the mystical life, only by-products of it. Longings for mere protection, which some of the feminine mystics have voiced, are not mystical at all, but the intrusion of lower cravings. The true mystical feeling means being put in oneness with transcendent Spirit, and led him to attachment to a personal and dynamic Spirit who gives him power.

The spiritual powers, which all normal people have, are often latent and need to be drawn out and developed. Sometimes they are repressed, in conflict with the man's realistic outlook, until in a psychic storm he finds himself. Sometimes they have never been touched or used. So it is the duty of the church, with wonderful resources of ceremonial, of group influence, of discipline by silence and prayer and meditation, to develop the spiritual powers of its people, and to bring these powers under the control of the purified will. There is a great chapter on education and the life of the Spirit.

Here is a way of helping the people of our great American cities which some ministers have found very fruitful. People need to pray, and most Americans have never learned how. We wonder if the field of mental therapeutics does not belong, after diagnosis at least, more to the minister than to the doctor. At any rate, the minister of the future cannot ignore the need of equipping himself to draw out people's powers of prayer, quiet, wonder, worship, receptivity, spirituality. And the Protestant theological seminary will surely be called on to train its men, if not in mental therapeutics, at least in correct methods of teaching people how to pray and worship.

Some striking things about public worship are said in the book. Hymns of love, petting and shelter, she says, are neurotic. Some of our popular hymns are close to psychological sin. Hymns of failure, guilt, disillusionment, anxiety, impotence, make devitalizing suggestions, and are all the more dangerous because cast in an emotional mould and sung collectively and in rhythm. Yet the favorite American hymn, according to a poll of the editors of "The Etude," is a hymn about "change and decay," words which a valiant Christian of New York, aged over seventy, says ought to be corrected to "change and growth."

We believe that many Protestant people are hungry for the messages of this book. An invalid carefully trained in Protestant worship and service found it immensely helpful and sent copy after copy to friends. If the battle-ground of our decade is the conflict between the material and the spiritual attitudes towards life, it is concerned with a group of facts of first importance, and carries one far in the study of them.

The World of To-day

TRAINING SCHOOL OR EDUCATION INSTITUTION

President Ernest M. Hopkins of Dartmouth has the faculty of provoking thought. In his opening address to his students last week he made a distinction between the "training school" and the "educational institution" which is worth keeping in mind. The training school, he said, prepares a man to hold a particular cast of thought and to play a particular role in the world. The method of the educational institution, on the contrary, "calls for diversity in points of view and emphasis upon stimulating the student's thought, while the training school almost inevitably emphasizes instruction and demands conformity to the thought of others." To quote again, "If we follow common practice and read only those periodicals or treatises which argue for what we hold, or listen only to those who say what we maintain, or associate only with those who believe what we suppose, we cannot know the truth even if we happen accidentally to be affiliated with it." President Hopkins' comments on those who style themselves "liberal" will please a good many of us, also. "This professionalized group," he remarked, arrogating to itself all virtue and good intent, and denying these qualities to all others; patronizing those who will not whittle their conclusions to the exact dimensions of the prescribed code; manipulating intellectual processes and capitalizing dogmatic assertion as preferable to accepting the conclusions of logical thought—this group is doing more to breed suspicion of and hostility to true liberalism than is being done, or could be done, by all available forms of reaction if combined in militant array. Ill-nature, intellectual arrogance and churlish intolerance are but sorry concomitants of any movement, but they are singularly out of place and tragically harmful in association with any movement which desires to be recognized as liberal. The mind tolerant of the opinions of others and open to conviction in the presence of new knowledge is more liberal than that of the bigot, regardless of the beliefs of either." Many of us confess to considerable weariness with those journals which always seem to know everything and which always seem to differ from what everybody else thinks. We all love people who occasionally make mistakes. They seem more brotherly, for no one of us but in the watches of the night can recall the times when his judgment has been bad.

COURSES FOR LAYMEN

The School of Religious Education of Boston University is one of the proofs that the Church is attempting to meet to-day's situation. It has this year opened a division offering courses in the latter part of the afternoon and on Saturday in order to make it possible for Sunday-school workers and others employed during the day to take them. The school includes in its curriculum courses in Americanization, methods of urban survey, educational psychology, the immigrant woman, race leaders and their problems, camp administration, woodcraft, playground supervision and leadership in girls' and boys' clubs. Its department of fine arts in religion gives courses on religious dramatization, the history and theory of pageantry and religious drama, the interpretation of hymns, and music in the church and week-day schools. In connection with this department, Prof. H. Augustine Smith will form a choral society which will study the most famous oratorios. The School of Religion has already enrolled twice as many students as it had last year and its registration is not yet complete. It is reaping the reward of those who meet a real need.

SOME MISSIONARY TEACHINGS OF

and Israel's God, when you come to the point of moral character. Theirs was a hateful, cruel, corrupt, quarrelsome, frivolous, passionate, jealous, pitiless crew. They were lovers of obscenity; they delighted in pain and were greedy for blood. How cruel, how degrading were the demands made upon their worshipers! Religion to those darkened minds had no ethical content. The worst of men, according to their notions, might be the most devout, and the best of men the least so.

Over against those monsters of iniquity, so vile that the early Christians used to think of them as demons, stands the Holy One of Israel—good with spotless goodness and demanding of his worshipers that they become like himself; holy as he is holy, and holiness in Israel's God, as it was revealed to and through those who came to know him best, proved to be not stern, awesome, unapproachable perfection, but rather the outgoing of a Father's heart, rich in pity, full of tender mercy and forgiveness and abundant in goodness and truth.

Now, of course, we are not saying that there were no devout souls among the nations, men that secretly sought and truly found Him who is not far from any of us. On the contrary, we know not a few who came to that high experience, whose recorded words give abundant evidence of their acquaintance with our heavenly Father, and we fondly believe that they may represent an exceeding great multitude whom throughout the ages he has been gathering to himself, out of every tongue, and kindred and tribe and nation. Neither do we for a moment forget that there are elements of precious truth in the religious systems of non-Christian nations. But it is of the current and generally accepted notions of paganism that we have been speaking, the religion of the priests and temples, the streets and markets. Between these and the faith of Israel the contrast is like that between midnight and high noon.

Now how can you explain it, that a little bunch of Pharaoh's runaway slaves, occupying but a handkerchief's space in the broad earth, should have gotten so immeasurably ahead of all the world in religious truth, which is the consummate flower of human thought and life? The Israelites certainly did not derive their ideas from Egypt. What Pharaoh's people believed and taught on these themes is no secret to us. It has been set down with great particularity in their massive monuments and the dry sands of the desert have kept it safe for thirty centuries. Neither did they discover Him among the Canaanitish nations. These too have left behind them traces of their religious notions and we find no evidence of Jehovah worship there. Nor could they, a simple pastoral people, have dug such heavenly treasure out of the depths of their own consciousness. The only adequate explanation of the mystery is the one that they themselves have clearly and repeatedly given. Their knowledge of God came to them straight from God himself, who chose them among all the nations, that he might reveal himself to them, declaring his will through the mouth of his prophets in order that by means of that chosen nation he might make himself known to the whole wide world.

The difference between what Elijah believed and taught and the doctrine of the priests of Baal was not a difference between two sets of human opinion regarding divine things, both of which were mere guesses at truth, one doubtless superior to the other but both partly right and partly wrong. It was a difference between things that are so and things that are not so. The fact is that there is one eternal, almighty God, a Spirit, a person of perfect holiness, of boundless love. The fact is that there is no such thing in the whole wide universe as this Baal of the priests. He exists nowhere outside the morbid imagination of his worshipers. So it is with the whole pantheon of paganism. There is no objective reality behind it all. The truth about God has the advantage that truth must always have. No lie can permanently stand before it. Once get into the mind of a man and make him clearly understand the fact which you know and which he does not know, and in the presence of your knowledge his superstition must melt away. The possession of divine truth made of every son of Israel a missionary whether he knew it or not. So far as that truth was believed in his heart, expressed by his lips, embodied in his life, it became the mighty power of God, in the presence of which the imaginations of sinful men could not stand.

Here then lies the first of the three great assets with which our missionaries go to non-Christian lands. With them they bear the truth about God, about man, about sin and redemption, about life and immortality. It is the same truth that the prophets of Israel possessed, only immeasurably clearer and loftier. We take it to men from whom the truth has been hidden, their minds occupied by a rank growth of error. But the human mind is made for truth. Bread is sweeter than bitter, poisonous herbs to any appetite. As soon as ever they can be made to understand what it really is that we have for them they must inevitably accept it. What have the non-Christian religions of the world, all of them together and at their very best—what have they to offer compared with the gifts of Christ's gospel, the divine fatherhood, the human brotherhood, the law of love, the forgiveness of sin, the life everlasting?

The supreme question for missionary and evangelist is therefore this—How to get Christ's gospel fairly before the minds of those to whom it is sent—how to break through the barricade of prejudice, to pierce the veil of stupid inattention, for eyes are dim and ears are dull and hearts are hard.

THE MONDAY CLUB SERMONS

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. A BOOK WITH A WORLD-WIDE MISSION

Christian Fellowship

A Union of all Christian Forces

By NATHAN SODERBLOM, Archbishop of Upsala
CLOTH BINDING, $1.50

Every CHRISTIAN WORK reader will want to own at once, a copy of Archbishop Soderblom's new book, which surveys the efforts made toward the realization of Christian Unity and the immediate aims of those who are laboring for its consummation.

In their One Book a Week review THE CHRISTIAN WORK recently said of this great book: "After an opening discussion of the reason for unity and what it would mean to have a United Church, the Archbishop gives a most valuable survey of the causes that led to the breaking up of the Church into so many sects and divisions. This survey is quite unique and goes into the history of the sectarian movement more thoroughly than any recent book. Its value is inestimable to one who would gain some insight into the psychology of sectarianism and is of even greater value to one who would make one again the divided Church."

Archbishop Soderblom's visit to America makes timely the publication of his work, which is being strongly commended by religious and secular periodicals and writers.

NEW YORK TIMES says: "Americans will be interested in what the Archbishop has to say about other religions and creeds and what is happening throughout the world to-day in all Churches. For he is an internationalist in his doctrines and a cosmopolite in his faith."

J. ROSS STEVENSON in PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW says: "Archbishop Soderblom contemplates the problem of Christian unity from a high altitude. He considers it in its bearing upon the peace and life of the nations and upon the whole task of the church."

THE CHURCHMAN says: "It is good to read a book like this, absolutely free from partisan bitterness and to be filled with the true spirit of Christian love and an earnest desire to further the cause of real Christian unity, not in outside observances, but in the inner spirit of love and charity."

THE EXPOSITOR says: "The Archbishop is a recognized leader of European Protestantism, and has long been active in the movement for reunion of the churches. He here makes an appeal to the judgment and conscience of the churches for unity. A vital book on a vital theme."

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY says: "Such a book reveals the growing will to fellowship in the Christian mind. A book of beauty, studded with flashing insights and memorable sentences, fascinating for its literary grace, and its catholicity of thought."

ADJOURNMENT OF THE LEAGUE ASSEMBLY

The Assembly of the League came to an end last week after a session which has probably done more to strengthen the power of the League than any so far held. When the Corfu matter first came before the League, Mussolini attempted to play the swashbuckler toward the League as well as toward his poor little opponent. The League Council and the Assembly were frankly anxious. The reference of the question to the Council of Ambassadors was in effect a compromise, no matter how much it may have been covered up by legal terms. But by the end of the meeting of the Council last Friday, Salandra, the Italian delegate, had agreed that "any dispute between members of the League likely to lead to a rupture is within the sphere of action of the League." That is a vital matter. It has not met the world's sense of justice that the fifty million lira indemnity posted by Greece should have been handed over to Italy because on September 27th the criminals who assassinated the Italian boundary commissioners had not been discovered. The commission now working on that task is an international one. It is difficult to see why Greece should suffer so promptly and Italy be allowed to go scot free after its slaughter of little children in its criminal violence. Dr. Nansen, in his speech before the Assembly, was prepared to propose that the Italian government should be invited to hand over to relief work among the refugees in Greece that part of the fifty million lira which had not been used for reparations to the families of the murdered Italian soldiers. He was also about to suggest that the Council of Ambassadors should be invited to publish the whole of the reports and evidence on which it had based its decision to allocate this fifty million lira to Italy. But before he had offered the suggestion he was stopped by a whispered word from the Italian assistant secretary to President Torriente on the ground that he was straying from the text of his discourse. The Assembly wrestled with no more important question than its treaty for progressive disarmament. It is sending the treaty to all the member states. The fact that the United States is not a member of the League, and that also it refused to sign the St. Germain Convention forbidding the private manufacture of arms, is a very great obstacle in the way of general decrease of armaments. The new treaty which the Assembly is submitting to the nations provides that it shall come into force in North America when it is ratified by the United States, and the document stipulates that the countries not members of the League may adhere to the treaty with the consent of two-thirds of the high contracting parties. In nothing has the influence of the League been more notable the last three weeks than in its taming of Italy's threatening attitude toward Yugoslavia. If there had been no League, not only would Italy probably today either be at war with Greece or at least occupying Corfu and the little neighboring islands, but she would probably also be at war with Jugoslavia over Fiume.

DEVELOPMENTS AT GENEVA

The Assembly of the League of Nations is by no means thoroughly satisfied with the way in which the League dealt with the Italo-Greek affair. It has appointed a commission of legal experts to pass on the following questions among others: (1) The kind of disputes which fall within the purview of the Covenant; (2) the right of states to seize territory as guarantees; (3) the responsibility of states for crimes committed within their frontiers. The League was strong enough to propose these questions in spite of the objection of the Italian delegate, Salandra, that the League's competency in the Italo-Greek issue could not properly be raised now. Certainly, Italy's giving up of Corfu on September 27 may be fairly ascribed to the influence of the League. The League expressed world opinion in such a way that Italy was forced to back down from her imperialistic designs. It had been proposed to the League that Article X should be so interpreted so as to leave each government free to decide to what degree it is bound to assume obligation to protect the territorial integrity of a fellow member by the use of military force. Every nation but Persia voted in favor of the amendment. But any such change has to be made unanimously; so Persia's action blocks the amendment for the present. The International Federation of Trade Unions at its session in Amsterdam made a formal demand that the League Assembly take up the reparations problem. Gilbert Murray, speaking for the Federation, said: "In the name of the ideals we profess, in the name of our common humanity; in the name of these workers whose livelihood is at stake, let us ask the governments of the great powers either to find a settlement of this question swiftly or hand it over for settlement to the League of Nations." The Kingdom of Hedjas has applied for admission to the League of Nations. Abyssinia has been admitted.

THE PRESENT SITUATION IN GERMANY

The French evidently knew what they were about when they entered the Ruhr. The collapse of passive resistance will now probably be followed by an effort on the part of Germany to do what is expected of her and what she agreed to do when she signed the treaty at the end of the war. The passive resistance was never spontaneous on the part of the people of the Ruhr, but was Germany's method of meeting her determined creditors. Money to pay the workers in the Ruhr was sent by the German government. The workers were kept in idleness and paid their regular wages. The situation became impossible because the more money the German government issued to meet its pay rolls for the idle workers, the lower fell the value of the mark. When money falls to the preposterous position of 242 million marks to the dollar it is an absurdity. The circulation of paper money in Germany came to be measured in trillions, which numbers really mean nothing. It is difficult to forecast the next move. It is reported that a military dictator has been appointed for Germany, and that he will hold the states together and keep down seditious movements, either of the Right or of the Left. The Bavarian movement under the guidance of Hitler is the German expression of Fascism; it is a part of the same movement that has transformed Italy and made Mussolini a dominant figure. It expresses itself also in Spain, which is now controlled by a similar group. Time alone will tell what the results will be. Most intelligent observers who are unbiased believe that by losing the struggle in the Ruhr, Germany is now face to face as she has never been with the fact that she lost the war, and that the responsible leaders in the nation will really try to find some means of satisfying the just claims which the Allies have made against her.

THE ZURICH MEETING OF THE PRESBYTERIAN ALLIANCE

Delegates of the European churches of "The World Alliance of the Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian System" met at Zurich July 21-28. Zurich is the birthplace of the Presbyterian family of churches, the city of Zwingli, at whose statue in Zurich the conference placed a wreath of flowers. The sessions met in the Lavater house, belonging to St. Peter's Congregation, the home of Rev. J. Casper Lavater, the celebrated preacher and writer of more than a century ago. Professor Curtis, of Edinburgh, presided over the conference. Although the meeting was meant for the churches of continental Europe, delegates from all over the world attended it, even from India, Egypt, South Africa and the New Hebrides. The attendance was three times what it was at the similar conference at Lausanne three years ago. The one hundred and twenty-five delegates represented twenty-six countries and thirty-eight different churches and included the leaders of the churches of continental Europe. The largest delegation, that from Switzerland, numbered thirty-four. Scotland came next with twenty-two, then Hungary with twelve and France and North America each with eight. The historic Synod of Dort did not represent so many churches. At the Sunday morning service in the cathedral, where Zwingli preached during the Reformation, Court-preacher Lang, of Berlin, and Rev. Mr. Roberty, of Paris, spoke. The communion was celebrated on the very spot where Zwingli held the first Protestant communion service three hundred and ninety-eight years ago. The elements were distributed by ministers of many lands. The conference discussed the conditions of the European churches and what might be done to help them, the revival of the work of the Roman Church, church unity, the social problems of the churches, and the oppression suffered by the churches in southeastern Europe. In Transylvania two hundred congregations may be lost unless there is immediate relief. Churches there, in Jugoslavia and in Czechoslovakia are undergoing difficulties. The conference suggested to the Eastern (European) and Western (American) sections of the Alliance that they appoint a joint deputation to visit these countries and examine into conditions in them. The conference is a pleasant contrast to the earlier one at Lausanne. There the churches, just come out of the great World War, were all in great straits and some quite disorganized. Today, in spite of poverty and oppression, they are thoroughly organized, hopeful and ready for work. One mark of fraternal fellowship left a considerable impression, the coming of a representative of Archbishop Soderblom of Sweden to bring the greetings of the great Lutheran communion. The conference asked the delegate to express its fraternal goodwill to the World Lutheran Conference which met at Eisenbach the following month.

IS AMERICA "UNATTACHED?"

President Coolidge, in his address before the International Convention of the American Red Cross on September 24th, said: "The constant need of civilization is for a practical idealism, . . . deep faith in spiritual things tempered by a hard common sense . . . illustrated in the character of the men . . . who offered their lives to give more freedom to oppressed peoples; and who went to the rescue of Europe with their treasure and their men when their own liberty and the liberty of the world was in peril, but when the victory was secure retired from the field unencumbered by spoils, independent, unattached and unbought, still continuing to contribute lavishly to the relief of the stricken and destitute of the Old World." Calvin Coolidge is a very keen man. It seems scarcely in character for him to congratulate America quite so wholeheartedly on its action. Is it matter for congratulation that, after one has gone to the rescue of a man fighting in a good cause, he should refuse to stay to staunch his wounds when the battle is over? As James G. McDonald of the Foreign Policy Association puts it: "Is it 'practical idealism' to win a war and then to scuttle the peace—the peace which was accepted both by France and Germany largely because of specific American pledges, to the former the tripartite guarantee, to the latter American presence on the Reparation Commission? Is it 'hard common sense' not to continue to try to achieve the ideals for which America fought? Is a 'deep faith in spiritual things' shown by our ignoring now the spiritual values which alone raised the World War above the plane of wholesale slaughter?" America is not "unattached." When the farmers last week asked the President to revive the War Finance Corporation that was proof that we were not "independent." No banker or business man or cotton or wheat grower believes we are "independent." As the months go by and President Coolidge deals with international situations more intimately we expect to see him gradually come to another point of view for international questions; and we believe that when he has changed his mind he will have sufficient courage to make it known and to act on his new understanding.

"DAMN WELL OUT OF IT"

The following letter by Rev. Van Tassel Sutphen, of Morristown, New Jersey, speaks for itself:

SIR: "Damned well out of it," is the comment ascribed by the newspapers to Ambassador Harvey in the course of a brief interview on the Græco-Italian situation. He is particularly pleased to stress the reflection that the United States long ago disclaimed any responsibility for the European muddle, and is now reaping the due reward of foresightedness.

"Damned well out of it" is a trenchant phrase, and naturally Mr. Harvey believes that the utterance is entirely original with him. Not so, however. Here is a distinct case of unconscious mental cerebration, for some two thousand years ago a certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves, who stripped him of his raiment and wounded him and departed, leaving him half dead. And by chance there came down a certain priest that way, and when he saw him he passed by on the other side. (And as he went he doubtless murmured into his beard, "Damned well out of it.") And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him and passed by on the other side. (And as he goes we can hear him echoing the now familiar sentiment, "Damned well out of it.")

Nearly twenty centuries have passed away and the poor, painted shades of priest and Levite have long since vanished into the limbo of departed spirits—damned well out of it. But the radiant presence of the Good Samaritan, clothed with its glorious heritage of eternal life, abides with us forever.

"Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbor unto him that fell among the thieves?" asked Jesus.

"He that shewed mercy on him," was the reply of the lawyer.

Then said Jesus unto him, "Go and do likewise."

To show mercy, then, would seem to be the only possible course of action for the individual who would save his soul alive. But Messrs. Harvey, Lodge, Moses, Brandegee, Hiram Johnson, et al., would have us believe that a nation may attain its inheritance of eternal life by merely keeping "damn well out of it."

VAN TASSEL SUTPHEN.

AN OPPORTUNITY IN JERUSALEM

The information carried in Mr. Rhoads article on page 398 is of interest to everyone in Christendom. It is amazing to discover that the World War has worked a hardship to the Patriarchate of Jerusalem such as it had not suffered before in history. Deprived of its revenue, forced to greater expense on account of the crisis that came with the war, the Greek Patriarchate of Jerusalem is now $3,500,000 in debt. We are all indebted to the Greek Church for keeping in the possession of Christians the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, and other shrines in the Holy Land. It has not always been easy to do so. It has only been possible in some cases through the Mohammedan good-will. When Omar the Conqueror entered Jerusalem he generously refused to enter the Holy Sepulchre because, had he done so, it would have become a mosque. So, through the ages, if any Mohammedan had fallen on his knees and prayed within its doors it would have immediately become a Mohammedan mosque. In Constantinople the Byzantine church has actually become a mosque. The Ottoman government not infrequently has threatened the Patriarchate that unless a certain sum was paid to it on a given date it would prohibit the Greeks from entering the holy places and turn their rights over to others. So the Patriarchate has been forced to pay out thousands of Turkish pounds to keep these places from desecration. Mr. Rhoads refers to the Patriarchate's loss of property in Bessarabia. The British government has gone so far as to hold up a Rumanian loan in the attempt to get some compensation for this property. The question is not settled yet, but in any case the compensation from Rumania will be very slight. Christians of America have now a great opportunity to show practical friendliness toward our Christian brothers in the East. The doors that are opened by kindness are not likely to be shut later by creedal differences. This is a time, as always, when there are many calls; but he who is really interested always finds some way in which he can help.

RELIGIOUS NEED OF THE JEW IN THE SMALL TOWN

The younger generation of Jews in the small towns and villages of this country knows nothing of rabbinical Judaism. No one teaches these young Jews the historic doctrines of their faith and they do not live according to the traditions of Jewish orthodoxy. They are without Jewish community life. No clubs, no social centers, no church schools, often no synagogues. For months they may not hear a sermon or a talk on a spiritual subject. When a lecturer or preacher does visit them he is most likely to talk about any subject rather than religion. A good many Jewish children go to church Sunday-schools, for Jewish parents want their children to know something about God and His message; but a large proportion of them are not certain about sending them to our Sunday-schools, first, because they feel that their children do not find a truly cordial sympathy and welcome in the church, and, second, because they think that in the Sunday-school children are taught some things contrary to the spirit of the Bible. Such is the summary of conditions as they are reported by Harry Rubenstein, the colporteur of the Brooklyn Presbyterian organization after some study in our villages and smaller towns. Mr. Rubenstein's report should stir up ministers and Sunday-school officers and teachers in our towns to look about at the children of their Jewish neighbors. We have commented before on the fact that many churches do not make Jews feel that they are genuinely welcome. Strange that those who come nearest in blood to Jesus Christ and the Apostles should not be "acceptable" in the organization which harks back to Jews as its founders. We must breed it into our young people that Christianity is first of all a religion of brotherhood, and that the child who loves to hear about Moses and Joseph and Samuel and Jesus should be delighted to have their kin in the same class with them at the church school.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

yond time, place of meeting, election of officers and adjournment."

THE OKLAHOMA SCANDAL

With Governor Walton's determination to put an end to floggings and kidnappings in Oklahoma, intelligent sentiment in the country is, of course, in deepest sympathy. But the Governor's powers seem to have gone to his head. The same day that he proclaimed martial law throughout the State of Oklahoma he announced that he would not allow the Legislature to meet, as it proposed to on September 26, and that if it attempted to do so he would prevent it by military force if necessary. He carried out his threat. When the Oklahoma House of Representatives tried to hold a session at the State Capitol, Colonel William S. Key, commander of the militia of Oklahoma, ordered it to disperse. The question whether the Legislature has the right to meet without the call of the Governor will be submitted to the court. The Governor followed up his refusal to let the Legislature meet by decreeing that a special election ordered to be held on October 2 should not proceed. At this election there was to be submitted for referendum a measure which would provide a way for the Legislature to take up the impeachment of Governor Walton. Moreover, the Governor has not allowed the courts to function freely. It is a great pity that in a fight against lawlessness the Governor himself should give the impression of executive lawlessness of a most unusual sort. Since the signing of the Declaration of Independence it would be difficult to parallel in America the scene at Oklahoma City last week, the military driving the Legislature from its doors. For the time Governor Walton is only helping the Ku Klux Klan.

A NEGRO ON THE SHORTCOMINGS OF NEGRO CHURCHES

It is to be presumed that a reform is really taking hold when the people who need to be reformed are beginning to see the need themselves. A little bulletin put out by Elbert W. Moore, director of Negro work in the Northern Baptist Convention, is a sign of promise. Incidentally, it hits off delightfully the conditions in Negro churches. Nor would it be as hard as finding a needle in a hay mow to match in white churches the state of affairs which Dr. Moore denounces among his brethren. "Our greatest stumbling-block," Dr. Moore writes, "yea, our besetting sin and weakness, is selfishness, jealousy, that breeds dissension and divisions in our ranks. There is too much quarreling over nothing—about what? Too often it is about a little office that does not amount to a row of pins. . . . It often happens that men and women with no claim to ability and leadership will aspire to positions that they should know they are not competent to fill, and when they are opposed, because they are incompetent, will move heaven and earth to break it up. Their motto seems to be, 'If I can't, you shan't.' Brethren, this has been our great drawback, and it is time to call a halt. If we do not, there is absolutely no future for us." He does not spare straight advice: "Select the most competent men to direct affairs in our conventions; support honest, faithful, intelligent leadership. . . . For us to attempt to compete with other races or denominations and still keep up our petty jealousies and spite work against each other is, to say the least, stupid." Dr. Moore's denunciation of ignorance is to be commended to the whole Church in America. "Ignorance has never been able to lead." As a result of ignorant leadership, he says, "our organization [i.e., his Negro Baptist convention] seldom functions anything be-

Dr. E. H. Kistler says: "For a man to preach a different attitude than the accepted one of his pulpit's denomination is spiritual piracy." We submit that such a statement as that savors of intellectual slavery and sectarian autocracy. If a man believe that his denominational standards are not infallible it is his privilege and duty to stay in the denomination and correct them. Dr. Kistler's doctrine is the essence of Roman Catholicism applied to Protestantism. It is of a piece with the whole wretched mess of heresy trials, denominational shibboleths and medieval cock-sureness. God save us from any more of it.—The Auburn Seminary "Chapel Bull."

It would appear that the rush to the colleges is as great this year as it was last. For the present Yale has limited its freshman class definitely to 850. Wilson College for women at Chambersburg, Pa., opened its year with the largest enrollment in its history. The college has had to deny admission to a large number of well-prepared students because it had not dormitory accommodations. Orono, which limits its attendance to 1,200, is absolutely full. Out of the applicants for admission to the freshman class and for higher standing Princeton has eliminated very many. The story might be repeated for scores, probably for hundreds, of institutions. Is the time coming in this country when everybody will have a college education? We hope the time may come, at least when everybody in America is such good human material that he is worthy of a college education, at any rate.

shall know as he is known. "Now we see as in a mirror (metal mirror) darkly; but then face to face." In spite of having the Christian revelation, and of believing in it with all his soul, he declares that "that which is perfect" is yet to come. He has no manner of doubt as to the nature of God that it is love; but his perception of God is dim and obscure, it is not a full direct vision, he can look but at reflections of God as in a mirror.

Now, if this was the case with the great apostle, it is no wonder that we often feel how obscure our vision of God is. Without doubting at all the existence of God, and having an unshakeable faith that God is love, if we are asked whether we see that He is love, the best we can say is, "We see in a mirror, darkly." There are facts and circumstances that obscure vision. Though we see the glory of God shining in the face of Christ, we do not know God as He knows us. Our knowledge and our thought must grow and change, spiritual insight must be deepened, spiritual perception become keener and clearer than they are to-day. We cannot, in the present life, expect to see God face to face, i.e., to have the divine mystery entirely cleared.

If one is inquiring for truth in religion, he must not let the intellectual demand dominate his being, because his being is so much greater than his intellect. So many people fail to get anywhere in the spiritual realm because of their habit of illogical thinking. They think this is their protection against superstition. They do not realize that the intellect of man was never given him for the purpose of discovering the spiritual nature of the universe; it was given to him for practical purposes, for the purposes, that is, of the practical life. Logic by itself is not a sure instrument of spiritual discovery; the organ of revelation is the whole soul of man. Humble-mindedness, then, is of first importance in this sphere, and should always accompany the desire to know more of God.

Baron Von Hugel says that we must not insist upon great and continuous clearness in these deepest things, i.e., we must not insist that the knowledge of God shall be clear, always clear, and satisfactory to our kind of evidence. If religion is true, God is super-human, and being super-human, it is unreasonable to suppose that our analytical methods could give us a knowledge of Him. Indeed, we cannot claim that our knowledge is perfectly clear of any existing reality whatsoever. Von Hugel points out that it is only in regard to numbers and spatial things that we have clear knowledge. Our knowledge of any existing reality or its qualities is not clear. Let us take an illustration of our own. Here is this book. If we say that it is six inches long, four inches wide, one pound in weight, all those notions are perfectly clear. But if we say, "This book is a real existence," then we immediately open up all sorts of controversies, and the meaning of what we say turns out to be not clear at all. There are philosophers who would tell us that the book has no real existence outside of our mind. We shall feel perfectly certain that it has, but we shall find it very difficult to counter their argument that it has not. They will tell us that everything we can say about this book is a mental conception of our own, and when all these are deducted there is no book left, or, if there is, we cannot say anything about it. And so of the whole external world, they say it is impossible to us to know any object outside us as it is in itself—we can only know what we think about it. It only exists to us in the conceptions which we have formed of it, and there have

On Knowing God

IT IS difficult to understand how the Christian Church, with the writings of Paul before it, could ever have claimed at any time to be in possession of a full and final revelation of the mystery of God. Paul certainly made no such claim himself. In the Epistle to the Romans, when he is considering the rejection of the Gospel by the Jews, and trying to find a place for it somewhere in the great plan of God, he ends up by saying, "O the depths of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God. How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past tracing out." He was trying to understand, he felt he did understand a little, but he could not encompass the mystery. In the Epistle to the Philippians, though he claimed to worship by the Spirit of God, and to glory in Christ Jesus, and to count all earthly things but loss for the excellence of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord, in spite of all this he says: "I count not myself yet to have apprehended;" he has to press on to apprehend more fully; he pleads that so far as they see together they should act together, and walk by the same rule, but if any were otherwise minded, let them believe that God would bring a further revelation to them. And in the great hymn of love (1 Corinthians 13) he declares that he only knows in part, and prophecies in part, his insight and his teaching are partial, and he is looking forward to the time when he been philosophers who have stoutly contended that it does not exist at all in any other way.

Mr. MacDougall says that to assert the real existence of a world outside us is an act of faith—it is a thing impossible to prove. There is no need to pursue this part of the subject; the history of philosophy, especially from the days of Berkeley, shows us that clearness in regard to existing realities or their qualities is not our privilege. In the same way, it is pointed out that one man can never know another man—he can only know what he thinks of the other man.

But now, though our knowledge of external reality is not clear, it may be very vivid, and the Baron is constantly differentiating between clearness and vividness. If Berkeley began to argue with you as to whether a wall exists or not you would soon find that you were very confused in your knowledge, not at all clear; but if you knocked your head against that wall your knowledge of it would be very vivid, and you would probably terminate the argument for the time being at least. It may not be quite clear as to how much of what we call our knowledge of our friend belongs to our own mind and how much to him as a being outside us, but it may be very vivid and it may be very rich, and there might be a very great benefit in our friendship to both of us.

Now Von Hugel asks us not to insist upon clearness in the deepest things of religion, such a clearness as we do not get even in regard to things much less deep, it is not unreasonable. He asks us to take instructions from watching the animals that are dear to us, to notice our dogs e.g., how they know us and love us. A dog will pick out his master from among a hundred individuals very similar to himself, so that the dog must have a very vivid sense of his master. But who would say that he has a clear idea of his master? If we talk about the ideas of a dog, his ideas of his master surely must be very dim. Von Hugel says that we evidently strain the minds of our dogs after a while . . . then they get away among servants and children, and sometimes altogether from human company, the company that is above them, to the company of their fellow-creatures. "How wonderful. Dogs thus require their fellow dogs, the shallow and clear, but they also require us, the deep and dim; they require, indeed, what they can grasp; but they really require what they can but reach out to, more or less, . . . what exceeds, protects, envelopes, directs them. And, after a short relaxation in the dog-world, they return to the bracing of the man-world." Now, if an animal like a dog can feel the need of a human being and have a vivid sense of him, though a very unclear and dim idea of him, so we, too, may have a very vivid sense of God, and though our knowledge of God will be anything but clear, we may feel our need of Him, and know our life enriched by Him, know Him as our protector and our refuge. Because He is so much higher than we, so much richer and greater, He must be as obscure to us, Von Hugel thinks more obscure, than we are to our dogs. The want of clearness in our knowledge of God is no reason at all for not believing in Him and not trusting Him. If anyone fears that this opens the door to any kind of superstition, that, in the absence of clear proof we may become the victims of any phantom of the mind, Von Hugel says that what we may demand in our knowledge of God is vividness and fruitfulness. If the affirmations of religion are rich and fruitful, i.e., for the building up of the best character, then they are appropriate and true. They are supported by the only kind of evidence we have a right to demand. He believes this evidence will be forthcoming if we approach religion with a real desire to know, a desire that is willing to pay the price; without the demand for clearness of knowledge, but only for richness and fruitfulness, and with a disposition for full self-giving for the enrichment and betterment of human life.

Great suffering will prove no final obstacle, for "it is precisely the deepest, the keenest sufferings, not only of body but of mind, not only of mind but of heart, which have occasioned the firmest, the most living, the most tender faith." Christianity does not explain suffering and evil. No explanation is forthcoming from any quarter. But Christianity has done something better than explain suffering. It has taught men to face up to it, and it has given them power to conquer it. Christianity does not deny the reality of suffering, does not pretend that suffering is good in itself; it faces suffering as an evil, but an evil to be overcome, and it gives the power for conquest. Christianity does not countenance a superficial attitude towards suffering. It does not try to make you forget your suffering in some artificial pleasures, by frequenting gay company, or attending light entertainments. Nor does it ask you to try and kill feeling, to be stoic in regard to suffering and trouble. Christianity would have you be fully human to feel the suffering and the trouble. Nor does it urge you to assert that it is not there, when it is. Christianity does not set up in the mind any make-belief about these things. Take them as real, face them at their worst, and Christian faith in God will still be able to overcome them.

The appalling range of suffering and its baffling mystery are well recognized in the New Testament. Side by side with that is illustrated the victory of faith and of love. You have men declaring that they glory in tribulation, because it has results in character that redound to the glory of God. "We reckon," they say, "that our present sufferings are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us." They did not deny the reality of the suffering, they did not say there was no mystery about it, they did not pretend to understand it, but they did say they were experiencing a power to overcome it, to transfigure it, to turn it into glory and joy forever. This is what Christianity does. It is better than any explanation to the intellect could have been. It is conceivable that all suffering might have been explained to us, and that we should have to bear it all the same without power to overcome it. We are in better case when we have the Christian faith. And you will not doubt the reality of God because there is suffering in life, when you experience the power of God to overcome that suffering. Many of the greatest believers have been among the greatest sufferers. Whatever the enigma, whatever the problem, the faith that is built upon that experience of power is impregnable. Where we cannot explain, we can perhaps help one another to draw up close to God who will help us through, and to say, "If God be for us, who can be against us?"

"For sudden the worst turns best to the brave,
The black minute's at end;
'And the elements' rage, the fiend-voices that rave,
Shall dwindle, shall blend,
Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain,
Then a light, they thy breast.
O thou Soul of my soul. I shall clasp thee again,
And with God be the rest."—Browning.

Do We Need a New Religion?

"YOU need not be afraid to strike a light," said Lowell, "the universe is fireproof." Everywhere many people within and without the Church are handling the flint and steel quite vigorously and are trying to produce a spark or two. This work is commendable thus far at least—that beyond everything else our world needs light. It has had heat a-plenty.

Just now rattling the churches is one form of this play. Anyone, everyone, feels free to tell the churches how they have failed. Some of this criticism is manifestly unfair and unjust. Some of it is misdirected effort and fails to touch the real issues. But some of it, much of it, is earnest and conscientious. On the part of those within the Church it is an attempt to discover the nature of the failure and the reasons for it. On the part of many outside the Church it is the questioning of souls too honest to rest in make-believe or to put themselves off with half-truths. To this latter class undoubtedly belongs the writer of an article in the September "Century" magazine, Mrs. Mary Austin.

But whatever may be the motive of the critics, the course of the Church itself is clear. It is to take this criticism to heart and ask honestly how far it is deserved. It is then to set to work resolutely to change its ways and fall in line with the purpose of its Founder. The most foolish and inane policy is that of simple denial and injured innocence.

Now and then we have a criticism of our current Christianity which demands and deserves frank consideration. Such is the paper by Mrs. Mary Austin, to which we have referred. The writer calls attention to the fact, so tragically manifest, that Christianity thus far has failed to produce a society that is satisfactory to the Christ-minded or that can be described as Christian in its social operations. Everyone admits this, she says, but apparently few if any have thought to ask why we expect the religion of Jesus to effect a complete social reorganization of the world. The writer then says, truly enough, that Jesus taught that the personal relations of man to God should be organized, should be reborn in fact, and that the rebirth of the individual soul would profoundly affect the living procedure and ultimately the destiny of the reborn. But "nowhere is there any suggestion of the pattern of social and political reformation which might be expected to follow such alterations of the personal factors."

Going more into detail, the writer says that Jesus never offered His teaching as the complete or finished word. More than that, He had no world ideal, and He did not supply us with any phrase more definite than this: "Behold, the Kingdom of God is within you." "Jesus provided nothing that can be called a technic of social regeneration." And in His teaching, also, it is contended that Jesus was as limited and individualistic. "Experience has shown Christians everywhere that such personal teachings as, 'As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise,' and 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,' cannot, because of the limitations of social knowledge, be carried over successfully into the large civic and economic field." The conclusions of the matter is that Jesus was a teacher of personal religion; that He had no program of social redemption; that He expected a speedy end to the present world order, and that consequently He cannot be accused of failure where He never had any purpose.

Even if we admitted that there is more social vision in Christ's teaching than this, yet that teaching is vague and indefinite. The churches cannot agree on the simplest things of Christianity; they cannot construct any satisfactory program in His teaching; those who call themselves Christians have no unity and cohesion. So Christianity cannot guide the world in the work of social redemption. In fact, Christianity has failed to get itself understood and applied. The conclusion is this, that we need a new revelation, and this implies a new prophet with a new message and a more adequate program.

It is easy for the confirmed churchman to reject all this without discussion or consideration. But this may be said, that as Christianity has appeared the writer is partially, at least, justified in her complaint. Christianity has done great things in the generations past, and no one who understands history is inclined to minimize these Gesta Christi. But we have to admit that something has gone wrong. The churches have failed to comprehend the whole ideal of Christ and so have followed a partial program. They lost the ideal of Christ, the idea of the Kingdom of God on earth, and substituted their own lesser ideals in its place. Whole generations and nations have called Jesus, Lord, Lord; but they have not done the things that He said, and it never occurred to them that they who bear the name of Christian are to possess the mind of Christ. This justifies the statement of Ritschl, that "Since the second century nothing has less guided the Church in its efforts for moral renewal than the idea of the Kingdom of God in the sense in which Christ himself used the term."

Two things may be noted here, and they deserve full consideration. First, Jesus is great enough to meet the needs of all men and different ages. The greatness of Jesus as a personality and as a teacher has been admitted by all. In moral power He stands unique among the sons of men. In sheer mental quality He is the greatest of the great. He was a life-giver rather than a program-maker. He regarded His truth not as a crystal but as a seed. In all this He proved His greatness and has made Himself the contemporary of all ages. Jesus was too great for any one man or any one generation to comprehend Him. His teaching was too many-sided for any one formula or program to convey the whole truth. All that we can ask of any Saviour or prophet is that he shall solve the problems of men as they arise. We may admit that in a general way Jesus has met the problems of men in the past.

This generation is the age of the social problem. Can Christianity meet us here and satisfy our deepest need? Can it furnish an ideal comprehensive enough, commanding enough, to include all partial ideals and explain the meaning of the world? Can it break the spell of self, the flesh and mammon? Can it charm away the selfishness of men and create in them a Christian state of mind? Can it unite men in a common task and send them out to fight the battles of justice and to seek the whole redemption of society? That is, has Christ a social ideal? Does He offer men a social program, and do His ideal and teaching contain place for the social technic which men themselves can supply?

The second thing is this, that Jesus had a social ideal and a social program. The standing scandal of the ages has been the indifference of men to the teachings of Jesus. Men have called Him the Son of God; they have given Him the second place in their doctrine of the Trinity; but they have treated His sayings as purely incidental and accidental, and so have not heeded the things that He said. But the most tragic part of that scandal has been the indifference of men to the great central ideal of Jesus. He began His public ministry with the announcement of the Kingdom of God; all through His ministry He is talking about the Kingdom; everything He said must be interpreted in the light of this great idea. And after His resurrection we are told He was with the disciples forty days speaking to them the things concerning the Kingdom of God. But, strangely enough, men soon forgot the Kingdom and began to talk of their own souls; they substituted the idea of a church for the ideal of Christ; and they longed for life in heaven and forgot the service of God here. Christianity has passed through Greek philosophy, as Professor Hatch has shown, and this changed its basis and spirit. Christianity later fell under the spell of Roman imperialism, and this created the institutional organization and machinery. The rich and powerful tried to capture Christianity and make it serve their ends. The Church missed the essential truth of Christianity that the Gospel is spirit and not form. So it developed elaborate creeds and set up its opinions for the spirit of Christ. Christianity became a matter of profession, of opinions of this church and that. So it came about that men passed as Christians, and thought that they were Christians, who yet did not possess the mind of Christ. They were ready to fight for their church doctrines; but they had not so much as heard that there was a Kingdom of God.

The most significant and fateful fact in the present situation is the new attitude toward Jesus. There is a widespread conviction that something has gone wrong in Christianity; that some of the churches have hidden rather than revealed Christ; that many of the conceptions of men have obscured rather than transmitted His truth. There is an attempt on the part of many to have done with half-truths and formulas and to deal with reality itself. Above all, there is a growing determination to find out what Christianity means and actually to try it. "When half-gods go, then God arrives." A lot of half-gods have gone, and Jesus is just beginning to be seen. This talk about a new religion reminds one of the old story of the green pilot. The vessel was short-handed and the captain had to place a green hand at the wheel. Keep your eye on that star," said the captain, "and sail straight toward it." An hour or so later the pilot called the captain: "Give me a new star; we passed the other one some time ago."

The conclusion of the whole matter is this, that Jesus is still in advance of the world and is the truth this world needs. His way is the only way into the Golden Age, and He has the only message that contains hope for mankind. The ideal of Christ, the inspiring motive of His life, the central truth of His teaching, was a social ideal; it was the idea of the Kingdom of God; and this in Christ's conception never meant anything less than a righteous and redeemed society on earth. Jesus had a world vision and understood the method of social regeneration. He offered men a social program far beyond our practice to-day, and that program, if men had followed it, would have been fully adequate. More than this, the teaching of Jesus is quite definite on the great duties of life, and His great principles of love, service and sacrifice work when they are tried. Men have sometimes complained that Jesus is indefinite and vague; the trouble has always been that men understood too well what He meant and have not been willing to pay the price of obedience. The writer before us says that Christ's principles will not work. How does she know when they have really not been tried? She says that Christ's precepts cannot be carried over successfully into large civic and economic fields. This is precisely what must be done to-day; this is what the churches in harmony with the larger vision of to-day are seeking to do first of all through a larger conception of Christ's mission and through the departments of social service which they have created. Before we set Jesus aside and demand a new religion, let us be sure that we have understood Jesus; that we have come up to His ideal, and that we have advanced far beyond His program. Before we ask for a new religion, let us find out what the old meant and practice it to the full.

The churches we admit have a clear duty in this hour. The first thing is to become less opaque and let more light shine through them. The churches have been poor transmitters of the light; too often they have obscured if not concealed Christ. Then the churches must set themselves to find out who Jesus was, what His message means, what kind of a world He expected this world to be. Beyond this, it is for the churches to find out what Christianity means and then set out to try Christianity. The churches, as I have said in another publication, have tried some things that passed for Christianity; they have tried Christianity in parts and spots. But they have never yet tried to bring the whole of Christianity to bear upon the whole life of the world. This is the challenge and opportunity of our day.

Harold W. Thompson of Teachers' College, Albany, sent out a questionnaire to 150 of the leading organists of this country, asking them to name the ten most popular anthems. T. Tertius Noble's "Souls of the Righteous" received the most votes, and it was likewise clear that Mr. Noble is the most popular living writer of anthems. Tertius Noble is the eminent organist of St. Thomas's Church, New York and president of the National Association of Organists, which has just held its annual meeting at Rochester, N. Y.

So far as prohibition is concerned, New York is only an eddy in the current. While it was repealing its State enforcement code nineteen other States were strengthening their laws against the sale of liquor during the last sessions of their legislatures. New York was the only State that was not running with the current.

The Methodists are apparently rising in the educational scale, at least in Indiana. While the number of students at Indiana University has been increasing about eighty-five per cent in a decade, the number of students coming from Methodist homes has increased about 152 per cent. Perhaps the Methodists have not limited the size of their families so blindly as have the members of some other communions. At any rate, we congratulate the Indiana Methodists.

THE OBSERVER

A Knight of the Twentieth Century

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

THE death of Dr. Philip S. Moxom at seventy-five removes one who has been one of the most valiant soldiers of the Lord. He has been a most striking example of how it is possible to be just as valiant a soldier with the sword of the Spirit as with a sword of steel. He began life as a soldier. Of English parentage and Canadian birth, he came to this country as a young boy and enlisted in the Union army at the age of fifteen. He served through the whole four years of the war, and although he became one of the most pronounced workers for finding substitutes for war in the settlement of international disputes, he retained the soldierly and knightly characteristics to the end. He was a most perfect example of one who followed William James in finding the moral equivalent for war. He had the knight's look and bearing—tall and straight, bearded face and fearless eye, passion and personality in the voice. In his soul he knew no fear. He fought and fought hard in the worlds of morals and of thought.

When he came out of the war, still a mere lad, he decided to fit himself for the Baptist ministry. He studied at Kalamazoo College and Rochester Theological Seminary and was ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1871. He began his ministry as a very young man, but his four years of war had matured him more than many years of ordinary life ever would have done. He showed signs both of originality and power from the beginning. He had the prophetic instinct and the love of literature and philosophy in his soul. His preaching immediately attracted attention and in time he was in a prominent Baptist church in Cleveland. He came into national prominence when he was called to a large Baptist church at Boston, where he ministered for many years. During this ministry he touched the larger life of the city and soon, by book and lecture tours, the life of the nation.

After he had been in the Baptist ministry for several years there came a crisis in his life. He never departed from the fundamentals of the Christian faith, but in his mind he thought his way along with the liberal theological movement in New England. He belonged to the school of Newman Smyth, Munger and Gladden. His sermons began to reflect the new backgrounds and foundations. A new note crept into his preaching and one not, at that time, familiar to Baptist churches, although common enough now. There was never any public manifestation of trouble between the congregation and Dr. Moxom, but members of the Baptist communion here and there throughout the country occasionally took exception to his views. Perhaps this had something to do with determining the step he later took, but probably it was his own desire for larger freedom that led him, after several years in the Baptist communion, to seek admission to the ministry of the Congregational Church. This Church in New England allows large liberty in thought to its ministers. So long as they remain true to the great evangelical doctrines they may indulge in great freedom of interpretation both of the Bible and the doctrines. Dr. Moxom sought this liberty and evidently felt he could better secure it in the Congregational body. He resigned his pastorate of the Baptist church in Boston and shortly afterwards became pastor of the South Congregational Church, Springfield, Mass.

Here he enjoyed a long and influential pastorate. His sermons attracted large audiences, and he reached outside of the immediate ministry of the church by lectures on literature and formed classes for the study of poetry. He was a great believer, with Dr. Munger, in the poets as being both the best seers and the best interpreters of life. It was to the poets as much as to the philosophers and theologians that one should go for light and truth. He was among the first to recognize Browning as a great seer and protagonist of the Christian faith. Browning was not only the psalmist, the singer of the fearless ventures of the mind and soul, he was also the prophet of the Lord and the preacher of righteousness and the victory that comes through faith. In Boston and Springfield, in colleges and study circles, Dr. Moxom opened up the poems of Browning to eager thousands. He also wrote much upon the Christian and ethical content of the poet's writings until he came to be recognized as one of the foremost Browning authorities in the country. For three years he was the president of the Boston Browning Society, a position that has been held by many eminent men. He was also a thorough student of the great Russian writers and found in them, as has Dr. John Hutton, the keenest searching of the human soul, the most terrible portrayal of the havoc of sin in a human soul, the most insistent preachers of the gospel of redemption through forgiveness and atonement. His book, "Two Masters: Browning and Turgenieff," is not only an interesting study in contrasts, it shows how all really great minds, the true seers, those who really see, always come back to the great Christian gospel of the cross. He wrote several other books, one on "From Jerusalem to Nicæa," revealing a wealth of historical and theological scholarship rarely found in the busy preacher's and pastor's life. In 1895 he was invited to give the Lowell Lectures in Boston, another high honor.

Early in his career he became interested in the abolition of war as a means of settling international disputes. He was prominent in the famous Lake Mohonk Conferences on International Arbitration from their inception and was one of Mr. Smiley's most valued aides. Never a conference passed but his voice contributed to the discussion. With such men as Edward Everett Hale, Benjamin F. Trueblood, Edwin Ginn, Robert Treat Paine, President Eliot and other wise men from the east, he developed for the American people the idea of the arbitration of international disputes and the establishment of a world court. He hailed The Hague conferences as the beginning of a new day—a day of which he had dreamed and for which he waited with undimmed faith. He was a delegate to the international peace conferences in various cities of Europe and was a member of the famous church conference in Constance in 1914, where the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches was born, and all who were present will remember his wise words and his calm bearing in those very trying days. It is such men as he who keep the torch burning, who lay the foundations of a new world-order, who help all of us to keep the faith.

Spiritual Influences, Good and Bad

By Rev. W. H. Carnegie, M.A.

"Concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant."—1 Cor. 12:1.

I PROPOSE to bring before you some thoughts suggested by these words. I think we shall find the teaching and, indeed, the warning conveyed in them as appropriate and as necessary to people of the present day as they were to the Corinthian converts to whom they were addressed by St. Paul. Let us begin by reminding ourselves who these converts were. Some of them had been brought up in Judaism, the rest in one or other of the heathen religions or philosophies which in bewildering variety existed in the Græco-Roman world of that day. But they all—and this is the point I wish to begin by emphasizing—they all, previous to their conversion to Christianity, had been to some extent conscious of a spiritual order and had made some effort to establish communication with it. The very fact of their conversion proves that this was so. To men who were wholly materialistic in outlook, to men who had not risen above the level of mere animalism, Christianity could have made no appeal. These men had accepted and identified themselves with it because it promised to give them something of which they had previously felt the need and to give it to them in a more complete and satisfying form. They had already been searching for God and had not been altogether unsuccessful in their search. Those of them who had been brought up in Judaism had gained some clear knowledge of His being and His attributes and His claims. In their prophetic literature especially a revelation had been unfolded to them to which their spiritual nature had responded and in which it had found no small measure of satisfaction. But the satisfaction was not complete. They craved more light and clearer light.

The aim of every revelation, let us remind ourselves, is to shorten the distance which separates man from God. Its worth is tested by the extent to which it achieves this aim. Judaism, tried by this standard, was not found wanting. By a gradual process extending over many centuries it had brought men near enough to God to enable them to discern and to realize His unity and His personality and His omnipotence and His righteousness and something of His kindly and beneficent fatherhood. A pious Jew of Christ's time had got very near to God, had got to the very threshold of His presence; but this very nearness impelled him to draw nearer still, to pass over the threshold into the inner sanctuary where he could see Him face to face and achieve completeness by entering into personal union and communion with Him. It was men thus prepared and thus disposed, men whose soul ears and eyes were open and active and intensely sensitive who responded most readily and fully to the Christian revelation and became its first converts. It was men of these spiritual antecedents, moreover, who provided the early Church with her chief leaders and teachers and inspirers. St. Paul, for instance, was such a man. He had learned all that Judaism could teach him. He was not only conscious of God's presence and claims; he was completely devoted to His service, as he understood that service. With unstinted zeal and energy he obeyed His mandates as he interpreted them. But he was not fully satisfied. Behind his certitude and his enthusiasms he was conscious of undefined needs and longings, of misgivings of which he could not rid himself, of pricks against which he kicked in vain. Then one day Christ appeared to him by the way in a flood of light which blinded him for the time, physically and mentally. Of his physical blindness he soon recovered himself through the agency of Ananias of Damascus. His mental recovery took longer to effect. He tells us that for three years he went away by himself and devoted himself to the effort of seeing clearly the new spiritual vista which had been unfolded to him, of making himself at home in the new order of spiritual experience to which he had been admitted. When he emerged from this retirement St. Paul had to a large extent achieved this object. But even then he did not claim that he had attained complete clarity of vision. He was conscious, as he tells himself, that he still saw as through a darkened glass. But he saw clearly through Christ he had attained personal conscious contact with God himself, that he had embarked upon a process of spiritual development destined to consummate itself in the unveiled splendor of the Divine Presence. He had not yet fully attained, nor did he achieve full attainment in this life, but he knew himself to be in the way of attainment. He found in Christ the complete and all-satisfying revelation of God and accepted as his sole preoccupation in life the effort to know more of Christ. "I know nothing but Christ," he cried. "Forgetting those things that are behind and reaching forward to those that are before, I press forward towards the mark of the prize of the high calling in Christ Jesus our Lord."

But besides converts from Judaism in the Corinthian church which St. Paul addressed there were others who had been nurtured in heathenism. And here again you will notice their conversion postulated and had been preceded by a certain measure of spiritual experience and enlightenment and activity. The heathen world at the time was by no means spiritually dead. Heathen religion and philosophy embodied the efforts of their adherents and exponents to satisfy man's spiritual needs and implied that they were intensely conscious of these needs. Many of the great Greek philosophers, for instance, were deeply spiritually minded men. Plato, the greatest of them all, was an ardent seeker for God. The method of his search differed from that of the Hebrew prophets. It was almost altogether intellectual, while theirs was mainly emotional and volitional. He taught that by the due use of his reasoning faculties, by ascending from general principles to those still more general, men could finally attain knowledge of the ultimate Principle of all, the Idea of ideas, the Prime Source from which all existence flows. This was his dialectical method, his argument of the path which he counseled his disciples to follow. It was imperfect. Along this path the human soul can never attain satisfaction. What it craves is personal contact with a personal God, not merely intellectual apprehension of some abstract principle, however far-reaching and fundamental. But Plato and many other Greek philosophers of the ancient world were, as I have said, genuine and earnest seekers after God, and their efforts to find Him were by no means fruitless. They provided an intellectual framework of an invaluable kind which the Church later on was able to use for its own purposes and to clothe with its own inspirations and revelations. Just as Judaism prepared the way for Christ, so did Greek philosophy in hardly a less degree. In the New Testament itself we find the earliest Christian teachers using its speculations and expressing themselves in its phraseology. In St. Paul's writings we find constant traces of its influence. The incident recorded in Acts 17 illustrates his general attitude. He was at the time in Athens, the traditional head-center of Hellenic philosophy, and was called upon to address a number of its citizens, and this is the gist of what he said: "Ye men of Athens, as I passed along and observed the objects of your worship, I found an altar with this inscription, 'To the Unknown God.' Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you." The words, you see, imply no antagonism; on the contrary, their flavor is one of sympathetic recognition. Greek philosophy has ascended the mountain-side up to a certain point, far enough to find that its summit was obscured by banks of clouds. The apostle met it at this point and told its disciples that if they would follow him he would lead them through the cloud region to where the sun shone in a clear, an unsullied sky. But, of course, it is in St. John's writings that the influence of the Hellenic philosophy is most apparent. It is hardly too much to say that the main framework of his thoughts is derived from it and that much of his phraseology has a similar origin. He took the Logos doctrine of the Greek schools and adapted it to Christian uses. He presented many of the facts of Christ's life and much of His teaching in terms which educated Greeks of the time could easily understand and find congenial. To the Greeks he became a Greek that he might win the Greeks, and by doing so implied that the main trend of Greek thought, so far from being antagonistic to Christianity, was in line with it and formed indeed an important part of a process preparatory to it and leading up to it.

Probably, however, to go on with our analysis of St. Paul's audience, only a few of the Corinthian converts from heathenism had any knowledge of Greek philosophy. Most of them were people of the poorer and less educated classes who before their conversion had been adherents of one or other of the popular religions which flourished and abounded at that time. These varied much in spiritual quality. Some of them were extravagant or ecstatic or even grossly immoral. Others of them were disciplined and graceful and kindly and refined. But, again, in none of them was the spiritual element wholly lacking. The disgusting and degrading orgies of the Bacchanalians or of the Aphrodisiacs were something more than mere outburst of bestial animalism. The Oracles were not wholly fraudulent. The hosts of magicians and soothsayers and diviners and necromancers and trance mediums and faithhealers who batted on the offerings of ignorance and credulity were not wholly charlatans; nor were those who had recourse to them altogether devoid of spiritual insight and sensibility. At first hearing the heathenism of the time seemed for the most part to express itself in a Babeldom of discordant and defasing voices, but beneath and behind this Babeldom those who listen attentively can hear a very different cry, pure in its quality and infinitely pathetic in its perplexity. It is as the cry of a child who has strayed from his father's home and would fain find his way thither again. It is the cry of the human soul seeking for Him from whom it came and to whom it belongs, and apart from whom its experience cannot be else than that of a fevered and restless dream.

Such, then, in the broadest outline, was the character of the audiences whom St. Paul addressed, not merely in Corinth, but in other centers, at least where Christian churches had been established. They included people of very different antecedents and upbringing, but they were people who all brought with them into the Church one common quality: they were all of them, to a greater or less degree, spiritually minded men, who were conscious of spiritual need and who were dominated by the desire for its satisfaction. The religious or philosophical cults in which they had been born and bred had promised this satisfaction, but had failed to redeem their promise. This was proved by the fact of their conversion to Christianity. They turned to it for something which they failed to find elsewhere, but not for something completely new. They had as Jews or as heathen caught some glimpse of the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world, more or less indistinct, more or less distorted by passing through blurred mediums. They turned to Christ because they recognized in Him that Light itself. St. Paul had been the means of introducing them to Christ, and it was now his part to help them to see clearly and sanely, to take full advantage of the new spiritual heritage placed at their disposal. There were dangers to be avoided; there were mistakes which could easily be made. Much of their spiritual experience as Jews, still more of their spiritual experience as heathen, came elsewhere than from God and led elsewhere than to Him. For there are evil spirits as well as good, and it was all-important that they should be able to distinguish between them. "Trust not every spirit," says the apostle in another place, "but try the spirits whether they be of God." How try them? What test shall we apply by which we may judge of their origin and their nature? That is the question with which the Epistle deals. "Concerning spiritual gifts, I would not have you ignorant." Your Judaism, or your heathenism, placed such gifts at your disposal, but, as you know, they are not of unsullied quality. They contain elements of good and truth, but they also contain much that is impure and defiling and misleading. It is of vital importance that you should be able to distinguish the true from the false, the chaff from the wheat, those powers which minister to your soul's upward growth from those which make for deterioration and degradation. It is of vital importance still that we should make this distinction to-day in a civilization nominally Christian. For it is a mistake to suppose that civilization has rid itself of those evil spiritual influences, those distorted and short-sighted interpretations of spiritual truth against which the apostle warned his Jewish and heathen converts. The spirit of Judaism on its worst side, the spirit of heathenism on its worst side, is still alive and active amongst us, and those are the real enemies. Not our open enemies; they are not formidable in the long run. Man can never be purely materialistic or animal. The real enemy is the insidious enemy that goes right within the sanctuary of our lives; this false spiritualism against which the apostle warns his Corinthian converts. "Concerning spiritual gifts, I would not have you ignorant." What is the test that he advises them to apply, so that they may know the true from the false and separate the wheat from the chaff? That is a the important question.

A Crisis in the Holy Land

By B. K. Rhodes

THE Holy Land, scene of the earthly activities of the Saviour, and such places as the Holy Sepulcher, the Grotto of the Nativity in Bethlehem, Nazareth, the Garden of Gethsemane, the Mount of Olives and others have been a source of spiritual comfort and inspiration to Christians of the West for so long that we have come to take them for granted. We know that they exist and we draw inspiration from the fact that they are there, concrete objects to stimulate our faith.

But what has enabled these holy shrines to exist through the sixteen hundred years that have elapsed since their re-discovery in 326 A.D. by the newly converted Empress Helena, mother of Constantine the Great? The history of Palestine has not been a placid one since that time. Many times in those sixteen centuries war has swept its devastating course over the Holy Land. Persian, Arab, Crusader, Turk have ridden in triumph into the Holy City. Some brought with them torch and flame and left Jerusalem a heap of smoking ruins; others, more generous, spared the shrines. Twenty-one times in the course of its stormy history has Jerusalem been destroyed and rebuilt. Under alien domination throughout most of its history, what force has been at work through the centuries to maintain the sacred places from the destruction and obliteration that has threatened them time and again?

The Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem has had the guardianship of the sacred places in the Holy Land since their establishment as Christian shrines sixteen centuries ago. At the dedication of the original Church of the Holy Sepulcher in 336 A.D. it was Eusebius, "Father of Ecclesiastical History," then Bishop of Jerusalem, who conducted the services. And ever since the Patriarchs of Jerusalem, with the Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulcher, which has grown up around the Patriarchate, have maintained the shrines.

Although it was not elevated to a Patriarchate until the Council of Chalcedon in 451 A.D., the Bishopric of Jerusalem, on which the Patriarchate is based, dates back to apostolic days, claiming as its first bishop St. James the Less, "the Lord's brother." It is one of the five original Patriarchates, the others being Alexandria, Constantinople, Antioch and Rome. Because of the especially sacred nature of the places under its care the Patriarchate of Jerusalem has always been looked upon as of paramount importance to Christianity, particularly Eastern Christianity. It was recently stated by a member of the British Mandatory Government in Palestine, a man who has made an extensive study of the affairs of the Eastern Church, that if you are going to save Christianity in the East you must save it in Palestine; "the downfall of this patriarchate, which Orthodox Christians throughout the world look upon as the keystone of their faith, would be followed by the disintegration of the Orthodox Church everywhere."

It seems strange that danger should be threatening this venerable Christian institution and the sacred places under its care at this time; it would seem that the Patriarchate, after centuries of stressful service, had at last reached a peaceful harbor. On December 9, 1917, British troops under General Allenby entered the Holy City and brought the sacred shrines under a Christian banner for the first time in seven hundred years. Since that time Palestine has been under British control, first military and later civil, administered by British officials under the Mandatory Government. The Patriarchate is under a stable, Christian government. Why, then, does danger threaten?

The menace which now hangs over the Patriarchate of Jerusalem and the sacred places under its care is a heritage of its long centuries of service and difficulties arising from the war and the Russian Revolution. In order to understand clearly the situation as it exists to-day it is necessary to go back to 1913, before the outbreak of the World War.

At that time Palestine was under Ottoman rule. The nearest and most interested great Christian nation was Russia, whose people worshipped in the Orthodox faith. The Patriarchate derived its revenue from the rents of lands owned in Palestine, from lands in Bessarabia, Russia, Greece, Crete, Smyrna and Asia Minor. These lands had been donated by the faithful to be held in trust by the Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulcher. Besides these rents, collections were taken annually in the Russian Orthodox Church under the auspices of the government. And considerable income came from the offerings of pilgrims to the shrines, who came to the number of about ten thousand each year, and most of whom were Russians. In an official British report it was estimated that no less than sixty-four per cent. of the total income of the Patriarchate was derived from Russian sources at this time.

The influx of pilgrims stopped with the outbreak of the World War. The Russian Revolution brought to an end the annual collections by the Russian Orthodox Church, and the lands owned in Russia were lost for the same reason. The property in Bessarabia was lost through the fact that, when Bessarabia became a part of Rumania, the properties were taken from the Church by an agrarian law of the Rumanian government, which confiscated all church properties. The lands in Greece and Crete had been held as security by Greek banks for loans incurred before the war, so the property there is lost. The burning of Smyrna and the seizure of Asia Minor by the Angora Turks account for the rest of the properties.

Summing up the chapter of misfortunes, the Orthodox Patriarchate has had about three-fourths of its income taken from it in the last ten years. The only sources of revenue remaining to it are the rents from the lands in Palestine, which, despite their increase in value during the past few years, are entirely inadequate to support the Patriarchate, even with its activities cut down to the least possible scope.

Simultaneously with this decrease in the income of the Patriarchate, the institution was faced with the necessity for additional outlay due to the dispensing of war relief. Throughout the struggle the Patriarchate dispensed relief, not only to the native population, but also to refugees from all countries without discrimination because of creed.

In order to carry on this essential work the Patriarchate was forced to borrow money and was obliged to hypothecate many of its property holdings. The total number of creditors is about seven thousand.

When the British Mandatory Government assumed control of Palestine they found the Patriarchate in debt to the extent of about $3,500,000, its revenues very much depleted and the scope of its activities extremely limited. The creditors were getting uneasy about the debts and were threatening to call their loans.

If these loans are called it means the taking away of the last support left to the Patriarchate, for, in the aggregate, the securities given for the loans constitute a mortgage on the lands held in Palestine, the sole remaining source of income of the Patriarchate.

This would have happened long ago were it not for the fact that the British government has declared a special moratorium on the affairs of the Patriarchate, and followed that by the appointment of a commission to administer its affairs. That commission was appointed and is now functioning, all moneys received or paid out in behalf of the Patriarchate passing through the hands of the commission.

The commission has cut down still further the activities of the Patriarchate, has established a budget at the lowest possible figure which will maintain the Patriarchate and the sacred places. The commission has not, however, been able to make any progress toward paying off the debt because interest charges and running expenses take up all of the available income. Meantime, pressure is being brought to bear on the government to terminate the moratorium. Thus far the commission has been able to keep it in force and has recently extended it indefinitely, but this is strictly a temporary and emergency measure and cannot be extended much longer.

The danger which threatens the Patriarchate, then, amounts to nothing less than financial ruin. Once these loans are called it will be necessary to sell the lands in Palestine to pay them off. That means that the Patriarchate will be left without any support whatever, that this venerable institution, with sixteen hundred years of service to Christianity behind it, will terminate its activities and the sacred places under its care will either fall into decay through neglect or pass into other hands.

Aside from the sentimental catastrophe of the failure of the guardians of the holy places and the unfortunate effect of it upon the more external types of Christianity, especially in the East, there is the human side of the question involving the activities of the Church, which are far wider in the Near East than we of the West have any conception of. For example, there are no public schools in the Near East, except those which the British have introduced in Palestine. The education of children is almost entirely in the hands of the churches. There are in the territory under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Jerusalem some ten thousand children of school age who now face the alternative of attending a Mohammedan, Jewish or some school of a faith different from their own or of going without an education. It is only under exceptional circumstances that parents will send their children to a school of another faith, but they are being forced to do so.

Poor relief is a matter which is entirely under the jurisdiction of the churches in the Near East, there being no public charities as we understand them here. This leaves the Orthodox population of Palestine without any provisions for taking care of their unfortunates except the pitifully inadequate aid that the Patriarchate can extend.

Another feature of the Church's activity in Palestine is judicial. Under the laws of the country, certain types of cases come under the jurisdiction of the patriarchal courts. With its present depleted income the Patriarch is unable to maintain these courts, and cases that would ordinarily be tried in patriarchal courts are now tried in government courts, which are Mohammedan. This works a great hardship on the Orthodox people, as these courts believe that justice should be heavily tempered, not with mercy, but with prejudice.

The same thing applies to hospitals and dispensaries. The Orthodox Church can afford to operate at present only about one-third of the facilities necessary to take care of the sick of its community. And here again the failure of the Church to provide these things means that they are lacking entirely, as there is no other institution which can undertake to furnish them.

The closing of the theological seminary leaves the Orthodox Church in Palestine with no means of educating young men for the ministry. There is now a shortage of parish priests in Palestine, and this will grow more acute as time goes on. Unless the Orthodox ministry is to vanish in Palestine the theological seminary must be reopened and the salaries of the parish priests must be raised to the point where they are receiving a living wage. They have been receiving $20 a month and the British commission raised their salaries to $40 a month. It is practically the only instance where the commission increased the expenses of the Patriarchate.

So this venerable Christian institution, after sixteen hundred years of faithful service, finds itself facing the most serious crisis in its career. Heavily in debt, unable to extend to its people the aid that they so sorely need, its children being educated in other faiths, its ministry underpaid, inadequate in numbers and steadily decreasing, its people deprived of its judicial protection, the Orthodox Patriarchate turns to the Christians of the West for aid in its dark hour. It asks, in substance, if Western Christians will do now, for the first time, what the Patriarchate has been doing for six-

TWO CITIES SWEEPED OUT OF EXISTENCE

Tokyo and Yokohama Now Dust and Ashes and Ruins

Three Hundred Thousand Dead Means a Hundred Thousand Refugees and Homeless

Such are the headlines from the daily papers of this week. They underestimate the calamity, for each issue tells a more desolate tale.

Among these thousands of refugees are several thousand members of the native Christian churches which were established by American Missionaries and are now in charge of native pastors. To these pastors will fall the care of these thousands of starving children.

While Americans should make no distinction in their quick work of mercy, and will not, yet these Christian children have a direct claim upon the Christians of America. They are our wards—our special care.

We want to cable $25,000 to these Christian pastors immediately to be used for these children.

Fortunately a very eminent member of our staff knows every pastor and church in Japan, he having spent all his life there as missionary and professor in Doshisha University. He has just returned from Japan where he has been on a visit to these very churches. He has agreed to act as almoner of all gifts received. This means that the money will be cabled daily to these pastors and thousands of children will be fed.

We hope—we feel sure—that everyone who reads these lines will send us something immediately. Do not delay, for these children are in terrible straits.

To the Pastors and Sunday School Superintendents who read The Christian Work

If your Sunday School has not already made an offering for Japan will you not have it make one at once for the Sunday School children of Japan who are in dire distress.

Think, too, what an opportunity this is for creating lasting good-will between America and Japan. Japan will remember us forever as the good Samaritan who bound up her grievous wounds. If we feed her hundreds of thousands of children now, and help them to find homes, it will be worth more than all the peace treaties that could ever be signed.

teen hundred years—preserve its sacred places from certain physical decay and possible loss. It asks aid that it may bring up its children in its church faith; that it may give to its people the protection and care that only their Church can give; in short, it asks aid that it may help to keep Christianity alive in the land of its birth.

It is an opportunity and a duty that Western Christians are already embracing. It is the first time that Christians of the United States have had a chance to take part actively in the preservation of their sacred shrines. Western help in the preservation of the sacred places may well mark the dawn of a new era of understanding and co-operation between the churches of the West and those of the East.

In this country the American Committee on Preservation of the Sacred Places in the Holy Land has been formed for the purpose of planning and carrying out the steps necessary to aid the Patriarchate and the preservation of the shrines. Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, General Secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, and Rt. Rev. William T. Manning, Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of

New York, are the chairmen of the committee. Included in its membership are many of the leading ecclesiastics and laymen of most of the Protestant denominations of the United States. The committee has perfected plans and is taking active steps looking toward the launching of a nation-wide non-sectarian campaign to raise America's share of the fund necessary to pay off the debt of the Patriarchate and thus assure the preservation of the sacred places and the continuance of the traditional form of Eastern Christianity as a living force in Palestine and the Near East. The final American committee will be interdenominational and permanent. Thus will America participate henceforth in enhancing the beauty and the appeal of the inspirational centuries of Palestine.

It is the hope of the committee to enlist the aid of a majority of Christian people in the United States and to go to the Patriarchate with the inspiring message that American Christianity stands solidly behind their brothers of the East. The committee has established offices at 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City, and contributions are already being received from many parts of the country.

If I Were a Layman

By Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D.D.

Bishop Coadjutor of Central New York

IN THREE PARTS—PART I AND PART II.

THE OLD ORDER.

PERHAPS it is just as well I am not. I certainly did not make a brilliant success at being one when I had the chance. As I think back I fancy that for a number of years I was a rather ordinary, indifferent sort of a layman. I was of the usual type—not much better than the average, perhaps not very much worse. Possibly a record of my own shortcomings may indicate the lines on which I would wish the layman of to-day to proceed to a similar self-examination and at the same time suggest by implication a point of departure if they are to attempt a reformation.

My religious beliefs were somewhat inchoate and undefined—it wasn't my fault; I had never been taught.

My practice of religion was as vague as my belief. I do not think that I was a striking example of faithfulness in worship—perhaps that was not altogether my fault, either; I had supposed that one went to church principally for the sermon, and my recollection is that the sermon was not worth making much of an effort to hear.

My impression is that the services of the church seemed dignified and orderly; I came to appreciate them more and more by contrast with the non-liturgical services of surrounding Protestantism. But I am not sure that this appreciation was altogether free from a rather snobbish sense of superiority. It is quite impossible clearly to define my feelings, but I am reasonably certain the thought lay in the back of my head that we had reached a higher plane of culture, that the crudities and incongruities of ordinary Protestant worship were deplorable, and that those who enjoyed such worship, or were content with it, were not up to the best intellectual, social and cultural standard of the people I knew. Yet the ordinary morning service often palled on me—that is one reason I did not feel any special "urge" which made me attend always. Sometimes it seemed mechanical; on special occasions, when there were vital issues or events which deeply concerned and perhaps deeply moved many of us, the service seemed rather dull and lifeless, a little stilted and formal; to a greater degree than I ordinarily realized, aloof, impersonal, detached from life.

I "received communion" rather regularly; but, unless my memory is at fault after the lapse of years, I made little preparation for it and I was not quite sure why I went. It was the right thing to do once a month or perhaps less frequently. In some sort of way I felt that it "did me good" to go. I still knew Christianity as a belief in a loving Saviour who had given His life for sinful men—and I knew I was sinful, of course. He had asked that we do this in remembrance of Him, and I did it, without knowing just what good I got from going, or what I ought to do if I were to get more good. This wasn't my fault, I am sure. When I was confirmed the rector had given me little or no instruction. I cannot remember that he had a confirmation class; if he had he apparently had not required my attendance. He had asked me to be confirmed and my mother had urged it. It seemed right to "join the church," and I joined. The rector was a dear, good old man, but he never said a word to me about my soul—or my spiritual life or religious practice, in any way—and I went for the laying on of hands, not knowing exactly why I went or what I was to receive.

Certainly I knew nothing of self-examination for sin. Of course, I was a sinner and I needed a Saviour, but my consciousness of sin was a group consciousness. I was just one of a mass of people who weren't all that they ought to be. I doubt if I knew very much about prayer. I had a good mother and as a child she had taught me childish devotions, but as I grew older and said my prayers alone I never was taught anything to take the place of those early prayers. There was a certain reticence which would have made it impossible for me to tell anybody that I was blundering along without any real knowledge; and there was, of course, a like reticence on the part of my parents, who never would have dreamed of probing into my soul processes. It is strange, perhaps, that the evangelical rector said nothing to help me; but he was reticent, too, and I imagine it wasn't for him to talk about religion face to face. When he met me I didn't know what in the world to say to him, and I imagine he was at an equal loss as to what he should say to me.

I am sure I had no definite sense of obligation about giving. "Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it." We boys had been brought up to "put a penny in the plate" at Sunday-school, so when we were older, while of course we gave more, we still gave in a small way. One thing I was quite certain about—it was nonsense to talk about giving to foreign missions; there were enough heathen at home to be converted. I never dreamed that perhaps I was one of them. The parish had some wealthy people among its members—the best families had been identified with it for several generations—and I suppose they gave (if the men were vestrymen, they made up the deficit at Easter, it may be presumed), but I cannot remember that any of us of the younger generation felt any obligation about finances, and my recollection is that we thought as little about our responsibility in other ways, whether we were poor or well-to-do.

I had no conception whatever of the life of the Church outside my own parish. It was some time before I even knew much about our system of church government, except that we had a bishop, who came once a year and made the rounds, morning, afternoon and evening, of the three parishes of the town. It is quite certain that I knew little or nothing of the diocesan convention or its missionary organization, or of the general convention or of any conception of the Church to which I belonged as a branch of Catholic Christendom.

Indeed, I know I thought about the Episcopal Church as one of the Protestant bodies, quite different in worship from others, very much better for people of culture and refinement, liberal in its views about dancing and other social recreations, not likely to become painfully excited or aroused in the way of crude revivals or evangelistic meetings, holding a dignified aloofness regarding many things the Protestant preachers were always talking about—a church that didn't meddle with a man's religion or politics, because his religion was something between his own soul and God, and his politics had to do with another sphere of his activities.

Unless I am reading back into my life history something which was really written there much later, I think I sometimes put questions to myself about this particular "glory" of the Episcopal Church. I looked down upon "canting Methodists" and was dead certain that they were driving away the young people by their foolish ideas about dancing (save that a good many of the young people were already ignoring the discipline and nobody ever did anything to them for their rebellious indifference to the rules), but there were times when it seemed possible that the danger of becoming worldly was quite as real as the peril of Puritanism. Also, I was a bit uncertain when the despised Methodists became very active in a local campaign in which I figured as an ardent reformer, whereas our own parish clergyman and the other rectors of the town would not touch the matter with a ten-foot pole.

Of course, there was then no real awakening to social questions, much less any talk about social justice. The parish had a sewing society which included most of the good women of the congregation, and another society whose name I forget, for the younger women; there was a Woman's Auxiliary that tried to combine both, and at Thanksgiving they all joined in making up baskets for the poor. We were a kindly folk and those who were well-to-do gave charity rather generously, but patronizingly and by the back door route and in condescending visits in the less desirable neighborhoods.

Consequently, there really wasn't anything for a man—much less a young man—to do in the way of church work, and I was among those who did nothing. Once the rector asked me to take a Sunday-school class. I tried it, and after "hearing them say the collect" and having them recite portions of the Church Catechism and of a little book called (I think) the Calvary Catechism, we spent the rest of the time talking baseball. I soon gave up the class. None of the men taught in Sunday-school, anyway. The only male assistance rendered in the school was from a few of the older boys who had charge of the Sunday-school library, gave out and took in books (by A. L. O. E. and others), kept the roll and so on. So I never did any church work and never dreamed that I ought to.

Looking back over it all, then, I cannot see that I made a brilliant success as a layman. My churchmanship consisted in following the line of least resistance; it was a general adherence to the side of the eminently respectable; or was purely conventional. The only sharply defined thing about it was an inherited abhorrence of Roman Catholicism, or perhaps it would be more exact to say an abiding suspicion of the "Catholics." Other Protestants sometimes said that the Episcopalians were "next door to being Catholics," and I think I resented that, whereas I rather gloried in the charge that we meddled with no man's religion or politics. I think some time rather late in this stage of my spiritual history I learned in a vague way that the clergy resented the statement that Henry VIII had founded the Church of England, from which we sprang, and that our bishops were in some way successors of the apostles; but the matter did not particularly interest me. Anyway, I knew we were not all like Catholics and I resented the statement that we were, as being one of the worst slanders that could be uttered against us.

PART II—THE CALL TO LARGER SERVICE

Well—that is the sort of a layman I was. I never became any other kind, because the moment my eyes were opened, my conscience aroused and my heart touched I felt the call to the sacred ministry, became a student for holy orders and so ceased to be a layman. It seems to me now, that as a candidate I was at once wholly and entirely out of the laity class. I became then and there a man "in minor orders," hanging on the fringe of clericalism, very much more professional in my attitude than the parsons themselves, drinking in so much and in such large gulps that the old life of the layman seemed to lie far in the distant past. Between what I was and what I had been there was a great gulf fixed. I never had a chance, as a layman, to reform.

And that is curious, because the deep conviction that called me to the ministry was the desire to change and reform other laymen.

Perhaps the thing will be plainer if I tell something of the new light by which the call became clear. First there came a period of doubt and difficulty. How or why I began really to think I cannot remember, but as plainly as though it had all happened yesterday I can visualize the day in church when something in the Scripture lesson made me face the problem of evil, and the recollection is still painful of how the whole question kept coming back in many renewed difficulties—the old questions as to why God did not make us good and keep us good; why sin, sorrow, suffering were permitted; how God if He were all-wise and all-powerful and all-good could have allowed evil to exist; how man could be punished for the sin which God could have prevented. Then, as the recognition came of the splendor and glory of free will—of a race given moral freedom that we might serve God, not as machines, but as free agents—questions about man's freedom of will and God's foreknowledge began to trouble me. (I suppose this was an inherited difficulty due to a Presbyterian ancestry.) Then, like a flash, came the meaning of the Incarnation as showing that God loves and cares. I became content to remain in ignorance of the solution of my problem. It appeared as a problem which the intellect could never solve; but while the mind could not find a logical answer to the question, the heart could rest in faith if we accepted Jesus as the divine Son. If He were that, then all that He was, God is; all that He felt God feels; and since His love is certain we can be sure of God. We may not know why things are as they are, but knowing God in Christ we can trust Him, though His ways be past finding out.

And then came the desire to make others see this. It came very strongly when one of my friends lost his wife and boy, and I learned that he was passing through deep shadows—facing in experience the difficulties which as yet I had but wrestled with in thought.

Next, to sketch it all very briefly, came the discovery of what Christianity really is and of what the Church means; a closer study of Christ's life, and then, as by a revelation, the understanding that in the mind of Christ there was always the thought of the Church, a society established to keep alive the knowledge of Himself. Then, as one studied the great life, a new sense of sin. Then the longing to be rid of it and to have strength to keep it out of one's own life. Then a real experience of what the atonement means, apart from any theory about it. Then an understanding of the sacraments as means of grace. Gradually I came to grasp the thought of the Church as a mystical society; not the afterthought of men, but the forethought of Christ; not an organization which men have built according to their own plans, but a divine society, with a divinely appointed ministry commissioned as well as called; of this ministry as the bond which is to preserve the unity of the body; of the tragic disaster of division wherever and whenever the ministry is dispensed with. There was a period of searching inquiry into our own ecclesiastical history and of examination of the Church of Rome; a time when Rome seemed the only home to seek, though its mass was something like Protestantism—in the one a minister praying for a silent congregation who offered no real worship of their own; in the other a priest sacrificing, with a congregation of individuals offering their individual worship while the sacrifice was offered for them by another.

Finally, when there came the certainty of our own position, with an understanding of who and what Christ was and of the glory of the revelation, a sudden conviction that few of us were giving Christianity any real trial. I looked in at myself and then around at others; we did not have the abounding joy which such a revelation should bring; we had no appreciation of what such a worship might mean; we were making no real attempt to be like Christ; we had no sense of union with Him; we gave no thought to our obligation to make others know Him; we made few if any sacrifices for Him; we were niggardly in our support of the work He left us to do; we were merely negative Christians, for the most part holding our church membership as a badge of respectability; we had not begun to understand that the Church was a great brotherhood, we had made it a select club; we were not trying to win the poor, we were losing even the self-respecting middle class, our sympathies were for the most part with people of privilege; we had no conception of Christian service.

Is it any wonder that I felt the call to the ministry, not so much as a mission to the unconverted outside as a summons to convert, arouse, inspire those inside, who were as though they had never heard the things which rang in my ears?

Though one dislikes to throw in the first personal pronoun at the beginning of every sentence, you must bear with me a little. So, then, I ceased to be a layman. As I said, I never stayed long enough to practice what I was going to preach. I left the ranks before I had tried to show what a private could be. It was right that I should, because the call was strong upon me to enter the ministerial priesthood; only, sometimes I am sorry that the call was not delayed until I had sought as a layman to be an evangelist—bringing others to the Church and to its privileges of worship and sacraments—until I had tried to translate my faith into terms of every-day life and show that in the world it is possible to "seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness," that the call of the laity is as real a call as that of the priesthood.

I wonder how I would have succeeded had I not received the ministerial call! Is it presumptuous of me to tell the laity now what they ought to do and be? Well, I have not found it easy to live truly as a priest of the Most High, and so when I set forth an ideal for others the sense of my own unworthiness and my frequent failures in the ministerial office will at least make me conscious that ideals are always difficult to shape into solid reality—I know the task of becoming a good layman is at least as difficult as the effort to be a good priest or a faithful bishop.

On a window in the parish house of the Rogers Memorial Church at Fairhaven, Massachusetts, are the lines:

God, the Creator, doth not sit aloof,
As in a picture painted on a roof,
Occasionally looking down from thence,
He is all nature and all providence.

"Boy's Life," the publication of the Boy Scouts of America, has received a fund of one hundred thousand dollars to be spent on stories written for boys. Confidentially, let us remark that THE CHRISTIAN WORK could use just about that amount of money in securing articles. With that as a working fund it should be possible to increase greatly the value of the paper to the Church and the world.

LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

Missions

NORTHERN NEIGHBORS

By WILFRED T. GRENFELL. Houghton Mifflin Company.
332 pp. $2.00.

Dr. Grenfell's stories are always fascinating and inspiring. They are told in the simple direct narrative of the man of action and they reveal a love of men and a faith in God that is positively contagious. There is an epic quality about these stories. They are full of the "local color" of the sea and the Labrador coast. Schooners and fishing gear, the silent heroism of rough but kindly men, tragedy and comedy, hardy adventure and the slow conflict with invisible forces illuminate the pages. And through it all runs the golden thread of the eternal drama of the soul. With equal sympathy he describes in a few weighty words a crew of "common seamen" making a mighty effort on which hangs the fate of other helpless people or those same seamen sitting in a dingy fo'castle over "a mug of tea" and singing with uncouth heartiness: hymn after hymn. The truth is, he knows his men and loves them.

The present volume contains eighteen stories, a number of which are here reprinted from an earlier volume now out of print. If anyone knows of stories more worthy of preservation and wide circulation than "Off the Rocks," or "Little Prince Pomiuk," or "Sou'west by West," we should like to know of them. Their appeal is universal, their effect is stimulating. Anyone who is a speaker or preacher will find them a real mine of illustration for every sort of genuine religious appeal. Dr. Grenfell is not only a blessing to Labrador and all men of the sea, but to the Church of Christ throughout the world.

AFRICAN IDYLS

pp. 229. $1.50.

There is issuing from the press a number of books on missions addressed to the large but now decreasing public that sees all missionary work through a distorting glass. This is one of the best of these books. Like Miss Jean Mackenzie in "Black Sheep," the author of "African Idyls" leaves his readers impressed with the living reality of all that he describes. The false ideals of missionary work sometimes inculcated by missionary sentimentalists are responsible for much of the popular ignorance on the subject. Such books as this dispel the ignorance and increase the appeal which missions make to every healthy-souled man and woman.

No better introduction to this book could be written than that of Miss Mackenzie. (For to be quite frank, this "review" has no other design than to introduce readers to the book.) She says in part: "This extension of intimate human knowledge is the treasure of a missionary, or in the heart of an inarticulate man it is a hidden treasure. He just cannot tell you what he knows of primitive laughter, of the fears of primitive people and their sorrows, of their humble living and their arrogance, of their need of God and their appropriation of His Word. Many an inarticulate missionary, reading this book, will envy Dr. Fraser his great gifts of expression, for here you may read what the wisest of them would be telling you. Here is the merchant who has traveled far, and he is displaying his pearl—sit down with him by the fire of this little book and he will take it out of his bosom," and then make search for his other book.

A Bulu once taught me a little song he had made in his own tongue; it is about the adventures of the Bulu who have gone among other Bantu tribes as missionaries. And here it is:

"If God finds a straight man,
And sends him to a far country,
He will return with a strange knowledge
Of hills and rivers and forests and gardens."

And for refrain there is this assurance:

"Be at peace!
You must stay into the work that you do!
We see the work that you do!
Be at peace!"

Here are actual pictures of Africans: "Little Meal, the beloved madman"; "Old Bellows, a delightful African gentleman"; Vibisi, the captured slave; Chitimbe, the hunter—graphic portraits of men and events, illustrative of the need and the power of the Gospel. Read them.

Politics

THE WORLD CRISIS

By the RT. HON. WINSTON S. CHURCHILL. Crown octavo;
589 pages. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $6.50.

We took up this handsome volume with keen interest because we assumed that the present "world crisis" was the one described. We confess that our interest sagged considerably when we noticed the sub-head "1911-1915." Books describing the causes and beginning of the Great War have become so numerous, and most of them are so tinged by partisan prejudice or personal interest that our appetite for books of this class has become somewhat jaded. We are weary of the laborious efforts of General X and Admiral Y and Cabinet Minister Z to explain just what he did, to show that he was not really to blame for certain misfortunes, and that he deserves a lot more credit than has been accorded him. In spite of this feeling, however, we did not feel disposed to lay Winston Churchill's book down for we suspected that something worth while had been written by this remarkably brilliant man who, as First Lord of the Admiralty during the critical years under consideration, had exceptional opportunities for securing inside information. Once begun, we found it difficult to stop. The volume is really one of remarkable interest and value. One of the principal factors in the momentous events which preceded the war and which characterized the first year of hostilities has given a graphic account of what occurred. While he is thoroughly and patriotically British and unwaveringly convinced of the justice of his country's cause and course, he is as fair-minded as it is reasonable to expect any participant in those heated days to be. He does not share the conviction of some hysterical people that all Germans were devils and that all the Allies were angels. He was not one of those morbid persons, of whom we have had a fair supply in America, who talked so hysterically that one wondered sometimes whether they dared go to sleep at night without looking under the bed to see whether the Kaiser was concealed there. He writes as an able, conscientious and well informed public man, and of days so stirring in their character and so far-reaching in their significance that the world can never forget them. All of the great figures of European war and diplomacy stand before us in these pages, and so graphic is the narrative that the reader seems to breathe again the air of those turbulent days. A full generation must probably pass before praise and blame for all that occurred can be impartially appraised. But the future historian will undoubtedly find this volume one of his most authoritative original sources. It is one of the very best of the numerous books on the subject that have appeared thus far, a contribution of large value to the literature of the most memorable conflict in the history of mankind.

AS WE SEE IT

By RENE VIVIANI. Harper and Brothers. pp. 314. $3.50.

"As We See It" is Rene Viviani's answer to the Kaiser's Memoirs. Viviani, it will be remembered, was Premier of France at the beginning of the war. The world in general recognized the Kaiser's Memoirs as a piece of special pleading and evasion. Useless at that. We understand the book fell practically still born from the press. Viviani's answer to it is naturally ardent. It consists in large part of quotations of German, Bavarian and Austrian documents made public after the revolution in those countries. These documents pin the responsibility for the war pretty well to the Emperor. They make it very clear that he and the German General Staff were bent on war. When the German Ambassador at Vienna on June 30, 1914, two days after the Sarajevo murder, reported, "I take advantage of every such opportunity for quietly but earnestly discouraging precipitate measures," the Emperor noted down on the margin, "Who told him to do this? It is very foolish. This does not concern him in the least. It is entirely Austria's affair to decide what he is to do." On the thirteenth of July, the Austrian agent reported to his government, "There is nothing to show the complicity of the Serbian government in directing the crime, preparing it, or furnishing arms, nor is such complicity to be presumed; on the contrary, there are signs which would seem to exclude such a hypothesis." So Germany also, of course knew that the Serbian government was innocent. Nevertheless, Germany and Austria persisted in pressing on toward war. On July twenty-eighth, after the Serbians had answered complying with practically all the savage demands of the Austrian government, the Emperor commented in writing, "the humblest sort of capitulation is announced orbi et urbi, which causes all reasons for war to vanish. . . . Of course, there is at present no longer any cause for war." And yet two days later the German authorities refused to transmit to Austria a promise of the Russian Government to stop its military preparations, provided Austria stopped hers against Serbia. Instead, the semi-official "Lokal Anzeiger" of Berlin published that afternoon an order for German mobilization. The German government later insisted that the news of mobilization was false, but it is difficult to see how the "Lokal Anzeiger" ever could have received a copy of the order unless it had been communicated to it by the government. Moreover, the German authorities delayed the dispatches to St. Petersburg denying the news by relaying them via Warsaw. When at last they reached St. Petersburg the news of the German mobilization had done its work. So Viviani piles up the evidence to show the full responsibility of the German government and of William personally for the immediate beginning of the war.

The book consists of a non-complimentary sketch of William's career and of the past predilection of Germany for war, an account of Monsieur Viviani's journey with Monsieur Poincaré to Russia in the middle of July, 1914, and then a detailed account of the action of the various powers from the Sarajevo murders until the war was actually under way. The book, is, of course, valuable on account of its source. It is a pity that it is so repetitious. In some cases we are confronted with the same document three or four times.

One incident which Viviani recalls concerning Roosevelt is pleasant to the American reader. During the first days of August, 1914, an official of the German Embassy at Washington went to Oyster Bay to see the eminent ex-President. Said this official, "By order of His Majesty the German Emperor, I have come here to recall to you that war has been declared. My master hopes that you will remember that you have been his guest."

Roosevelt knew perfectly how to deal with such impudence. "Yes," said he, "my memory is faithful. I remember that I was the guest of His Majesty the Emperor. But I also remember that I was the guest of His Majesty the King of the Belgians." The German official went back to Washington a wiser man than he came.

Fiction

DANGER

By ERNEST POOLE. The Macmillan Company. $2.

"Danger," by Ernest Poole, makes its point with strength and clarity, but with no obvious drawing of morals. It leaves one with a vivid and tragic picture of life after the war, from which one is led to certain definite conclusions.

The tragedy is real enough, and near enough to most of us to touch the deepest springs of pity and of fear, but only a mind that has been irrevocably injured by the war could look at life as Maud does, the woman whose life was sapped by the war so that she could never come back to peace. The rest of us would see things more through the eyes of Natalie and her family. Although she is too young to have really known or felt the war, her love and intention lead her to do the best in her power for the man she loves, who is constantly threatened by the "Danger" of his sister's unbalanced mind, and his own haunting memories. The fact that Maud alone, against all the other characters in the book, brings death and temporary disgrace and despair to all about her, brings home to our minds the suffering that must continue long after a war is over. She is able to do this through the claims of love and self-sacrifice which she exercises over her brother, Dallas, to their full extent. I find Dallas the most interesting character in this powerful book; he has suffered and been down into the valley of shadows, but is struggling back to peace and happiness, only to be finally dragged down to misery and death by the subtle "Danger" represented by his sister. Maud and Natalie contending for Dallas, constitute the real struggle in the book, that of the morbid evil left by the war, against the hope and courage of youth.

Because evil prevails in this story, every one of us will say of the war in our hearts, "It must never be again. It has been a tragic failure. We will find another way."

THE SCARLET Tanager

By J. AUBREY TYSON. The Macmillan Company, New York.

One of the best detective stories of the year. It concerns the methods, supposedly, of the Intelligence Department of the United States Army, one of whose star men is put on the trail of a political murder in Washington. He relies not alone on shrewd deductions, but especially on a magnificent organization, and the flavor is not at all that of a transplanted Sherlock Holmes. When the author, in the last few pages, turns from his story to alarm us about the perils of Bolshevism in America, however, he becomes absurd. The recent pardon by President Harding of political offenders showed the emptiness of that bogey. The Bolshevik scare was part of the war mania. After working injustice on a group of patriotic teachers, clergymen, writers and others, as well as stirring up some poorly-balanced agitators, it is rapidly becoming a memory to laugh at.

THE BIG BLUE SOLDIER

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL. J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. 176 pages. $1.75.

A wholesome, distinctly feminine story of a soldier back from France who falls ill with influenza in a strange village and is nursed back to strength by a kind-hearted, fussy old maid. Of course, the soldier turns out to be extremely wealthy, and of course he marries the girl he meets in her home. The descriptions of the meals she prepares for him remind one of Billy Sunday's famous sermon, where he lists all the good things which Mary, the cook, will have ready for him to eat when he goes back to Winona.

Miscellaneous

THE MYSTICAL QUEST OF CHRIST

By ROBERT F. HORTON, D.D. George H. Doran Company. pp 317. $3.00.

There is a strong tide setting in religious thought to-day toward a certain type of mysticism. This is witnessed both by a number of books on mysticism and also by the new emphasis of preaching in the churches. In part, this is a natural reaction against a ridiculous rationalism, but, we believe, that its chief element is of a more permanent nature: it is based on a far wider and deeper meditation upon God and man and the universe.

The minister of the Congregational church at Hampstead, London, the author of the present volume, shows himself to be a leader in this movement. If we are not mistaken, this book is the result of a religious rebirth, a fresh realization of the sufficiency of Christ. Several times he speaks of the small study circle who set out "to find out what we, we of to-day, really believe, what our religion requires of us, what manner of people we ought to be, what kind of things we ought, in these difficult times, to do." And in one place in a late chapter he describes at some length the questions pressed upon him by Thomson's "Outline of Science" and the difficulties through which he had to find his way owing to the teachings of these books. The volume now before us seems to record the solution reached. And it is indeed a noble solution, satisfying to mind and heart. Encouraging, sympathetic, based on wide reading and observation, the book reveals a personality that is bringing to bear on the whole of life the power of a consecrated personality.

The author divides his work into three parts: "The Rule of Life," "The Christian Decalogue," "The Method." First, he sets down the rule of life as the indwelling of Christ in the life of man both as individual and in social relations. He applies this with apt illustrations to all sorts of life work. Especially interesting are the chapters on "The Profession of Amusement" and on "Illness." Both of these chapters reveal a very profound understanding of the nature of man as a spiritual being.

The second part of the book deals with "The Christian Decalogue," ten laws evolved in the discussions of the study group. "Without further preface," the author declares, "I will write down these ten rules as they emerged from an effort to shape and to correct them. When they are written down and before the reader they may provoke criticism and even arouses resentment, but it will be the object of the following pages to answer the one and to allay the other, and to lead up to the practical conclusion that here we have what Christ is commanding us to be and do in this new generation which is arising out of the grim experience of 1914-18:

"1. We must strive, in accordance with the will of our Heavenly Father, to extend by every means possible the Kingdom of Heaven on earth.

"2. We must try to think of all nations and races as equally dear to God.

"3. We must forgive every injury which has been done to us.

"4. We must act on the teaching of the parable of the Good Samaritan, and must take seriously the precept of Jesus, 'Go thou and do likewise.'

"5. As Christ for our sakes became poor, we should not estimate people by their possessions, but wholly by their character and conduct.

"6. We should strive constantly to be absolutely honest in our every-day dealings, realizing that these are a very important test of our creed.

"7. As Christ blessed the children, we should recognize the sacredness of child life.

"8. Because Christ healed disease, we should use his power to heal disease, and should exert all our influence to secure healthy conditions of life for all.

"9. Convinced that Christ came to establish peace on earth, we should turn all our thought and influence to render war unnecessary and impossible.

"10. Because we have received special talents, we should try to cultivate and to use them in the service of Christ and His Church."

The third part of the book describes the method by which the inner relation between Christ and the soul (which is the foundation of Christian conduct) may be aided. There are chapters on meditation, autosuggestion, "habituation" (as the nearest translation of the Greek word Ethismo), association, mysticism and the evangelical virtues.

Dr. Horton writes appealingly and with the power of strong conviction. His book is full of suggestion for the preacher, his illustrations are diverse and apt. Evidently the foundations of the book have been worked out at the forge of intimate discussion and private meditation and welded on the testing anvil of preaching to a needy world.

HEAVEN AND HELL IN COMPARATIVE RELIGION

(With special reference to Dante's Divine Comedy.) By DR. KAUFMANN KOHLER. The Macmillan Company, 1923. pp. 158+xix. $1.50.

The distinguished President Emeritus of Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, who was one of the editors of the famous Jewish Encyclopedia and who in 1885 called together the Rabbinical Conference in Pittsburgh at which the platform for Reform Judaism in America was adopted, presents a study that is scholarly and timely and interestingly written. Taking in the tencentenary celebration of Dante's death as the occasion he offers a fascinating presentation of the ideas of heaven and hell in all the literatures which have affected western thought. "The Divine Comedy," he declares, "was not merely as Carlyle said, 'the voice of ten centuries,' but the crowning work of millenia voicing in different languages their views of Hell and Heaven, the consummation of the efforts of the ages to espy to mysteries of the hereafter.

In the judgment of the present reviewer the Church and the Synagogue will have to devote much more time in the future than they have done in the immediate past to the thought of heaven and hell; and no more interesting approach to this theme from the historical side can be imagined than the present volume.

Dr. Kohler begins with a brief chapter on "Dante and the Old Testament," pointing out that it is the Old Testament's "fundamental idea, the divine righteousness ruling all life, which permeates the 'Divine Comedy'." In the next chapter he points out the contributions of Babylonian and Egyptian literature. He reminds us that the science of the stars, the divisions of time and space and the main features of the cosmological system down to the time of Copernicus came from Babylon, but that as in the case of the ancient Semitic mind there was no thought of retribution or judgment in the hereafter. The Egyptians he shows were the first to develop the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and in Egypt also the Christian doctrine of the Trinity first arose, which "was due to the great influence that the Osiris myth exerted upon the whole land." From the "Book of the Dead" he offers a very interesting quotation in which the soul or "double" of a man pleads before the bar of final judgment offering declarations of guiltlessness of the forty-two punishable sins. The modern socially-minded man will be interested to note among these declarations: "I have not monopolized food" and "I have not obstructed the water (of the Nile)."

Turning next to Hindu and Persian literature Dr. Kohler relates two of the beautiful Hindu legends of compassion and describes how the Hindu doctrine of transmigration led to a pessimism that naturally ended in Buddha's panacea of Nirvana—"spiritual self-extinction." In contrast to this pessimism he describes Zoroaster's lessons of thrift, purity and law, and finds in the Persian story of Arda Viraf "an exact prototype of Dante's Inferno and Paradise."

In delving with Greek the author shows that in viewing humanity as the end and acme of life the Greeks made their gods in the likeness of man (unlike the Hebrews), and fell into a resigned submission to an inexorable fate to which both men and gods were subject. It was the Eleusinian and Orphic mysteries that first brought home to the people the idea of retribution in after life. The story of Aeneas' visit to Hades, Dr. Kohler declares, is a great improvement on the eleventh book of the Odyssey because of Vergil's acquaintance with Plato and the Orphics.

The next two chapters deal with Gehenna and Paradise in the apocalyptic literatures of the Old and New Testaments. Dr. Kohler points out the great influence on both Synagogue and Church exerted by the apocalyptic literature of the Old Testament rather than the Apocrypha, and stresses the influence of the Essenes who "were the real keepers of the secret lore and the authors of the apocalyptic literature." In the books of Enoch "Gehinnom, the former place of Moloch sacrifices, is designated for the first time in literature as the place of punishment for the wicked, while Sheol is not yet identified with it, as was done afterward in the rabbinical and New Testament writings." Brief descriptions are given of a number of the important Old Testament apocalypses.

In the chapter on the apocalyptic literature of the New Testament Dr. Kohler seems to us to make certain rather unjustified assumptions as, for example, where he speaks of "the personality of Jesus, concerning whom the opinions of scholars differ as widely as do the conflicting records in the gospels"; or again where he declares, "None of the dozen or more passages representing him (Jesus) as having spoken of himself as the Son of Man in the sense of the Messiah, is . . . to be taken as genuine. They merely betray the hand of such Essenic writers as had joined the early Christian movement eager to identify Jesus with their Messianic concept." It is surely a fault of Dr. Kohler's higher criticism to say of the book of Revelation: "The Christian editor not only substituted the lamb for the lion of Judah, and the Christian saints and martyrs for those of the Jewish people, but went so far as to accord to Jesus titles such as 'the first and the last,' 'the Alpha and Omega,' and the praises befitting God alone"; or to describe John the Prebyter as a "declared antagonist of Paulinian Christianity which he places on a level with the idolatrous practises of Balaam and Jezebel." The chapter closes with a contrasted description of the apocalypses of Peter and Paul, including several beautiful episodes therefrom.

In dealing with Rabbinic literature on Gehenna and Paradise Dr. Kohler very appropriately calls attention to its close relation to the New Testament and the common ignorance of it even among the learned. He points out the "essential difference between the rabbinic eschatology and that of the New Testament, in that the latter has been fastened into a firm, dogmatic creed, allowing no dissension, whereas the former was regarded simply as the free expression of individuals allowing for a wide diversity of opinion"; and describes God's mercy in providing the way of repentance to make up for man's inability to measure up to the stern standards of justice so common both to Rabbinic literature and the Apocalyptists. A brief outline of Mohammedan literature emphasizes the sensuousness of this system of eschatology.

The chapter on "Hell, Heaven and Purgatory in Medieval Literature" is perhaps the finest in the book, as it strikes a direct blow at the superstition that calls the Middle Ages the ages of faith. Dr. Kohler declares it would be more correct to call them the "ages of credulity" since education and knowledge, which make for self-reliance were shunned and ignorance and superstition were fostered. He emphasizes the terrific conflict of the period between the carnal and the spiritual, the temporal and the eternal; and relates the story of the development of the idea of Purgatory into a dogma of the Roman Church by Gregory the Great. Evidently Dr. Kohler has a strong revulsion from the atmosphere of torpid emotionalism which was then so common and a considerable disgust for the saints who so facily turned their hatred of sin against sinners and their wrath at the devil against unbelievers. Dante, he points out, had the good fortune to be drawn out of this "into the intellectual sphere of stern philosophy by the great master of scholasticism, Thomas Aquinas."

The final chapter, "The Divine Comedy, in the Light of Modern Thought," is a little disappointing owing to the obviousness of its conclusion. Except for a few sentences it is almost an argument against reading the Divine Comedy. The futility of corporal punishments and sensuous rewards in promoting religion is emphasized. "Genuine religion fears not hell, but wrongdoing and falsehood, and longs not for heaven, but for goodness and righteousness." Dr. Kohler praises Dante for his liberal attitude toward the Jews "at the time when the martyr race was made the target of contumely and scorn, the victim of persecution over all the lands," but he bewails the church dogma which shut the gate of salvation to those doomed by their "unbelief." He pleads for a recovery from the religious spirit which pervades Dante's great poem—"the spirit of faith, the yearning for the living God."

"We are passing among severe tests and trials from the former religion of servility and blind authority-worship to one of independent teaching and free manhood, yet while the rod of infernal chastisement and the enticement of paradisaical bliss have lost their power and influence upon us, the fear of God has likewise been dropped from the heart, and with it also heedfulness to the call of duty." To recover these is the task of the present age in Church and Synagogue. This book helps to make the issue clearer before us.

WHAT IT MEANS TO BE A CHRISTIAN

By EDWARD INCREASE BOSWORTH. Pilgrim Press, Boston. pp. 94. $1.25.

This is not a book based on theory, but on experiences "in many classroom discussions, open forums and personal conversations." It is a handbook, avowedly compact in statement, to put in the hands of those beginning the Christian life. Written in simple and popular style and illuminated with the mellow sympathy of the New Testament professor at Oberlin, it will prove a valuable aid to every minister who is trying honestly to persuade men to decide for themselves to become Christians.

Dr. Bosworth begins with four statements which are amplified throughout the remaining pages of the book:

"1. To become a Christian is to begin a certain wonderful way of living that men will be glad to continue always, even into the far ages.

"2. In this way of living there is a glad and growing awareness of working with the unseen energy that we call the will of God to create a good world—a good world here and now, and, after the incident of death, a good super-world called heaven.

"3. Such a good world is one in which all kinds of men work well together; that is, do all kinds of work with a common end in view and an invincible good-will in their hearts. It is a growing power to work in sincerity and friendliness with all other men.

"4. It is a life which utilizes all the incentives to such work that God has been pouring, and still is pouring, into the life of man through the personality of Jesus Christ. For this reason it is called the Christian life."

All these issues are taken up in answer to questions obviously asked by men and women with whom the author has talked. "Can the existence of God be proved?" "Does God give attention to details?" "What passes from the life of God into the life of a praying man?" "What does the suffering of Jesus mean to us?" "What becomes of a persistently bad man?" "Why should we expect a future life?" Of course such questions can only receive skeleton answers in so brief a book, but if a man will fill out the framework with his own thought he will be richly rewarded in studying both questions and answers.

One chapter deals with a list of eight objections to beginning the Christian life, every one of which is sickeningly familiar to ministers, i.e., "I cannot succeed in business and be a Christian"; "I shall be all right if I do the best I can"; "Christianity may not be the ultimate religion," etc., ad nauseam. To each of these a brief reply is made which requires to be filled out with meditation.

The whole book is of the primer style. If a minister puts this book in the hands of the doubtful, indifferent, obstinate or ignorant adult and persuades him to read it he will prepare the way for those personal talks on an intelligent basis which ought to lead to personal Christian decision.

SKYLINES

By HALFORD E. LUCCOCK. Abingdon Press. New York. $1.25.

Halford Luccock is one of the secretaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church's promotion agency, but is evidently predestined for the editorial chair. His uncle is a well-known Presbyterian minister and his father was a Methodist bishop. A great reader, he knows what people are thinking and talking about, and he can, if need be, "whirl a wicked sling-shot" in the cause of righteousness, for example, in handling H. L. Mencken. Few ministers would care for that rencontre. He has humor, experience and common sense, and all he writes is interesting. A few of these fourteen papers have already appeared in magazines. One of the best of the essays in the book is entitled "Cook's Tours," in which he tells of the Captain James Cook and the ship "Resolution and Adventure." "Sometimes," he says, "reciting the creed is the great adventure it ought to be, and trembling lips repeat 'I believe in the life everlasting' as a daring mariner in the days of discovery rounded a cape in the teeth of a gale. Such an affirmation of faith is an experience like Magellan's plowing through the lonely and limitless Pacific ninety days without sight of land." The papers suggest Prof. E. A. Ross in their style and aptness. Often they bring the corrective of good sense to some overdone tendencies of our time.

THE GOD OF THE UNEXPECTED

By CHARLES F. WISHART. The College of Wooster Press. pp. 216. $1.75. (For sale by Presbyterian book stores everywhere.)

The Moderator of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. is one of the strongest preachers of the present day. His style is vigorous and convincing, his illustrations are drawn from wide sources and are aptly used, and they are illustrations and not interruptions or points of departure from his main theme.

Fifteen sermons on a wide range of topics are included in this book and they are all well worth reading, for the sermons of Dr. Wishart bear reading and meditation as well as listening to. The first two sermons dealing with the question of miracles are especially valuable in the present day. Unless we are greatly mistaken they are a very important contribution to a solution of modern confusion of thought on the subject. Dr. Wishart has the all too rare gift of thinking a problem through. He knows the meaning of faith, and he is quite unafraid to meet difficult issues. Another fine contribution to the needs of our day is the sermon on "Prayer and Efficiency." Speaking of the religious view of the world as spiritual and not mechanical, he says: "In that light it would be as futile and foolish to deprecate prayer as an interference with the uniformity of law as it would be to deprecate the planting of our crops, the lighting of a fire in the grate, or the unloosing of the electric energy that moves the trolley car or lights the building. Prayer is only a great spiritual cause which we can use, if we will, to produce results."

The simple, direct, powerful preaching illustrated in this volume is both a comfort and an inspiration.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF DAVID CROCKETT

With an introduction by HAMLIN GARLAND. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.00. pp. 328.

This is one of Scribner's Modern Students' Library. It is the first reprinting of the original Crockett books since 1859. No one who wants to know the America of three generations ago can afford to be unfamiliar with David Crockett. The book is full of the humorous tang of our great-grandfather's days. It is an ideal book for reading aloud.

Religious Education

ORGANIZING THE CHURCH SCHOOL

By HENRY FREDERICK COPE. George H. Doran Company. 255 pp. $1.75.

The Church is notably poorer for the death of Dr. Cope in August soon after the publication of this book. No one has done more to raise the standards of Sunday-school teaching and organization in America than he. The English system of advanced education provides scantily for the student of moderate means who does not go to the great universities like Oxford and Cambridge, and like many another strong preacher in America to-day, Cope came to this country as a young man without a college degree. Later on he took time to graduate from Ripon, and both Oberlin and Washburn gave him honorary degrees. After several years in the Baptist ministry the newly formed Religious Education Association called him in 1905, and two years later he became its general secretary. He edited the epoch-making "Religious Education" magazine for seventeen years. In that time he saw methods change completely, and the fourth revolution in the thinking of the Church, following those in philosophy, Bible study and social attitude, work itself out. Dr. Cope remarked that a sign of the changes of these years could be found in the great contrast between the ideas of his so-called radical book of 1907 ("The Modern Sunday-School") and this book, setting forth the ripe ideas of his maturity.

This book will no doubt be the standard on organization for religious education for some years to come, if a standard is possible so soon after a momentous change. The point of view is definitely the social theory of Professor Coe. We must put such surroundings around the child as to help him to grow up in the organization and practice of good-will and love, and never to have a doubt that it will work. But here is no theoretical book; it describes in detail the ideal church school, so that a pastor or superintendent may quickly find guidance and stimulation. There are great chapters on the work of each of the usual departments. (The Boys' Department he says has been disastrous usually, where successful, cutting through the school and destroying the departmental organization.) There is no other book on organization nearly so valuable.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

LET'S PLAY

By EDNA GEISTER. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25.

A third book of indoor and outdoor games by the country's leading expert in that field. Church workers, parents, hostesses, all who have to do with children's play, will find it immensely valuable. The book, "Ice-Breakers," on which Miss Geister won her reputation, was about young people's games; this is about children's play. There are devices for special occasions (Valentine's Day, for example), and there are many hints for picnics.

CHURCH WORK WITH JUNIORS

By MEME BROCKWAY. Judson Press, Philadelphia. $1.00.

Miss Brockway is a secretary of the Baptist Publication Society, in which she is director of children's work. This little book of 176 pages, pocket size, is modern in its pedagogy, progressive in its attitude towards the church school, and graphic, concrete and interesting in its presentation of its points. It is one of the best, if not the best, of the handbooks for workers with and teachers of juniors which have come out in recent years. "Mrs. Mother" is her spokesman, suggesting at the church prayer meeting, "Why not have the junior group function as a junior department at the church school hour; as a junior society either on Sunday afternoon or on a week-day morning or afternoon, if we desire, as I hope we shall, a week-day session; as a mission band and as a temperance band once a month at the junior society hour? Thus Bible and missionary instruction, worship, social activities, community service, dramatization, handwork, Bible memory work, church hymnology, geographical drills, could all be offered to the entire group—not to small, separate and competing fragments. . . . I would substitute a church credit system in which attendance and successful work in all of these different sessions would alone bring full honors."

THE MAY BYRON BOOKS FOR CHILDREN

The George H. Doran Company, New York.

Four books for children beginning to enjoy pictures. each book with half a dozen large colored drawings, all in good taste, and many smaller black and white ones. One book is about a bear, another about a rooster, another about a duck and another about a terrier. Several pages of more or less melodious verse relating to experiences the little child understands accompany the pictures. Each book costs seventy-five cents. Children enjoy them, which is the test.

MORE SHORT MISSIONARY PLAYS

By MARGARET T. APPELGARTH. George H. Doran Company. $1 each volume.

Miss Applegarth is well known for her missionary work in the Home Base Church. Her many volumes have strengthened missionary interest and understanding, especially among children and young people. In these volumes she seeks to do, especially for boys and girls and young people, what sermons and addresses frequently cannot do; to make the missionary problem real and concrete. The "plays" are extremely simple in character, not greatly dependent on acting skill, nor at all on elaborate staging or costuming. Of course good acting will help, but the message of each play is clear. There are plays concerning Japan, India (2), China (2), Spanish-American, concerning immigration to America, Negroes, and on Medical Missions (2), in the first volume. The second volume contains plays on Christians (2), and Easter and on a call to service (3), and on raising money and selling missionary literature, etc., in the church. The same introduction in each volume gives valuable hints as to costumes.

Some Recent Books on the Bible

HERE AND THERE AMONG THE PAPYRI

By GEORGE MILLIGAN, D.D. George H. Doran Company, New York. $2.

"Here and There Among the Papyri" is a unique and original book and will be of great interest to students of the New Testament. It not only deals with the recent archeological discoveries and with the countless papyrus documents which have been recovered from the sands of Egypt, but it goes into the history of papyrus as a writing material and tells the story of those from which the New Testament text were copied. There are also several accounts of Christian documents outside of the New Testament which were first written upon papyrus. It is a book every student of the New Testament will want in his library.

THE LOCAL COLOR OF THE BIBLE

By CHARLES W. BUDDEN, M.D., and the REV. EDWARD HASTINGS, M.A. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $3.

This volume has as its object the illumination of the text of the Bible by facts dealing with the manners and customs of the book, and by a certain amount of geography and history. The whole Bible is to be dealt with in three volumes, the first volume from Genesis to 2d Samuel, which is the one which has just appeared. Volume 2 will complete the Old Testament and Volume 3 will deal with the New Testament. Both of the authors of this book have lived in the East and are thoroughly conversant, not only with the customs of Bible times, but with those of the Syria of to-day. The whole book illumines the text of the Bible and makes it more real in every way.

HILLTOPS IN GALILEE

By HAROLD SPEAKMAN. The Abingdon Press, New York. $3.

This is a story of experiences in Galilee with eight paintings in color by the author. It is very graphically written and while it deals with Palestine of to-day, yet so little have customs and manners changed, so is the temperament of the inhabitants to-day like those of olden times we might almost think that he was writing a story of Bible times. Some of the personalities described in the story are exceedingly interesting.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

In the Revised Version with Introduction and Commentary by A. W. F. BLUNT, B.D., Oxford University Press, American Branch, New York. $1.50.

This is a new volume in The Clarendon Bible which is well known to all our readers. Not only do we have here the Acts in the revised version and the valuable introduction by Dr. Blunt with his commentary, but page after page of illustration. Dr. Blunt is not only one of the best known of the Biblical scholars, but one of the most interesting writers. The book is in handy form and is a delight to the eye as well as to the mind. There is also a valuable chapter on Christianity and the Hellenistic World.

A SOURCE BOOK FOR THE STUDY OF THE TEACHING OF JESUS, IN ITS HISTORICAL RELATIONSHIPS

By ERNEST DEWITT BURTON. University of Chicago Press. $2.

This is a thorough examination of the teachings of Jesus as recorded in the Gospels and is valuable for that alone, but it falls into a new class of books dealing with these teachings inasmuch as it gives also for purposes of comparison the teachings of his contemporaries. The uniqueness of Jesus's teaching is very decidedly brought out in this way. Professor Burton has also translated the passages into modern English which is, after all, the best method of commentary.

THE GOD OF THE BIBLE

By R. A. TORREY. George H. Doran Company. $1.50.

Dr. Torrey has gone through the Bible very carefully (in fact he has been doing that all his life), and given us in this volume the conception of God as found in the Old and New Testament. The attributes of God which are thus emphasized are as follows: He is a Personal God; God is Spirit; There is only One God; God is Everywhere; God is Omnipotent and Omniscient and Holy; God is Love and He is Righteous; He is faithful to the end. Dr. Torrey in his title indicates that he has tried to portray the God of the Bible as distinguished from the God of "Christian Science" the God of "New Thought", the God of Spiritualism, the God of "Theosophy," etc.

THE BIBLE FOR SCHOOL AND HOME

By REV. J. PATERSON SMYTH. George H. Doran Company. $1.25.

This is the sixth volume in this series and deals with the second part of the Gospel story from the close of the Galilean ministry to the Ascension. This, with the first part really makes a two-volume life of Christ by the author of "How We Got Our Bible," which is familiar to all students of the Bible. This is a very helpful little book for teachers, superintendents and Bible classes. It has questions also following each lesson.

AT HOME IN THE BIBLE

By T. H. DARLOW, M.A. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Dr. Barlow has for twenty-five years been the Literary Superintendent of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In the monthly organ of this Society "The Bible in the World" during all this period, there have been meditations upon the Scripture by Dr. Darlow. They are now gathered together in this volume of 325 pages. Dr. J. D. Jones, of England, characterize it well when he says, "that it shows how deep a well the Bible is." This book deals with the great and central things of the Gospel and for one who would like to take a daily peep into the greatest of all books, it is a very valuable aid.

A YEAR IN JOHN'S GOSPEL

By ANNIE RICHARDSON KENNEDY. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $2.

This is a book of devotional studies for every day in the year. Each page of the book contains a selection from the fourth Gospel, a brief meditation thereon and a short prayer for each day. Miss Kennedy's comment is illuminating and the prayers are of a very tender and devotional spirit.

BIBLE STORIES FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

By SARAH ELIZABETH DAWES. Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. $2.50.

Every year brings us a new volume of the Bible done into stories for young people. Of course there are some of us who think that no one has yet improved upon the original language of the King James Version for Children, but as these adaptations go this one of Miss Dawes is among the best. It has twelve beautiful paintings and covers both the Old and the New Testament. It is a handsome volume printed in large type on good paper and put into the hands of the young might well lead them to the original text itself.

A STUDY OF GENESIS AND EXODUS

By ROLLIN H. WALKER. The Methodist Book Concern. $1.

This is another volume in a series of handbooks for Bible classes and private study by Mr. Walker and is unique in that it leads to thorough and careful study of the Biblical text by putting the student to work answering the many questions. Thus by the process of research he gets to the heart of the Biblical message. There is an introduction which deals with Genesis and Exodus as a background for the life of Jesus.

PEARLS FROM PATMOS

By J. J. ROSS, D.D. Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.50.

This is a devotional study of the symbols in the first chapter of the book of the Revelation. One always picks up any book on this great poem with fear and trembling. Nothing has ever seemed to arouse all the vagaries of the human mind the way the Revelation has, but here we have a sane and spiritual interpretation of those wonderful letters to the seven churches. The unique feature is the interpretation of the symbolism in its universal aspect. Through the right interpretation of these symbols we see that God is God of all the earth and of all peoples and of all times. Here also we have set forth the final stages of God with humanity.

THE HIGHER CRITICISM IN RELATION TO THE PENTATEUCH

By EDOUARD NAVILLE, D.C.L., LL.D. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

This is a book which deserves very thorough and careful reading. It is the apology of one of the great conservative Biblical scholars for his point of view. It is in answer to a pamphlet by Professor Humber of Neuchatel, in which he combated the Orthodox views concerning the authorship of the Pentateuch. Dr. Naville devotes 150 pages of this book to a vindication of the Mosaic authorship against the view held by the higher critics. He contends that higher criticism violates all historical principles—principles which apply to all ancient documents whether they be Greek or Hebrew. Higher criticism has based its conclusions mainly on philology and language, but it is to the historians and to common sense that we must ultimately turn for our conclusions. He does not underrate the value of the linguistic element, but it is only a small part of those foundations on which the understanding of the Pentateuch must be built up. His conclusion is that as regards the Old Testament, the general principles of the historical method which rule the study of all ancient monuments are moved and more to be applied in opposition to those of Higher Criticism, and this is what he has endeavored to do in this book.

BIBLE PRIMER FOR FOREIGNERS

By FRANCES B. LOVELESS. Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia. $1.

This is a selection of chapters from the Old and New Testament put into the very simplest English, the English which would be used for children. There is a wood cut with each chapter. In the same series Miss Loveless has published "Bible Stories for Foreigners," this particular volume dealing with the Pentateuch. These stories are also in the simplest language possible.

WONDERFUL BIBLE CONVERSIONS

By LOUIS ALBERT BANKS. Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.50.

In this book Dr. Banks retells the New Testament accounts of the outstanding incidents of conversion which occurred during the earthly life and ministry of our Lord. Dr. Banks' chief characteristic has always been his power of vivid portrayal of personality. He makes these incidents fairly live! He also relates modern Christian experiences.

Is It Nothing to America?

By Rev. Samuel McCrea Cavert

Secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America

IT PASSES comprehension that anyone who sees the situation in Europe at first-hand to-day, and who at the same time believes in the Christian Gospel, should advocate for America a policy of aloofness. It is no figure of speech to say that the Continent of Europe is threatened with the eclipse of its civilization. That Germany will be swept by a Bolshevik revolution before the winter, unless some accord on reparations can be found, is the well-nigh unanimous judgment of the most trustworthy American residents there. The meteoric fall of the mark can only mean utter catastrophe. On July 23, when our ship reached Hamburg, the mark stood at one million two hundred thousand to the dollar; when I was there at the end of August it was around ten million to the dollar; when I reached New York again on September 15 it was seventy million. All this within eight weeks! Such a situation seems a joke to the American tourist, but means hunger and despair for the great rank and file of the middle classes.

And revolution, when it comes, may not stop at national boundaries. The whole continent of Europe may be engulfed unless some relief be quickly found. If a chaotic Europe is the result, will it have no effect on America? Will there then be no "entanglements" to face?

What, then, is America to do? It is easy to say that Europe has brought the disaster on herself and must "fry in her own fat." Such an attitude is not only un-Christian, it is also short-sighted and impracticable. The world to-day is too much one, the nations are too interdependent economically, for one nation to prosper long while another suffers. Some day we will awake to the fact that so long as Europe cannot buy our surplus products there will be no full prosperity for American agriculture and business. The Church's concern, however, lies far deeper than loss of American business. It is that America should not lose her soul! To stand aloof through selfish indifference would mean for us a spiritual wreckage worse than any physical disaster that Europe faces.

The plain fact now seems to be that there is no real solution of the reparations issue until the United States is willing to consider adjustments in the interallied debts, which demands from America a spirit of sacrifice. No other conclusion is possible when one realizes that the indebtedness of the Allies to America to-day is almost as great as the total amount which, in the judgment of the best economists, Germany is able to pay. American people should cease from acrimonious criticism of either France or Germany and direct their attention to their own attitude. France insists that she must have from Germany at least enough to defray the cost of rebuilding the devastated regions and to repay her debts to the United States and England. The justice of that claim no one can deny. England declares that she must receive from either France or Germany enough to pay her debt to the United States and that she will sacrifice the rest. What then? The solution lies largely in our hands, as the richest creditor nation. What right have we to demand that France make concessions to Germany when we are ourselves unwilling to make concessions to France?

It is not a question as to whether we are to become involved in the European tangle or not; we are involved already. We cannot avoid the issue by hiding our face in the sand. If we take an inflexible attitude toward the debts, insisting Shylock-wise on our pound of flesh, we may indirectly be forcing the ruin of Germany, which God forbid!

If the United States would say clearly and unequivocally to the nations of Europe, "In the interest of world peace and reconstruction we are ready to sit down with you around the table and reopen the whole question of indebtedness as well as reparations," a new light would shine into the present darkness. Until we are ready to do that, what right has America to play the part of the Pharisee? She would do better not to be saying, "I thank Thee I am not as other nations are," but to examine her own attitude and say, "God be merciful to me, a sinner."

The more one studies the situation the more he is forced to the conclusion that a generous and sacrificial spirit on the part of America is an indispensable requisite for a real solution. Here, then, is a direct duty of the Church. It has always declared that a spirit of unselfishness, of readiness for sacrifice, lies at the heart of the Christian way of life. To whom may we look to cultivate that attitude in our international policy if not to the Church?

World-Wide Prohibition---World-Wide Temperance Sunday

PSALMS 101:5-8; PROVERBS 23:29-35.

"I will set no base thing before mine eyes."—Psalms 101:3.

NEGATIONS have a great part to play in the production of character. We know that the great positive acts are the chief factor in developing life, but one grows by strong refusals as well as by noble acceptances. The door of the soul is to be flung wide open to good influences, but it is likewise to be resolutely shut to the bad. If need be, let the door be locked and bolted until the enemy has gone.

The 101st Psalm begins with fine expressions of positive purpose: "I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way;" "I will walk within my house with a perfect heart." There quickly follows the other mood of prohibition: "I will set no base thing before mine eyes." So it goes in the struggle of life. Along with Christ's two great commands, beginning "Thou shalt," there must run also the great code of the Old Testament with its declarations of "Thou shalt not."

A man is known by many signs. One of them is by the things he will not do. A reputation earned by a consistent course of refusals to certain invitations and proposals is worth more than gold as capital in the life of young men and women. When the hungry horde of hardened old exploiters is trying to size up and allure newcomers in business, politics and society nothing gives quite so much protection as a good round "No." It affects the ruthless as holy water affected Mephistopheles in "Faust." They slink away. This does not take the place of a fight when a struggle is forced, but it does lessen the contests to a few great encounters, with all the chances in favor of the tempted.

In our country, "temperance" has now become synonymous for prohibition in the struggle against those who seek license to sell intoxicating liquors. At present it is a big and belligerent prohibition, not a scant and timid one. Not only shall they not sell intoxicants, but they shall not sell beverages which are anywhere near intoxicating. The full, frowning front of outraged sentiment is turned against the liquor traffic. Drinks which are in themselves relatively harmless are forbidden because their sale would make violations of a less rigid law comparatively easy. We are as a people set against strong drink as a base thing. We will not set it, or any form of it, before our eyes.

This may prove to be an instance with which the world war struggling made us familiar, of having gained more trenches than we can hold, but that remains to be seen. The mood of the American people at present is not merely to keep the camel's head out of the tent; he is not allowed to put in so much as a front hoof.

It goes without saying that there is a big contest ahead with those who, while not allied with the liquor interests, prefer to say "No" in a mild-mannered tone. But manhood and womanhood have suffered so much from the base traffic that there will be a battle royal.

Meantime two lines of policy are commended to all who are willing to bear a part in this strife.

1. Prohibition as a general policy, if not to the absolute degree now enacted here, should be provided in other countries. America has found that national prohibition was essential to any large enforcement of the policy in separate States. The nations are so closely bound together by swift communication that our country will always suffer from the liquor-selling customs of our neighbors, north and south. Prohibition propaganda for other countries is a service to them and a protection to us. Rome carried the war into Africa to safeguard its empire. We cannot go on our present way with no increase of prohibition sentiment abroad. The world is too small long to continue part prohibition and part open saloon. It may be, as often declared, that in our climate and with our racial problems intoxicating liquors have a more baleful influence than in other lands. But the liquor traffic is everywhere a blight and usually a curse to the people who legalize it. It is the part of friendly service to agitate in other countries in all proper ways for the dethronement of the distillers and for the suppression of the saloon-keepers.

Europe thinks of our country as having a great advantage over them because the World War did not ravage our territory, nor destroy our sons by the million, and this is true. But an economic advantage, now almost as great for us, and in the near future found to be greater, is the relative freedom from the economic waste occasioned by the liquor traffic which this country enjoys. Prohibition, if we live up to it, will put, and securely keep, our country at the head of the nations in our power of production and in the accumulation of per capita wealth. In seeking, therefore, to promote prohibition in Europe we are reducing our economic advantage for the sake of something vastly better and greater—the development and security of the common happiness of mankind. No nation liveth to itself.

2. Prohibition as a general policy cannot be maintained in the United States unless there is a large increase in the number of those who are prohibitionists in personal practice. The shock troops of long-time fighters against the liquor interests, backed up by great reserve divisions of total abstainers, have carried the day so far as legislation goes. There was no standing against the onslaught. But we cannot rest here. Earnest advocacy of total abstinence must go on. Men who have been moderate drinkers, or occasional drinkers, must be won to abstinence. Many such citizens now violate the law in spirit or letter, or both. Their influence is pernicious. They are undermining respect for law.

How valuable is the Sunday School Hour?

ISN'T it so that its value depends on the interest and attention of the pupils. You know how hard you have worked to hold the attention of a class, in the distractions of a general assembly. And how hard every teacher has to work to do the same.

In fairness to the pupils, in fairness to the teachers, every church should be equipped with separate classrooms. Wilson Rolling and Sectionfold partitions turn one room into many or many into one, and make the Sunday School hour one of quiet attention.

At any time one of us would be glad to talk to one of you about the other advantages of Wilson partitions. Or we will send you a booklet now that will interest you.

They are in the ranks of those who march with the red flag and the bomb. They are sowing to the whirlwind.

Agitation to repeal a law is one thing, but violation of it to show one's distaste for it is the tactics of anarchy. Many heretofore law-abiding people have become part and parcel of the so-called "dangerous classes." Indeed, the respectable recalcitrant towards prohibition is unwittingly creating a new menace to the Republic. By his speech and by his example he is as one throwing firebrands to the mob. Some day he will find his own property set afire by those whom he has incited to a disregard of laws.

It may be true that a minority of the people are total abstainers. It cannot remain true without our country slipping back to the point where a great deal of ground must be fought over again. A good deal will depend upon the attitude of female voters. It is perhaps too early to say that women are, and will remain overwhelmingly in favor of prohibition. There is reason to hope that this is the fact. But an earnest and unceasing propaganda for law enforcement, and for conversion to the national policy of prohibition must go forward. Pulpit and press, chambers of commerce and women's clubs must speak out for total abstinence.

In addition to those who say "No" because they have personal reasons to hate intoxicants there must be an increasing multitude among us who advance to Saint Paul's position respecting the welfare of the weak brother. Let them hold their right in all good conscience to partake liquors in moderation, with its risks to themselves and others, if they feel bound to do so, but let them also, in the greatness of the apostle's injunction to the advocates of personal liberty of his day, "take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumblingblock to them that are weak." We need to have tens of thousands of Christian people, not now total abstainers, rise up in a fine public spirit, touched by compassion for those who have been debauched by strong drink, and declare: If intoxicants make my brother to offend, I will drink no more while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

The legalized sale of intoxicants, the permission by the public for men to trade on other men's passion for drink, is a moral offense. We have said "No" to this business. We must continue to say "No," and we must encourage other nations to say "No."

For all the pleasure wine and beer and strong drink have given to the sons of men, there has been a thousandfold greater toll of misery. ON THE INTERPRETATION OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I have read THE CHRISTIAN WORK for forty years regularly and thoroughly with enjoyment and profit. But the series of articles by Rev. F. E. Johnson on "An Interpretation of the Labor Movement" detracts from the excellence of your paper. The articles seem as propaganda in behalf of labor whether right or wrong. For instance (issue of September 1, page 273), it is asked, "Are we ready to recognize a job as the equivalent of property?" implying that it is; but it is plain that when a man declines to work on the agreed wages, he throws up his job and "his property" therein vanishes like mist before the rising sun. The professor whose criticism was condemned was right. A man cannot throw away his cake and eat it too. Again (issue of September 15, page 329), the justification of limitation of output, or doing less work than the eight-hour day and the wages paid would regularly produce, is decidedly wrong. There is no parallel between such dishonest conduct and the limitation of production by the employer when his goods are a glut in the market, as is assumed. But enough fine articles have appeared in the series.

the "Commission on International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council of the Churches in America." He quotes part of a report by Mr. Fred B. Smith, which was printed in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, issue of September 23, 1922.

But it is time I should introduce myself. I am a Swiss missionary of the Mission Suisse Romande, whose headquarters are in Lausanne, Switzerland. I have been working for the Lord among the black people of Southeast Africa—especially Portuguese—for half a century and over.

Well, I am glad to learn that in America the "Church leaders" are many who endeavor to bring about a true peace in the world. I am in full sympathy with them, and I do hope they may be able some day to see their efforts successful.

In a paragraph of "The South African Outlook" it is said that one way to abolish war would be "that all nations should repent together of their commercial selfishness and so remove the cause of war." (Quoted by Mr. Allen from "The Churchman," of New York.)

This is quite right, I believe. Moreover, I believe that, if America was to be the first "to repent of her commercial selfishness," she would be in a position to at once remove the cause of war, or at least to help a great way in that direction. Here is the practical means in her hand. The banks' cellars in New York are full to overflowing of the gold accumulated from all parts of the world, more especially from Europe—gold which represents America's own profits on the war. That huge amount of riches is lying idle. Worse than that, it is a burden upon America. If she only lent a part of that gold to Europe, more precisely to Germany, she could at once pay off to Belgium and France their legitimate claims, and, by the same act, liberate Germany of the onus she brought upon herself. By the same act again America would have the advantage to deliver herself of the burden which is somewhat hindering her own commerce. Better still, she would be the one to take the lead toward establishing the peace of the world.

At a Christian point of view I feel rather much concerned about this matter. It preys upon my mind. I have much love and respect for my American brethren. I feel most happy to see that they are trying to bestir their churches in favor of "International Justice and Goodwill."

But I would like them not to do it by words only, but to do it by valuable deeds. I am afraid the time might come when the Lord would call America to account and say to her, "What have you done with my gold? . . . Where is your brother?"

I hope I have made it clear that I rejoice and fully sympathize with this American endeavor, as represented by the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill. May God speed it!

A TEXT AD PUEREM

Mother had not been able to go to church that day, so at dinner she questioned the children about the service.

"Gordon," said she, "what was the minister's text?"

"Launch out into the deep and wash your neck," was the answer.

"Oh, no," insisted mother. "He could not have said that. It must have been 'Launch out into the deep and let down your net.'"

"Well," said Gordon, "if you'd been told to wash your neck as much as I have, you'd have heard it that way."

At any rate, the sermon was not wasted. Six months later Gordon's mother reported to the pastor that he had never preached a more effective sermon to her soul than that Sunday when she was absent. She had never had to tell him to wash his neck since.

THE VALUE OF AN EDUCATION

"It has been my fortune for twenty-five years, as attorney, as counsel, as business associate in many enterprises, to become intimately acquainted with hundreds of men who, without any equipment of education, have accumulated millions of dollars. I never met with anyone of them whose regret was not profound and deep that he had not an education. I never met one of them who did not lament either the neglect of his parents or his own poor opportunities that failed to give him the equipment. I never met one of them who did not feel in the presence of cultured people a certain sense of mortification which no money paid for. I never met one of them who was not prepared to sacrifice his whole fortune that his boy should never feel that mortification."—Chauncey M. Depew

REASONS FOR FAMILY WORSHIP

1. The family is the smallest, the most compact, and the most intimate social group. If there is to be any social worship of God, if persons are to express their adoration, love and trust toward God by social groups, then it is most natural and necessary that they should do so by families.

2. A family exists for the nurture of children. The chief responsibility and the chief joy of the Christian family is the Christian nurture of its children. How can this Christian nurture proceed if it does not have in it the essential element of worship?

3. Family worship as a source, and as the consummation, of a Christian family life tends to perpetuate itself. A goodly heritage is precious not only in itself but also because it perpetuates itself through many generations.

4. Life in the family is a preparation and a training for life in the larger social groups. The virtues which the children learn in the Christian family are the virtues which when practised in the larger social groups will further the Kingdom of God.

5. It would also help start some boys toward the ministry.—Harold McA. Robinson and The Auburn Seminary "Chapel Bell."

The International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association conducts an Industrial Motion Picture Bureau which provides a service of industrial, health, scenic and similar films. The only charge in connection with the service is for transportation. The bureau, according to Young Men's Christian Association officials, is now the largest distributor of non-theatrical films. It lists some three hundred films. They run from "The Adventures of Mazola" to "Our Presidents," or a "Trip Up Mt. Lowe." In running over the list the eye lights on "Devastation in Northern France," or the United States Steel Corporation's devices for "Mosquito and Fly Control," or the famous "Chazy School" of northern New York. For further information and for a list of the films, address the Motion Picture Bureau, Industrial Department, International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, 347 Madison avenue, New York City.

FROM THE CHURCH VISITOR'S LETTER

"On one of my visits this month I found a young man of eighteen years, crippled with swollen feet and abdomen from a serious cardiac trouble. From hospital to sanitarium, back to the poorest kind of a tenement; a recurrence and the cycle again, for the past three years is his story. He cannot lie down. I searched for and bought him a second-hand Morris chair and each week have taken him a package of magazines. He takes pathetic pleasure in a dollar radio set and is interested in looking

A WARNING

The "Auburn Chapel Bell" tells the story of a Sunday school teacher who was very popular because he told his class such lovely stories. After he left for some reason one of his scholars remarked, "Yes, his stories were good and beautiful, but they were like postage stamps without any 'gum-stickum' on them. They would not stick."

A HIGH STANDARD OF LIVING

What is a "high standard of living"? One of the delegates to the recent conference of the Fellowship of Reconciliation came home with this definition:

"A high standard of living is not one which includes large expenditures for food, clothing and rent, but moderate expenditures for these things and more spent on music, art and other cultural activities." The same delegate goes on: "A highly cultured society is not one in which a few fortunate ones have large private libraries, magnificent private art galleries and extensive private parks, while the masses have none of these opportunities for the higher life. 'Destroyed by a million dollars' is a frequent story of those whose souls shrivel while their pockets bulge."

LLOYD GEORGE IN AMERICA

The War Premier of Great Britain, now in his own words "just a plain European," arrived in New York last week for a visit to this country and Canada. The popular demonstration at his arrival could scarcely be matched since the end of the war. The advocates of an Irish Republic, to be sure, attempted to make themselves disagreeable, and even went so far as to throw bad eggs at his car when he left the theater on the first night of his stay in New York. But the general welcome to Lloyd George was from the heart. However clearly we may recognize that Lloyd George, in order to win the elections of 1918, made promises of forcing Germany to pay which apparently he did not himself believe could be carried out, and so added to the difficulties of making a fair peace, nevertheless we must remember that he has a long record of accomplishments in the way of making economic and political life fairer for the under dog in Great Britain. In the single important speech which he made in his one day in New York as guest of the Board of Directors of the United Press Association, he spoke in behalf of world unity. "The real trouble," he said, "is that where we were units in the war, we are not in peace. You are going your way and we are going our way; France is going her way; and Italy is going her way. It is not that you are separated from the rest of us. The rest of us are divided. There is no common purpose, or if there is a common purpose, there is no common method in pursuing it." Perhaps Lloyd George was stretching the case a little in order to be kind to us Americans, but certainly he spoke the truth when in the same speech he said that if we were united the problems confronting us would be difficult, but we could solve them in a quarter of the time. He well described the nations in their present policies as arming, not for attack, but from sheer fear. While we are speaking of the welcome to Lloyd George we cannot resist repeating the incident recalled by Newton Baker, our former Secretary of War, in his speech of welcome to the great ex-Premier. On the twenty-fourth of March, 1918, Mr. Baker dined with Lloyd George, in company with Sir Henry Wilson, Chief of the British General Staff, Lord Balfour (then Mr. Balfour) and others. The Germans were making their drive for the channel ports. As the company sat at the dinner table dispatches were brought in with news that grew increasingly alarming. Finally, one dispatch came in upon which nobody could find words to comment. It was a terrible bit of news. At last Mr. Balfour, who was sitting near, reached over, picked up the dispatch and glanced over it for a moment. He looked up and remarked: "How annoying." Mr. Baker goes on to say, "And it gave me a sense of confidence and cheer that no subsequent disaster, and there were some, tended to shake or impair."

THE GERMAN EBB AND FLOW

The German government at Berlin has been swaying to and fro this past fortnight. For awhile the four parties which made up the coalition government refused to co-operate. The Industrialists wanted to take advantage of the situation by giving up the eight-hour day. The Socialists absolutely refused to commit themselves to the proposition. The Industrialists talked of an elastic eight-hour day, but the Socialists would make no compromise. For a while Stresemann had it in mind to concentrate the Cabinet under four men quite regardless of parties and govern, if necessary, with a hostile Reichstag until there should be a new election. But at the end of some three days of pushing and pulling Stresemann undertook the government with virtually his old Cabinet. The Reichstag received the slightly revamped administration not only without enthusiasm, but with a suggestion of hostility. The press correspondents do not expect to see the present Cabinet last long. In the meanwhile the monarchist movement in Bavaria appears clearer and clearer. The Bavarian dictator, Von Kahr, and the Bavarian Chancellor simply say that they agree with Prince Rupprecht, that the time has not yet come for him to re-ascend the throne, although a great demonstration was staged in his honor at Munich. The present Bavarian government represents "Marxismus," i.e., Marxian socialism, as its great foe and allows it to be understood that it is only afraid that the Berlin government may be wholly captured by the "Reds." In France, Poincaré continues his "Sunday sermons," saying that France will wait to see what the end of passive resistance really amounts to. French opinion in general was hurt by Lord Curzon's speech last Friday to the Conference of Premiers of the British dominions in London. Lord Curzon reasserted that the British government has never regarded the occupation of the Ruhr as legal. To his mind the French occupation has produced the beginning of the break-up of Germany. For in it we see, he said, "the beginning of the internal disruption which we have all feared. . . . It has a portentous economic aspect, for it means the utter destruction of the debtor herself."

PREPARATION FOR PEACE

The National Council for Prevention of War, in which a goodly number of organizations unite, is backing up the plan of the Federal Council of Churches for the celebration of World Court Week November 5 to 11. Not only will the week be celebrated by meetings, but petitions to Congress have been prepared to be circularized then. The allied organizations will also distribute buttons bearing the inscription, "World Peace—Law, Not War." Buttons may be obtained from the National Council for Prevention of War, 532 Seventeenth Street, N. W., Washington, D. C. The week will in some sort naturally turn into a memorial to the late President Harding. Last August, Walter Wellman made public a letter which Mr. Harding had written to the newspaper editors on June 15, urging them to use their power to end war. At the same time Mr. Wellman gave an account of a conversation which he held with the President on the subject of world peace. "He told with feeling," says Mr. Wellman, "of his many days and nights of earnest, prayerful thought on the problem of America's duty, of how he had at last reached a definite conclusion, that his conscience would not permit him longer to remain inactive: 'I am going ahead in an effort to make the world safe for humanity, even if it costs me another term in the White House.'" It is good to see that the administrative authorities are helping in practical ways in the work toward peace. Our Navy Department—the military departments of all governments are about the same—when it submitted its budget for next year, proposed to spend $28,000,000 in starting the building of eight scout cruisers, six cruising submarines, six gunboats, and in increasing the naval air force. Director of the Budget Lord has refused to sanction this $28,000,000 item. He has also disapproved the budget item submitted by the Department in order to increase the naval force by five thousand. Altogether, he cut down the Navy estimates $73,000,000. General Lord is the sort of man to have at the head of the Budget. The earthquake was not an unmixed misfortune for Japan. According to newspaper advices, it sank two of Japan's capital ships. It is almost a shame to refer to the size of Japan's navy in talking about the size of our own, but the fact of course is that our jingoes point to Japan as an excuse for their propaganda. Providence has deprived them of that plea now. Captain Edward A. Salisbury when he returned from Japan the other day said, "It will be twenty-five years before Japan can even think of war after this disaster." But in twenty-five years statesmen should have learned to think soundly enough so that no responsible man would dream of war. But for this year, if we are determined that we will spend some money for building new warships, why do we not pass over the funds to Japan so that she may replace the two vessels she has lost. Such action would help more toward securing the peace of the world than any money we could spend on warships for ourselves.

THE THIRTY-TWO MARTYRS

There are still in prison in the United States thirty-two men who, the best legal authorities agree, have every right to their freedom. These men are the last of the scores who were sent to jail because they differed from popular opinion in regard to the war. Probably most of those who read these words know that all the spies and bombers, the men who used treachery and violence against the United States during the war, were released years ago. But the Administration still keeps within our prison walls men concerning whom the very judge at their trial says that their sentences were not justified. As will be recalled, Senator Pepper, the eminent Christian lawyer, recommended that every one of the war-opinion prisoners should be released. Twenty-one of the thirty-two men still confined were convicted in the Sacramento cases. Senator Pepper's sober judgment in these cases closely parallels his judgment in regard to the cases of the other men still confined. After a close analysis of the evidence he writes:

I came to the conclusion that such proof of the violence as the record disclosed was referable either to counts adjudged invalid in the Chicago cases or to the count under which the sentences imposed had all been served. This process left the only remaining count (Espionage Act count) with little or no support in the testimony. I accordingly concluded that convictions under that count were at least of doubtful propriety. This was a significant conclusion, because unless the continued detention of Sacramento men can be justified under this Espionage Act count it cannot, legally, be justified at all.

I then, to err on the safe side, assumed that the convictions were justifiable on all counts and thereupon asked myself whether the punishment already suffered was adequate. In this connection I tried to weigh the Government's testimony and to estimate the credibility of its principal witnesses and to discount the atmosphere of the trial.

My net conclusion was that in every case a pardon ought to be granted, and I made a recommendation accordingly. In my judgment, pardons when granted in these cases should be unconditional. Annexing conditions seems to me inconsistent with the theory upon which pardon is recommended. The men ought to be in or out, and in either alternative without ifs and buts.

President Coolidge is level-headed and dispassionate. Let us appeal to him to take up these cases. At present the United States rates with Russia and Turkey. We refuse to forgive those who differ with most of us. Years ago the advanced nations of the world released from prison the men who held such opinions as these men are charged with. But America—free America—founded by revolution, the haven of the oppressed—only America to-day robs these men of sunshine, liberty and home life to which every man has a right. What would be a better Christmas present to these men than the liberty to which they have not only the right of humanity, but the right of law?

THE END OF THE NEW YORK PRESSMEN'S STRIKE

The outlaw strike of New York pressmen came to an end last week with the absolute defeat of the local organization. It will be recalled that the strike was called by a snap vote in defiance of the union's agreement with the publishers' association. When it was clear that the strikers would be beaten, Samuel Gompers, head of the American Federation of Labor, sent a message denouncing their action. It was a pity that the message did not come the moment the strike was called. The New York "Call," which is the organ of union labor in New York City, likewise deserves to be rebuked. Instead of coming out roundly in denunciation of a labor union's breaking its contracts, it shilly-shallied on the question or supported the strikers. But these are minor matters. It should be remembered to the credit of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union that their officers were strong enough to stand firm against the apparently unanimous action of probably their strongest local. Such courage on the part of union labor is one of the signs that it is growing up.

THE FUTURE OF THE AMERICAN BOARD'S WORK IN TURKEY

Dr. James L. Barton, the distinguished Foreign Secretary of the American Board, last week gave out an important statement on the future work of the American Board in Turkey. "No one," he says, "would venture to predict the extent and form of work the American Board will be able to carry on in Turkey under the new treaty. The old capitulations are abolished and there is little to take their place." At Lausanne, General Ismet Pasha, the spokesman for the Turkish government, and Minister of Foreign Affairs of that government, declared to Ambassador Child, as well as to representatives of the American Board, that they desired American missionaries, educators and physicians to remain in the country and carry on their work as before. He went so far as to put it into writing: "I hope above all things that Americans will not worry about the future of their educational and philanthropic institutions in Turkey. We want these institutions to stay, and have no intention of adopting laws that will embarrass the continuation of the admirable American altruistic work among our people." The same sentiment was expressed by Dr. Fouad Bey, a Turkish unofficial representative recently in the United States. However, the attitude of some officials in Turkey has not been wholly friendly to American missionary and educational work. Dr. Adnan Bey, governor of Constantinople and former Minister of the Interior at Angora, has shown himself to be hostile to the continuation of American missionary medical work in the country, on the ground that they have more doctors now than can find employment. It is not known whether he speaks the mind of his government.

THE TURKISH TREATY AND MISSION WORK

An official note prepared at Lausanne by the Turkish delegation reads as follows: "American religious institutions, schools and hospitals, as well as relief organizations recognized as existing in Turkey before the war, are fiscally to be treated upon a footing of equality with similar Turkish institutions and organizations." It is understood that the article in the treaty quoted above was agreed upon at Lausanne by both Turks and Americans. Property rights are recognized in the treaty, as well as damages of nationals, caused by the war. At the present time the representatives of the two governments are discussing the method of presenting these damages for consideration. Under the new order, as provided by the treaty, the relations of Americans to the Turkish government will be changed from what they were prior to the war. The capitulations are abrogated and the status of Americans in Turkey, as fixed by the treaty, will be largely that of Turkish subjects, amenable to the laws of the country. It will not be an easy matter to make the necessary readjustments in the conduct of missionary, educational and philanthropic work. There are those who believe that when the Turks have been reorganized as a sovereign people and are admitted into the sisterhood of nations upon equal terms with other nations their attitude will materially change for the better, and that work among them will be consequently easier. Such is Dr. Barton's hope.

THE CALL FOR CHAPLAINS

On page 445 we print a statement by Rev. E. O. Watson of the Washington office of the Federal Council of Churches in regard to the call for more navy chaplains. The article speaks for itself. At its close we print a table showing the quota of chaplains and the actual number from each of the larger communions. It is interesting to note that the Episcopalians have four times their quota and the Presbyterians nearly two times, while the Lutherans have not a fourth of those to whom they have a right and the Southern Baptists not a third. It will surprise most readers to see that the Roman Catholics have less than the quota to which they are entitled by agreement. The chaplain's work calls peculiarly for manly, self-dependent men. The chaplain is isolated from the ordinary work of the Church and stands out a marked man on his ship or in his regiment. Only the strongest, most virile men should undertake the service.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE WORK OF THE AMERICAN EPISCOPALIANS IN JAPAN

In our issue of September 29, referring to the losses of American mission societies due to the Japanese earthquake, we spoke as though the whole work of the American Episcopalians in Japan was in Tokyo. The sentence was due to a misunderstanding. As a matter of fact, the American Episcopalians conduct an extensive work in Kyoto and Osaka and the outlying regions. In fact, the work in Osaka is so extensive that at the same time that the City of Tokyo was set apart as a separate diocese of the Nippon Sei Ko Kwai (the Episcopal Church in Japan) the City of Osaka was also set apart as a separate diocese. The Nippon Sei Ko Kwai is divided into eight dioceses. Of these three are in charge of the American Episcopal Church and five are in charge of the Church of England and the Church of England in Canada. The dioceses which constitute the missionary districts of the American Episcopalians take in the entire northern half of the main island of Hondo and the populous west central section about Kyoto, Osaka, Fukui and Wakayama.

PREPAREDNESS PROPAGANDA BY THE CHAPLAIN'S OFFICE

Is it the part of the War Department to conduct propaganda in behalf of war preparations? Is not the War Department the servant of the people of the United States, with its function simply to do what it is directed to do by Congress and nothing else? There is no more reason for the War Department to put out propaganda in behalf of preparedness than for the Department of Labor to put out propaganda in behalf of trade unions or the I. W. W. or the open shop. Under date of October 3 the office of the Chief of Chaplains of the War Department, in a franked envelope marked "Official Business," sent out a speech, "The Three Highways of Peace," by Rev. Dr. Herbert Spencer Johnson, given at the Philadelphia meeting of the Federation of Churches. Dr. Johnson argued against "pacifism": "Whether we agree with Secretary Hughes or not when he says, 'War is not an abnormality,' we must believe that it is as normal as cheating, stealing, murder, lying, adultery and the other sins; for it springs from the same source—the selfishness of human nature." "Pacifism," he went on, "tends to destroy the national plan of defense. It carries on a well-defined propaganda to reduce continually the army and navy of the United States and to prevent military education in our schools, colleges and training camps. Pacifism tends to cause war. A weak nation, especially if rich, invites attack. Robbed of its means of defense, the United States would become the natural target of the great imperialistic powers who are envious of our wealth, or who desire to encroach on the Western Hemisphere. . . . Pacifism would prevent the United States from playing her destined part in the world as the champion of democracy and the rights of the common man. American idealism must be supplemented by authority, or, in other words, by military force in certain emergencies, if it is to be anything more than mere helpless sentimentalism." The nigger in the wood pile appears the most clearly in the third of the "Three Highways of Peace" which Dr. Johnson proposed. He urged, "Let us accept whole-heartedly the National Plan of Defense of the United States as finally amended and approved in 1921." Dr. Johnson did what he could to strengthen the idea that war is inevitable. "That war is likely to persist," he said, "is the opinion of such great leaders of thought as Lord Bryce, Elihu Root, Philip Kerr of the Institute of Politics and Secretary Hughes." What a shame that such material should go out from a supposedly Christian office! Of course, war will persist so long as people expect it to do so. If the chaplain's office is going to send out such propaganda, feeding the war spirit, then the Church should wash its hands of the army chaplain service. Let the chaplain's office either perform the functions for which it is intended and teach Christianity, the faith of the Prince of Peace, or else let its whole connection with the Church be abolished. Is the War Department itself behind this propaganda? Is Secretary Weeks using the chaplain's office to feed militarism into the religious press?

THE INDICTMENT OF MR. ANDERSON AND ROMAN CATHOLICS

William H. Anderson, known pretty well throughout America now as the head of the New York Anti-Saloon League, has been indicted by the New York Grand Jury for grand larceny, forgery and extortion. The indictment seems rather absurd since the trustees of the Anti-Saloon League declare their absolute confidence in Mr. Anderson. Mr. Anderson believes that the indictments are at least partly a political plot, and that they are in some sort the expression of the dislike of certain Roman Catholic leaders for the prohibition law. It is never pleasant to think that religious prejudices are mixed up with political battles, and Mr. Anderson, of course, does not charge the whole Roman Catholic Church with the responsibility. But some color seems to be given to the charge by the failure of many leaders in that church to work whole-heartedly in behalf of respect for law when the Eighteenth Amendment is involved. They ought to administer stinging rebukes to priests who publicly scoff at the enforcement of the prohibition laws. Mr. Anderson's spirit may be judged by the following: "When the Protestant churches clean up on the job they started by making good on enforcement, by electing, sustaining and retaining officials who will use the entire power of government for effective enforcement, the power of these unholy politicians will be broken and the wings of their ecclesiastical allies will have been clipped. With the de-alcoholization of the reigning Irish dynasty now ruling New York and grasping for Washington with the help of a recent mission to a foreign power, it will be found that a host of other problems have settled themselves or been put in the course of final and satisfactory settlement."

For three Sundays, beginning October 14, the Radio Corporation of America will send out a Bible class instruction through the WJY station of New York. The session will last from two-thirty to three-fifteen p.m. The teacher for October 14 will be W. G. Landes, secretary of the World's Sunday-School Association. On October 21 it will be Rev. Otto F. Bartholow, pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Mt. Vernon and teacher of one of the largest Bible classes in the United States. On November 4 it will be Nolan R. Best, editor of "The Continent." The program will consist of the opening worship, a special feature of some kind and the teaching of the International Sunday-School Lesson. If people find the lesson worth while they will do well to send word to the Radio Corporation of America. If such broadcasting meets a real demand the company is disposed to make it a permanent feature.

God, then there is no such a thing as prayer. If God exists, then there must be prayer, for there must be relationship between a Creator and beings created in His own image. It is as impossible for the Creator and the created not to have relationships with each other as it is for a father and child to have no power of inter-communication. The moment you admit a father you admit relationship of his children to him. The moment you admit the being of God, that moment you admit conscious relationship between Him and His offspring. This relationship is prayer. All prayer begins with the consciousness of this sonship. If you are an atheist, then you are right not to believe in prayer. If you believe in a personal Creator, then you cannot help believing in prayer, for they belong to each other as child does to father. It is impossible to think of God and our not being able to commune with Him. And that is what prayer is. It is communion between God and man. God Speaks to man in revelation: man speaks to God in prayer. The Holy Spirit speaks in the heart of man: the heart answers in the same language. Granted the Heavenly Father, then prayer is as natural as speech between a mother and her child.

Miss Royden is right in insisting that if there is a spiritual order, then prayer is a law of that order. But if there is a Creator and created beings, then there is a spiritual order. Where personality is, there is at once an order which transcends the material universe. There are certain laws of that spiritual order which are evident wherever there are personalities, laws which far transcend the order of nature. They are as familiar to us as the law of gravitation. There is the law of love, which matter does not know. Love is of the spiritual order, but it is as real as any law of physics or chemistry. There are the laws of thought, of ideals, of sacrifice, of hope, of faith, of mercy, of charity. These are all just as real as any law the world of matter knows. They are not only the proof of a spiritual order, they are not only attributes of God, but they are laws which man has discovered through his heart as he has discovered the laws of electricity through his mind. Prayer is but another of these verifiable laws, and perhaps the greatest. It has been just as real to millions of souls as the laws of mechanics have been to millions of minds. Indeed, the moment one is really conscious of God and the world of the spirit, that moment the law of prayer dawns upon him. He becomes more familiar with it as he experiments with it, just as the chemist becomes more familiar with the laws of matter by experiment after his first consciousness of them; but the law becomes a reality the moment we know God. In a Godless world, in a world of matter only, there is no prayer; in a world of God and where there is personality and where there is a consequent spiritual order, prayer is the most natural thing in the world.

As to petition in prayer, the problem never disturbed us very much. It seems no more perplexing than the relation between child and mother in a home. The child naturally runs to the mother with all its love, its ideals, its needs, and its wants. The mother listens and responds as her love dictates. The child never stops to think in every instance whether the request demands that the mother set aside the laws of the home in her answer. The mother looks after that. When the soul gains that consciousness of the Heavenly Father that the child has of the mother, it goes to Him just as instinctively and trustingly. It leaves the question of the interruption of the laws of the spiritual universe

The Reasonableness of Prayer

WE HAVE just read with unusual interest a little book on prayer by the famous London preacher, Maude Royden ("Prayer as a Force," published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York). Miss Royden has written this book, the chapters of which were previously used as addresses to her great congregation of young men and women in London, to help clear up some of the doubts and perplexities which were frequently coming to her attention. It is a most helpful and illuminating book in this regard, but we use it as a point of departure here because, throughout the whole book, Miss Royden insists that prayer is as real and living a force in the world as any of the great forces revealed to us by natural science. It is just as real in the spiritual realm as gravitation is in the natural world, and just as we have come to have implicit faith in gravitation because we thoroughly investigated it and understand its operations, so we shall come to have just as implicit faith in prayer when we have thoroughly investigated it and comprehend its operations. It is just as fundamental a law in the world of the spirit as gravitation is in the world of matter.

Miss Royden is right. The ultimate question, therefore, is not, Is there any such a thing as prayer? but is there any such a thing as God and a spiritual order? If there is no to God. That is His concern, not the soul's. Once realize that God is love, that His chief joy is in the love He can bestow upon His children, and the love they bear to Him and all the problems of petition melt away. After all, the Christian prays from instinct. Let him know God and he cannot help praying.

God and the Earthquake

THE disaster in Japan called forth the sympathy of the world. But when the sympathy and the need for it have passed, what will remain with us for good or ill is the kind of thought we think, the way in which the disaster has affected our own spiritual attitude towards God and the world. We do not think of earthquakes as our ancestors did. To the scientist, however little he may be able to say in accounting for an earthquake, there is no more mystery about it than about the quiet blossoming of a garden in June. The storm that tears up the giants of the forest, sweeps great buildings from their foundations, wrecks the ships at sea, is just as much a natural phenomenon as the gentle breeze that kisses the flowers to sleep on a summer evening and the soft tender light that awakens them at dawn. Ætna or Vesuvius in eruption is just as natural as the orchards which their burning lava destroys. We may know more about the one than the other, partly because the subject is more accessible, but it is the same kind of study that would bring us knowledge of both, and if we knew enough we should be able to predict an earthquake, just as surely as we make predictions in astronomy. So, however terrible the calamity the earthquake occasions, we do not turn to placate an angry Deity or fall in terror at the supposed action of a malignant spirit. So strong in the modern mind is the conviction that there is one great Order in the world of nature that if anything presented itself which utterly baffled all the scientists, we should still put down our bafflement to our ignorance, not to the idea that there was any caprice in nature. This is one of the great gains of the modern world. That law reigns in nature, even in its convulsions, is now one of our settled convictions.

This, however, does not settle the question whether these laws of nature have a moral character, whether a good God has anything to do with them. We see that their working at times means terrible sufferings to human beings. Huxley in 1893 came to the conclusion that the cosmic process was non-moral. St. George Stock says we should give up making religion into a theory of the universe and be content to regard it as a passion of the heart. Mr. H. G. Wells would agree. We do not agree, but we admit that the forces of nature do not take account of what we consider to be our importance and pay any regard to our morality. If a subterranean cavity causes a subsidence of the earth on which you happen to be standing, Nature will not ask whether you are a saint or a sinner. Down you go whatever you are. If the strata of the earth, subject to strain, reaches the snapping point, they will snap, whatever may be the result to you or the city you have built. And this is not a fact of a different order from the splitting of a piece of coal on your fire. If anything living happened to be on that piece it would drop into the opening and be burnt. The earthquake is not essentially different from the bursting of a water pipe, or an avalanche of snow on the Alps, or an explosion in a gaseous mine. And no one would dream of regarding an earthquake as a religious difficulty if human beings were not involved in the destruction. Huxley in 1872 watched Vesuvius in eruption and enjoyed the sight. He was quite safe on the northern and eastern side of the cone while Vesuvius was performing on the other side. Now if the eruption had been much worse and had killed Huxley and thousands of others many would have raised a theological difficulty, but no new law would have been called into play, no new forces would have been in action.

If the power of God be thought of as a power to change the nature of things backwards and forwards at any moment, to make fire a thing that will burn at one time and not burn at another, or burn at one place and not at another, there fortunately is no such God. Such a God would be nothing but an enigma to us. If nature were the expression of a capricious will, we should never be able to reckon upon anything at all. The fact that God rules in nature by law, which is only the fixed habit of Spirit, is our one chance of learning His way. And even a great many catastrophes that shock the world are problems of adjustment in that material universe whose uniformity is its reliability and the condition of all our science. No science would have been possible without an unbroken order in nature.

But what about the indifference of the natural order to our spiritual standards and aspirations? We admit that nature is non-moral in the sense that our moral standards cannot be discovered there; in the sense that the working of natural forces does not recognize our moral distinctions, but to admit nature non-moral in that respect is not to admit that nature has no significance for our moral life. Man is a higher creation, and therefore you could not expect to find lower down all that you find in him. So far as we know, spiritual aspiration and the capacity for religion came into existence with man. It is therefore no surprise not to find them in nature. But this is not to say that the working of natural laws has no relation to the moral life of man, no role to play in the formation of character, or even in the support of religious faith. As a matter of fact, in dealing with nature, which is non-moral in the sense we have admitted, much of the best morality of the world has been developed. If we could estimate the benign influences of nature, the help which the human spirit has so often had from her softer and more beautiful aspects, and add to that all the strength and courage and heroism which man has developed in fighting against the more terrible things in nature, we think one would be bound to admit that, though natural law does not work by our moral law, nature has so provided for the growth and development of the human spirit that nature herself must, in a large cosmic sense, be included in the moral sphere. When we remember how nature has kindled and fed the sense of beauty, challenged the intellect of man, how intercourse with nature has called forth much of the finest poetry and given rise to rich spiritual experience, and how the difficulties she has put in man's way have called out his power to attack and overcome them, how her calamities have often provided him with a field for courage and bravery, we are not prepared to put that nature outside God whose will is that men should so develop. It is possible that the difficulties which nature has put in man's way have been as great a blessing as her gracious and benign

It may be difficult to bring within this statement such a calamity as the earthquake in Japan, but it is not impossible if we take a long view. Nothing is more evident at the moment than the summoning forth of the indefatigable human spirit; it is certain the Japanese race will not lose in grit and in power through it, but gain. It is true that many individuals have been victims. Perhaps if we could see beyond the veil we might see that when the Order has entailed sacrifice on the few for the sake of the many it has also its own way of caring for them. We cannot see that there is sufficient ground in a catastrophe of this sort for losing faith in a God whom we have found in our own spiritual natures. That there is no difficulty in these awful occurrences we do not say, but we find nothing serious enough to come between us and faith in the goodness of God which is grounded in the moral and spiritual nature. Nor can we find rest in any ultimate dualism. The revelation of God in nature is not sufficient for religious purposes. It is through man's spiritual nature that God is to be known. But we must believe that this material world in which we live, of which our bodies at least are a part, and interaction with which means so much for our mind and our spirit, is also His, and is, in its own measure, a revelation of Him. If it does not reveal Him to us always friendly to our physical fortunes, it reveals Him to us as one giving an opportunity for the development of character.

To the religious man there is also another consideration of weight, namely, that after all the only destruction has been the destruction of material things—buildings and businesses and the bodies of men. We do not say this in any way to minimize its sadness, but we must remember that the earthquake with its terror has only accomplished in a short time what would inevitably happen some time or other. On the other hand, it is our faith that the most precious things are things which no earthquake can touch, and no storm can overthrow. Not a single soul died in Japan. We are of those who believe that when the outward man perishes the inward man survives, and that when the earthly house of this tabernacle is dissolved, whether slowly or by swift calamities, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. Let the essence of life be to us in the things of the spirit, then we shall have received a kingdom that cannot be shaken. There have always been earthquakes, and they have never dislodged religious faith from the soul of humanity. When men, through spiritual experience, have found God to be their refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble, they have been able to say, "Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea." That was religious faith long ago; that is religious faith still. We can say unhesitatingly that the earthquake leaves it undisturbed.

One word more. The earthquake, like every great calamity, brings out a marvelous demonstration of the divine resources of humanity. Would that humanity would learn to draw upon these resources in ordinary life. Why not call them up to-day to repair the damages of the war as we call them up to repair the damages of the earthquake?

How the Orthodox Eastern Church Appears to a Western Protestant

NO THOUGHTFUL observer can be long in the Near East and meet some of its spiritual leaders without realizing that the Protestant churches of the West know all too little of the Orthodox Eastern Church. He cannot help feeling keenly that here is a great part of the body of Christ with which we ought to have closer fellowship and co-operation.

We ought, in the first place, to recognize our debt, throughout past centuries, to the Eastern Church. It is a debt which began in the early period of Christianity when the Greek intellect gave theological formulation to our faith. It is a debt which has continued through the Middle Ages and since, for the Orthodox churches have stood as a bulwark against the westward advance of Islam.

And not to the past alone, but to the present hour may one look to see the strength and the power of the Eastern Church. Certainly there is a current of quickened life flowing through great sections of it to-day. This has been unmistakably manifest in the informal conferences which it has been our privilege to hold this summer with some of the outstanding figures in the Orthodox churches, including the Acting Patriarch of the Greek Church at Constantinople, the Acting Patriarch of the Armenian Church, Archbishop Anastasis of the Russian Church in Constantinople, and Chrysostom, the newly consecrated Metropolitan of Athens. These and others whom one might mention, such as the Metropolitan of Saloniki, the Archbishop of Jerusalem and Bishop Nicholai (so well known in America), represent a deeply spiritual and forward-looking leadership with whom we should count it a joy and a privilege to develop the closest relations of fellowship and helpfulness.

Of course there are obvious weaknesses in the Orthodox Church, as we see it to-day, its traditionalism, its over-emphasis on ritualism, the lack of education among the clergy. But if one is tempted to pass a final judgment in the light of these things alone, let him recall for how many centuries these Near Eastern churches have either been in bondage politically to Islam or struggling to keep themselves alive in a Moslem environment. The wonder is not that there are things which may be criticized, but that Christian faith and spiritual life survive such obstacles, and that the Church still has, as it has always had, a mighty hold upon the hearts and lives of the people.

Certainly, whatever we in the West are to do for the Orthodox churches we must do through these churches—never by proselyting among them. All the Protestant leaders with whom we talked in Constantinople and Athens, almost without exception, share this opinion. Indeed, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in association with Robert College, has already put into operation a remarkable plan of co-operation with the Orthodox leaders in training priests and workers for their churches. In "The School of Religion," as this project at Constantinople is called, opened a year ago, there were more than a score of students from the Greek, Armenian, Russian and Bulgarian Orthodox churches, together with several Protestant students. The Orthodox students came with the full endorsement and support of their bishops, who realize to-day the need for such help as the American churches can give. The instruction in the liturgy and church history is given by leaders of the Orthodox faith, while courses in the Bible, religious education, social service and other lines are given by American teachers. It is hoped that this School of Religion may ultimately become a union effort, including in its scope all the Protestant churches carrying on work in any part of the Near East, and always developing in the fullest co-operation with the Orthodox churches themselves. Here is a superb pioneering enterprise, deserving the support of the whole of American Protestantism and demonstrating the practicability of closer relations between Near Eastern and Western Christianity in every realm of activity.

Never was a moment more opportune than the present for developing such co-operation between the Orthodox churches and Protestantism. Their leaders are now turning to us for sympathy and practical help. They are grateful for what has already been done by American Christianity—for the service of revered leaders like Dr. Peet of the American Board, who, we were told, was one of the most trusted advisers of Patriarch Meletios of the Greek Church; for the work of the Young Men's Christian Association, with which Orthodox leaders have co-operated heartily; for the special interest of the Episcopal Church, which has made many of our Western churchmen known to them; for the mission of mercy carried on by Near East Relief; for the efforts of the Federal Council of the Churches in behalf of justice for the minorities in the Near East. For these and other reasons there is a surprising interest throughout the Near East in the American churches. Every one of the Orthodox leaders with whom we spoke welcomed eagerly the suggestion of closer contacts in the future.

As a representative of the co-operative work of the American evangelical churches it was a special satisfaction to us to discover that several of these Orthodox leaders already knew of the Federal Council of the Churches, understood something of the united movement for which it stands, and were grateful for what it had done for the Near East. The Armenian Patriarch spoke feelingly of the service of the Council to his people and pleaded for future help. The Acting Patriarch of the Greek Church knew of the Council's effort in behalf of the refugees and of the message to the first Lausanne Conference protesting against the proposal to expel the Patriarchate from Constantinople. The Metropolitan of Athens told us that he read the Federal Council Bulletin and was watching the development of the Council with deep interest. In his inaugural address at the time of his recent consecration he urged, among other wise policies, the "establishment of friendly co-operation with all the Christian churches throughout the world."

As steps in the further development of closer fellowship and helpfulness it would seem that the Protestant churches of America, acting through the Federal Council as their agency for united effort, ought to serve as a center at least for:

1. Interpreting the Orthodox churches to the West. First of all, the present ignorance and lack of understanding must be removed.
2. Expressing in every possible way the sympathy and help of the Western churches toward the Eastern.
3. Facilitating more personal contacts and more systematic communication with the Orthodox leaders in the Near East.
4. Developing a more regular consultative and co-operative relationship with the branches of the Orthodox churches ministering to their own people in America.

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

Dr. Norwood and Geneva

"IF I HAD a voice that could be heard around the world, I would say to the good people (and they represent two-thirds of the people of our world), 'Speak, speakee, that the children of Israel go forward.'" These last words of a sermon I heard Dr. Norwood deliver this morning at the City Temple have so impressed me that I feel like sharing them with you and with every other friend that has a voice. The sermon, after two months spent in Europe, which especially, because of the Ruhr occupation, is in a still more hopeless condition than when I was here two years ago, seems to have galvanized all my experiences into a hope that it is not too late to save our civilization, if all the good people will but speakee.

Dr. Norwood's text was from the well-known words when God spoke to Moses at the Red Sea. The minister pointed out that the Israelites found themselves in a situation where the old order by one stroke had been destroyed. They had lived in slavery for four hundred years and were leaving it, but they had no program for the future. As the Egyptians pressed upon them they wondered if they had not better turn back and cast their lot with their old oppressors. So to-day Europe trembles before the Red Sea of difficulty. She had resolved to escape the old oppressor, Militarism, but that oppressor is still strong, well organized and pressing us to return to it. When men went out nine years ago into "a war to end war" they were not hypocrites; they were sincere. But they were mistaken, for war never ends war. Militarism was conquered, but the new leaders had no program. Now the old order, highly organized, is resurging. Since the war Great Britain alone has spent twelve hundred and eighty million pounds sterling for militarism. That all represents men interested in the business of war and arguing for it.

Yet these militarists can be defeated if we only press forward. Nearly every decent man in the world knows now that militarism is the most beastly of all evils. We may still be dominated by it, but we know it is a dead thing like some old dragon that, even after death, continues to draw its tentacles around its prey.

The speaker was not interested in just how the Red Sea parted and the Israelites got over. But Red Seas, humanity's barriers from the great New Day, interest him. If only man would lift his hand to-day, as did Moses at God's command, the old beast of militarism would disappear and we would enter into the New Day. If man will only believe God all things are possible to him. God puts no barriers before him that he cannot overcome, if he will have faith and lift his hand in God's name.

In an impassioned appeal the speaker told how he felt the hot breath of Egypt around him, with all the hatreds and armies and wars of the present. Will Christians speak, that humanity may go forward and be saved? He believed they would, but it must be done quickly, very quickly. Let every one speak, then, in private conversation, in political spheres, in churches, in social circles, in international organizations, that the New Day may be entered. Artists always chose a figure looking backward to express fear. God pity the nation which puts into power to-day men who are harking back to the jungle instead of lifting their hands and pointing across the barriers to the Land of Promise! The League of Nations is the best instrument we have to-day to bring in an era of peace. It is gradually transforming itself from an instrument of the victors to a real league of free nations. It would have done so much more quickly if it had not been deprived of America's help. "Oh, Americans, I would not be impertinent, I would not tell you your duty in your own affairs! But, believe me, this is no national matter. Here we are, not citizens of this or that nation. We are just humans. If the old order, whose hot breath we feel around us, wins us back we are all, humanity everywhere, lost. If I had a voice that could be heard around the world I would say to good people everywhere, speak, speak, that the children of the new generation go forward!"

As Dr. Norwood says, the real question is whether or not the people who know full well the viciousness of militarism will speak soon enough. Old Egypt was scarcely more in evidence during the Great War itself than she is now in Europe. The horrors of the Ruhr valley are unbelievable. The military burdens, the awful unrest, the growth of anarchy, the poverty in a large part of Europe are beyond comprehension to prosperous America. Seldom does an hour pass when the American traveling in Europe is not made to blush with shame that his country sits supinely by as Europe plunges on to hell. I have tried to explain to people here that we are not deliberately indifferent. When we are told the Armenians or the Russians are starving, we pour out our money like water. But we have not yet learned to think fundamentally enough in these matters to realize that through international co-operation the cause of these conditions can be removed. The bulk of our people believe that we serve humanity best by keeping out of European politics, which we regard as a kind of barroom brawl, with the League of Nations as the barkeeper. How far this is from the real situation is seen at first hand! If we could only appreciate the fact that there are a large number of people in Europe who are earnestly striving to get out of the old order; that these are the ones who are backing the League most consistently; that with the help of a great idealistic power, like the United States, these forces could win the victory for the very peace and democratic rule for which our best traditions stand. Certainly, then we would not hesitate to throw ourselves into the fight as we have always done when we have come to recognize a needy and rightful cause.

I wish everyone of my countrymen could have the experience I had a few weeks ago at Geneva, when I spent several days at the League headquarters studying its organization and attending a meeting of the Council of the League. It is about the liveliest, finest, and I might say the largest and most unselfish organization working for the brotherhood of man that I have seen in years of travel. It occupies an immense building on the lake front of fair Geneva, where three hundred of the best trained people in international thinking are constantly engaged in study, correspondence, conference and investigation regarding the solution of the problems which make the world suspicious and unhappy. The idea that the League is dead or that it consists of a few zealots working away from the practical world or an impossible ideal is laughable when one goes to Geneva. If every American could visit the League we would vote one hundred per cent. to enter. For practically everyone who does visit it goes away converted to its usefulness, no matter how much he has been opposed to it before. I met one of our most prominent magazine writers (one meets everyone at the League Palace, it seems, if he will only wait awhile) who has been a determined enemy of the organization and who came to Geneva only to get information that could be found in the League library alone. Yet he told me that he had just about come to the point where he would have to publicly recant and start in as an advocate of the League, so wonderful had he found the organization.

But I did not start out to write about the League. That is another story. Yet I honestly believe it is about the most important story before the world to-day. Of course, I am not including the Old, Old Story in this remark. Yet I am not sure but that the League of Nations is doing more of the work of Christ in healing the wounds of a bleeding world to-day than are some organizations that call themselves by His name.

Archbishop Soderblom in America

THERE was the greatest interest expressed in religious circles in America when it was announced that the great Archbishop of Upsala and Primate of Sweden was to visit America. He is not only the Primate of Sweden, but he is looked up to as counselor and leader by all the Lutherans of Europe. He is not only a bishop of the Lutheran Church, but he is associated with every evangelical body in religious, social and international activity. In all the conferences of the churches, such as that on Life and Work, Faith and Order and the World Alliance for International Friendship, he is always found playing a most outstanding role. He is a great apostle of Christian unity and not only has written books upon it, but has practised it. It was he who had most to do with the bringing together the Anglican and Swedish communions, and it was only a year and a half ago that he signed with the Archbishop of Canterbury the Concordat establishing intercommunion between the two churches. His book on "Christian Fellowship," recently published by the Fleming H. Revell Company, shows how petty are the things which divide the churches, how great and universal are the things held in common. The Church Peace Union, the American Scandinavian Foundation and the Augustana Synod of America finally issued a united invitation for him to come to America, and here he is at last among us.

On Monday of this week he was the guest at a luncheon where a large group of the most prominent clergy of the city of New York greeted him. Dr. Thomas Nightingale and the Rev. J. Brierley Kay, of London, who are also in this country as exchange preachers, were also guests. The Archbishop speaks Swedish, German, French and English equally well and is eloquent in any that he speaks. His address at the luncheon was one of the most brilliant speeches heard in New York for years. He told a parable—on and on he went with his parable about a father begetting a child, a child, weak as any child is at first, but full of promise. Then the father deserted this wonderful child, leaving it to his mother alone to nourish, nurture, train and educate and care for, though the mother had not asked for the child in the beginning. To-day it was a wonderful child, fuller of promise than ever, and the mother calls for the deserting father to come back, take his share in supporting and training the child; but he will not come. The whole group listened intensely as the Archbishop went on with his parable, no one dreaming what was coming, when suddenly he thrilled the group by saying: "The father is America, the mother is Europe, the child is the League of Nations." I have seldom seen a more electric effect upon an audience than this interpretation of the parable produced, neither have I ever seen real wit put to more effective use. (I note that the New York "Times" of October 4 has an interesting editorial on this speech in which this paragraph appears:

"He has made a unique appeal for the League of Nations, which he characterized at a public meeting a few days ago as a child of 'prodigious possibilities and a great soul,' though 'a cripple' that has been repudiated by its father. Will the father not recognize his duties, he asks, and help to bring up the child? He will find that the United States denies the imputed paternity. But he expresses suggestively and courageously a European attitude of which we ought to take note.")

On Tuesday evening, October 5th, two thousand people greeted the Archbishop at a dinner given in the Hotel Astor by the Lutheran Society of New York. Here the Archbishop was perfectly delightful, bubbling over with good-will and merriment. Not only did he touch upon some of the great problems of the day, but he told the story of his visit to America as a college student to attend the meeting of the students at Northfield when Mr. Moody was first bringing students there from all parts of the world. His tribute to the work of Mr. Moody aroused tender memories in many hearts and everyone thought it was one of the most gracious acts any foreign visitor has rendered America in years. And can you imagine an archbishop bursting into song at a great public banquet? When His Grace was telling how moved he was the first time he heard Sankey sing "There were ninety and nine that safely lay in the shadow of the fold" he asked, "How many of you young people know that hymn or have heard it? I can remember it after all these years. Shall I sing you a stanza?"—and then it came. Talk about impressions! The great audience was simply overcome. The Archbishop, by the way, is a fine singer and an accomplished musician. In his college days he was a member of the famous student singing society of Upsala University, the "Orpheus Dranger"—Servants of Orpheus. He has composed music and can, if occasion requires, go into the loft of his great cathedral and play the musical part of the service. I should like in passing to pay tribute here to the unusually statesmanlike and eloquent address of Dr. Knobel in welcoming the Archbishop. His statement of the perplexing problem facing both the Nation and the Church as to how far the policy should be that of devotion to self-development for the sake of service and how far it should be that of present co-operation with the other nations and churches of the world, voiced the perplexity of many souls.

The most interesting incidents connected with the Archbishop's stay in New York were the two lectures given under the joint auspices of the Christian Unity Foundation and the New York Federation of Churches in the Marble Collegiate Church on the afternoons of October 2 and 3 at four o'clock. Large audiences consisting of both clergymen and laymen greeted the distinguished visitor and heard two of the most suggestive lectures that have been delivered in these courses. The perfection of the English and the eloquence in a foreign tongue simply amazed everybody. These lectures will probably be printed in later editions of THE CHRISTIAN WORK. (In substance they are found in the Archbishop's book, "Christian Fellowship.") But I cannot forbear paying tribute to the breadth and liberality shown to all communions that permeated every sentence. The first lecture was on "The Unity That Is"; the second on "The Unity That Is to Be." The Archbishop insisted again and again that Christian hearts that are really near to God and Christ must be near to each other. Organic unity will come when this spiritual fellowship exists everywhere. Already it exists in many hearts and is widening its bounds. The first lecture was the expansion of this thought and was really a thing of beauty in its graciousness and generous sympathies. In the second lecture we got a vision of the perfection of this desire and a discussion of the foundations on which real unity must be built and its practical considerations. There are three methods by which Christian unity may be attained, one of which is the right method. The first is the method of absorption of all communions by one; the second is that of faith where each communion is at home in its own partition, but communes with others over the partitions; there is the method of love where we all rise above our separate rooms, meeting above the partitions in the presence of God. This is the ultimate way to unity. The Archbishop had much to say about the episcopacy. I wish to come back to that sometime. Very fortunate was the man who had the opportunity to come in contact with this great personality in these lectures. Archbishop Soderblom is the most outstanding figure in the Protestant Church in Europe to-day, and we Americans are greatly privileged in meeting him.

Norman Thomas, at one time director of the Presbyterian American Parish, later editor of "The World To-morrow," and then on the staff of "The Nation," has become editor in chief of "The New York Leader," formerly "The Call." "The Call" was started as a Socialist paper, but the Socialists have had their difficulties keeping it going. Now the labor unions of New York have bought it and have made it their organ. Mr. Thomas has a tremendous opportunity in the new "Leader" to help shape the ideals of the laboring men of New York toward the Christianity that makes demands of laboring men as well as of employers.

We feel and know the impulses of the Holy One who is ever our Creator in the sense that He is our Father because he is renewing us into His likeness. We do pray, and our prayers are communion with him. Here is the basis of our faith, the warrant of immortality, the dignity of human life. To question these experiences is to invade the sanctities of our lives.—Albert E. Dunning.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Christianity and Industrial Relations*

By Dr. J. C. Carlile, C.B.E.

Ex-President of the British Baptist Union

TO the careful observer the world presents an entirely new spectacle. There is nothing like it in the range of history. Man is seen overwhelmed by the weight and wonder of the knowledge he has discovered. He has mapped the world, charted the seas and measured the heavens. He has learnt the nature of the elements, can forecast the movement of the winds and knows the age of the planet upon which he lives. He has learnt something of the mystery and magnitude of the universe, and on the pinnacle of his attainments stands dazed, bewildered and more than a little afraid. The vastness of the world has dwarfed him, and in his best moods he realizes his utter insignificance. With new emphasis he asks, "What is man or the son of man that Thou visitest him?"

Modern industrialism reveals another phase—the inventive genius of man. He has created machinery and devices by which he controls the lightning and utilizes the thunder. In many parts of the world the sky is black with the factory smoke and the night lurid by the light from the shafts. Factories and workshops have changed the landscape until it has become as a scene in Dante's "Inferno." This wonderful thing, industrialism, seems to have life of itself; it is the genius that has in recent times changed the meaning of civilization and the current of history. For hundreds of years industrial progress moved at a snail's pace. Indeed, from the time the Romans left the shores of Britain until the early part of the eighteenth century, there scarcely seemed to be more than ripples upon the surface of the water. Then the winds of invention blew and the pace quickened until it became as the rapids of Niagara.

I speak the praise of industrialism. Too long have we sung the glory of war and idealized the colossal murderers and political mountebanks of history. Why should the children in our schools be taught to memorize the names of great warriors and the dates of bloody wars? It is a mistaken patriotism and a caricature of education. This is not the history of a nation. The story of a nation is written in the life of the people. Why not teach the dates of great discoveries and inventions, and hold in reverent remembrance the names of the workers who gave the printing press, the steam engine, the electric light, the telephone, the telegraph, the wireless, and the great services which have multiplied comfort and pleasure and made life something more than a mere existence?

Has not the time been long overdue for drastic changes in the teaching of history? Why should there not be in every school an industrial roll of honor? The world owes more to Palissey, the potter, than to Napoleon, the emperor; to Sir Humphrey Davy, the inventor of the safety lamp, than to the Duke of Marlborough. When Sir James Simpson discovered the use of chloroform as an anaesthetic he did more for humanity than Wellington when he won the battle of Waterloo. Why not have a new calendar of the world's heroes with the names of Watt, Stevenson, Hargreaves, Arkwright, Kelvin, Edison, Bell, Marconi and the great writers, poets, artists, explorers and reformers who have helped to redeem life from its sordid limitations.

Industrialism has transformed fever swamps into fruitful fields, sent the ships across the seas with their argosies of golden grain; tunneled the earth to make new roads for traffic; removed mountains; destroyed rocks; circled the world with chains of rails connecting continents in the fellowship of trade. There is a great ministry of industrialism—beneficent and beautiful. It is epitomized in the uses of money. Gold cannot buy love, but it can bring comfort to the loved ones. It has no magic to wipe away tears, but it can provide the pocket handkerchief. It may make the home bright for the children and cosy for the old people. The depreciation of industrialism as though it were an invention of the devil and a means of human slavery is as foolish as it is untrue.

Either of the great departments of our industrial life provides a story of romance we do well to learn. Look at the ordinary breakfast table and see what the carrying trade does for man. The chair on which you sit was fashioned in England or the United States, from wood grown in Sweden; the cup containing tea made from the leaves grown in China or India was fashioned from Austrian clay; the sugar was brought from Jamaica; the teapot was made in Germany; the knife in Sheffield; the butter shipped from Denmark; the Quaker Oats or Grape Nuts carried from America; the bread is from Canadian flour; the fruit from California. All these and the rest are only possible through the toil of brain and body of multitudes of men and women who constitute the unremembered fellowship of industrial service.

The industrial system had its rise in the revolutions in agriculture and industry in the eighteenth century. The changes were a complete break of the old order. It was the substitution of machine power for man power. England awoke from her long medieval slumber and started the modern world upon mass production, the quest of new markets and economic wealth. There sprang into being the capitalistic system, and with it a new cry for individual freedom. Adam Smith, the father of modern political economy, was its great exponent. His foundation principle was that trade should be entirely free to go where and how it pleased. Employers and workers had full liberty to make any individual contracts necessity dictated. The results are told in terrible chapters of modern history. The economic gospel as declared in 1820 by the petition of the London Chamber of Commerce against commercial restrictions was: "Buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest." The reaction to that on the part of the workers was: "Do as little work as you can for as much wages as you can get."

Industrialism, with its mass production and specialized work, has taken terrible toll of the toilers. It has made the worker a hand, a cog in the wheel. It has removed interest from labor until the daily round and common task has for millions become monotonous beyond words. Picture the work of the miner for even the shortest working day, far down in the bowels of the earth, breathing coal dust and unwholesome gases, picking upon the face of the coal until again he sees the end of the tunnel and the open sky. Think of the stoker, almost stripped bare, handling his shovel in the glare of the fire, doing his turn, lucky if his eyes are not diseased by the dust and blinding heat. Have you seen the automatic way in which the human bit of the factory machine plies its task? Specialization has necessarily taken the romance from toil and with it the pride from labor. It has intensified the temptations of the world, the flesh and the devil. Who can tell how much drunkenness and vice are the direct outcome of reaction from monotony? Industrialism has created many new diseases and has placed a gulf between classes which may never be bridged.

What has Christianity to do with all this? Of course, there are those who insist that business is business and religion is religion, and these twain, as Kipling's "East and West," never can meet. No doubt some will say, "Let the Church preach the gospel and get the people converted and all the rest will follow." Does this mean that all who name the Christian name have a clear perception of their responsibilities in reference to the corporate life of the community in which they live? Are there no church officials and church members who are actively engaged in the very worst forms of industrialism? Is not the Church herself charged with employing sweated labor? We have heard of the underpaid clergy who live in genteel poverty. It has even been said that Bibles, hymn books and religious papers have been produced at cut-throat prices necessitating starvation wages. Were there no slave owners who were devout Christians?

The modern Church has no claim to give advice to labor, yet the noblest ideals of the labor movement are a part of Christ's teaching which the pulpit has largely forgotten and the pew too frequently ignored.

Many labor leaders were trained in our ranks, not a few are still in our churches; for these brave men ever give God thanks; others have left us because of our failure to apply the gospel to sound conditions. We should humble ourselves as we confess that we have offered platitudes about brotherhood and sacrifice even while we have piled up tainted profits, maintained class distinctions, color barriers and the worship of mammon.

It is quite clear that professing Christians need enlightenment concerning the relation of their holy faith to the employment of labor, and the rendering of honest service in return for wages paid. Christianity has relation to every department of our manifold life. If religion has nothing to do with your business it is because you are in the wrong business or have not the right religion.

There are others who declare that the function of Christianity is to destroy industrialism and create a new social order.

For the purposes of this paper, industrial relations practically resolve themselves into the relationship between capital and labor, involving profit, rates of pay, hours of work, and conditions of employment. At the present time capital and labor have very much the same relations as hostile armies watching each other to see the best point at which to attack. They are well organized in employers' federations and trade unions. The latter now possess among their leaders in England and America men of great ability and organizing genius. Not a few of them have declared for the destruction of the capitalistic system and the substitution of some form of socialism, communism or bolshevism. It is needful to remember the great differences between these competing "isms," and that each is split up into rival theories. Communists and Bolshevists, as far as England and America are concerned, are a mere fraction of the labor world.

Baptists have neither part nor lot in principle nor in sympathy with bloody revolution. We are the advocates of peace between nations and classes. We are disciples of the Prince of Peace at whose advent the angels sang, "Peace on earth and good-will among men." While we cannot be too emphatic in our repudiation of bloody revolution, we take a firm stand upon history and submit to governments and statesmen that the only way to prevent revolution is to give full and equal liberty, religious, civil and industrial. Through all their history the Baptists have been pioneers of freedom. For liberty their ancestors forsook their homes, becoming pilgrims to lands beyond the seas, where they helped to build great nations. They have suffered imprisonment, sore disabilities and even death, but they were faithful to the truths they held in trust, and to-day those who name their name bear the same witness and are animated by the same spirit. They believe their gospel with its industrial implications is the hope of democracy.

Christianity means for us the life and teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is summarized in the New Testament as, "Pure religion and undefiled before God the Father is this: to visit the widow and the fatherless in their affliction to keep himself unspotted from the world." It is the God-consciousness, without which there is no religion. The second element is service for others, and the third, personal purity.

Even a casual reading of the New Testament reveals certain basic principles taught by our Lord Jesus Christ and accepted by His followers with progressive understanding. Among these it will be admitted without question that Jesus taught:

1. The supreme value of the individual soul. "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

2. The obligation of service for others. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." "Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you." "Bear ye one another's burdens." "The strong ought to bear the burdens of the weak and not to please themselves."

3. The stewardship of life. We are not owners but stewards who expect to render an account to their Lord. Some day we shall stand before the Judgment Seat to give an account of the deeds done in the flesh, and surely these will include the getting of money as well as the giving of money.

These principles have resulted in a Christian sentiment which has operated as a new conscience. The application of Christianity to industrial relations has been a steady pressure in public opinion, and in England has resulted in many acts of Parliament restricting the liberty of the strong to take advantage of the weak. In recent times we have seen a great impetus in social welfare schemes, changed conditions under which men and women live their working life; the abolition of child labor; restrictions of the employment of females. State social services in England are amazing in their growth. Last year they cost £300,611,595 from taxation alone. Added to this there were the contributions of the workers and the employers. There is now national health insurance, insurance against unemployment and a great scheme of old age pensions. These were very largely the product of that great Baptist, David Lloyd George.

My beloved friend, Dr. Robert Stewart MacArthur, whose presence we all miss, when last he talked with me in Toronto in the home of Dr. George Porter, gave an account of his interview with that great, courageous American citizen, President Roosevelt, who said: "Remember, a possible good is better than an impossible best." I commend that saying to all reformers.

"An outstanding and present duty of the Church is to convince its members of the necessity of nothing less than a fundamental change in the spirit and working of our economic life. This change can only be effected by accepting as the basis of industrial relations the principles of co-operation and service for the common good in place of unrestricted competition for private or sectional advantage." That, in my judgment, sums up the duty of the Christian community at the moment. We are the advocates of peace, but there will be no industrial peace while capital and labor stand in their present relation. Co-operation must take the place of competition. There is between nations as between individual firms a cut-throat competition to capture markets irrespective of the effect upon labor. There will be no industrial peace until labor secures reasonable guarantees against unemployment—not a state dole for enforced idleness, but a right to work. Labor asks, not unreasonably, for fuller consideration in the direction and control of the industry in which it is engaged.

Some teachers insist we should go farther and demand the extermination of capitalism and the redistribution of wealth. They argue that the Sermon on the Mount involved socialism, though as if fearing the real thing, they describe it as Christian socialism. Canon Barnett used to say there was no need of Christian socialism, because there would be no socialism until all the people were Christian, and then socialism would be unnecessary.

Christian socialism as taught by Charles Kingsley and F. D. Maurice was more a passionate sympathy with the poor than a practical system. Its foundation was emotion, not economics. As a matter of fact, there is no "Christian" socialism any more than there is a "Christian" chemistry or astronomy. Socialism is an economic theory; it may be interpreted by the religion or the atheism of its exponents, but the thing itself is no more Christian or anti-Christian than is capitalism.

The two essential features of socialism are state ownership and control of production and the means and distribution of production. I have not the time to offer anything more than a suggestion upon a subject which will probably be the dividing line between political parties in the near future. At present the great incentive to enterprise is personal advantage. Socialism demands new motive force which the normal man does not seem to possess. The control of production must involve compulsory labor determined by government officials. Could such a state afford its citizens the right to leave the country if they objected to the work allotted to them, and if not, what would be the difference between that and slavery? I do not see much advantage in exchanging wage slavery for state slavery. The millionaire capitalists will be well able to take care of their interests. Socialism introduced by progressive taxation of capital would give time for working capital to change places and credit to be destroyed.

Karl Marx predicted society would be divided into big capitalists and wage slaves; he did not foresee the rise of the limited liability companies with their millions of small capitalists. Lever Brothers of Port Sunlight fame represent companies with one hundred million pounds capital, chiefly subscribed by small investors. The co-operative societies are on a capitalistic basis and have millions of shareholders. Would these be confiscated by the state, and if so, would it not involve civil war?

The task awaiting Christianity is the redemption of industrialism by the principles and spirit of Jesus Christ. That involves the recognition of the personality of the lowliest toiler. He is a man, not a hand; certainly not a hand to grub wealth he does not share. It means the co-operation of all concerned—capitalist, worker and consumer—the partnership of employer and employees in the common service of the community. Under the present phase of industrialism it is almost impossible for the Christian capitalist to give more than a partial expression to his Christian principles. We need a great deal of patience and far more sympathy with each other. The better day is dawning. Industrialism is the product of economic development. It is surely not the last stage of the process; it is never static and final, but as the machines in Rudyard Kipling's great song, can do everything on earth, but cannot abide. Even the machines say in rebuke to our despair:

Though our smoke may hide the heavens from your eyes,
It will vanish and the stars will shine again,
Because—for all our power and weight and size—
We are nothing more than children of your brain!

I believe that the next step will be partnership in the place of the competitive system. Already many experiments with varying success have been carried forward, and we see new ideals animating the younger people. In the Christian Church there is a growing dissatisfaction with the old standard of values and repudiation of the money standard. We have learnt that happiness is the product of service rather than of wealth. There is a vision of the new social order, the new Jerusalem coming down from God out of heaven as a bride adorned for her husband, the state in which there shall be no children crying for food parents are not able to bestow, no cursing from lips tired of asking for employment that cannot be obtained, no prostitution of wealth in useless luxury, but the recognition of a stewardship of possessions.

Let there be no misunderstanding. I have no faith in the redemptive power of any economic system, either individual enterprise or state ownership and control, or as I personally advocate, private enterprise, safeguarded and supplemented by state action which would involve a large extension of the national insurance schemes, old age pensions and the addition of pensions for widows with children dependent upon them, by which means I believe we could mitigate the evils and inequalities and make poverty impossible. No system, however good, will do all that is required. Industrial relationships in the final analysis are largely an affair of the spirit. There is need for good-will; this is not an economic system, but an attitude of spirit and opens the door for the Christian Gospel, which alone carries the secret of the redemption of society.

Who can doubt that the frontiers of the Kingdom of God will be extended as Christians express their creed in the character of their social relations. I believe the new social order is possible if the Christian Church has the courage to apply the teaching and the spirit of her Lord. There shall be a warless world in which men and women shall seek each other's good, for it is declared that the Christ who died upon the Cross that His blood might cleanse the individual from sin will redeem society and make a new earth and a new heaven wherein dwelleth righteousness, and in the attainment of that sublime, redemptive purpose we may be workers together with God.

The Most Terrible Calamity of History

Two Cities Swept Out of Existence by Earthquake and Fire---Tokyo and Yokohama Now Dust and Ashes and Hundreds of Thousands Left Homeless and Foodless---Three Hundred Thousand Dead Means a Hundred Thousand Orphans---All the Country Near Tokyo and Yokohama Full of Refugees and Homeless, Hungry Children.

One of the series of most remarkable photographs yet received from Japan, showing thousands and thousands of bodies in the Ryogoku district of Tokyo, where 32,600 met death when trapped by flames.

Such are the headlines from the daily paper of this week. They underestimate the calamity, for each issue tells a more desolate tale.

DOES EUROPE HATE AMERICA?

DECLARATION

[NOTE—The editors of The Christian Work, without exception, heartily add their names and their endorsement to this declaration, which comes to them from Zurich under date of September 17. The article referred to in this declaration was an advertisement and did not come under the scrutiny of the editors until after its publication. The Christian Work has been the most ardent supporter of the Central Bureau for Relief of the Evangelical Churches of Europe, of which Dr. Keller is Secretary. Its Editor-in-Chief helped organize the Bureau at Copenhagen, and has devoted much energy to its work ever since. We are glad this protest was made.—EDITORS.]

A statement by a correspondent has recently appeared in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, from which the following is a quotation:

"All Europe hates the United States. All that Europe wants, is money. We ought therefore to keep away from a place where we are not wanted, and also keep back our money."

Notwithstanding that in American as well as in European circles this statement was protested against by those acquainted with the public opinion of Europe, the same correspondent in the July 14 issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK repeats this assertion in the following terms:

"Europe hates us for our altruism, for our moral example, for our unselfish sacrifice in the interests of humanity, for the higher moral level of our public life, for our manifest generosity towards suffering humanity, for our prosperity and for our predominant position in the world."

This last amazing statement may be left to the judgment of your intelligent readers, but in the interest of the promotion of friendly relation between the peoples on both sides of the Atlantic, we, the undersigned, feel compelled to make the following declaration:

"From our knowledge of our nations, we know that the assertion of Europe's hate of America is totally contrary to the actual facts. Not only has America engraved herself deeply in the hearts of the public of Europe by its magnificent work of relief, but there is also a universal admiration of its place as the greatest of all democracies and a recognition of the vast service she can render to humanity by the power and influence placed by Providence in her hands. There is therefore a widespread sense of disappointment at America's official abstention from an effective international co-operation, but this feeling is far as the poles asunder from what your correspondent calls 'hate.'"

"The desire and lively hope is prevalent in influential quarters throughout the whole of Europe that America should and yet will take the place due to her in such international co-operation, and we rejoice to know that the great Christian public of America are exerting their influence to bring this about."

"We, ourselves, are convinced that on a close bond of union and a deep spiritual understanding between the Churches of America and Europe depends the progress of the Kingdom of God and the peace of the world."

American Prohibition Through Foreign Eyes

By William C. Allen

DURING a recent eighteen months' tour round the world I discovered that interest in things American was largely centered in our Eighteenth Amendment. Day by day the newspapers of the British Empire have been discussing prohibition. There has been an underlying anxiety as to whether a drinking empire could compete with a sober America. Would long established personal habits have to be abandoned in order to counter American efficiency and minimize the extension of American commerce abroad?

It consequently has been with great joy that most of the newspapers of the empire have hailed "information" which seemed to them adverse to the success of prohibition. When one sees in these periodicals the big ads of whisky and beer concerns he can understand at least one reason for their position. The English-speaking peoples generally are fed on delusive prohibition headlines, endless gibes, inaccurate statements. Much of this anti-prohibition propaganda is silly beyond words.

The "Argus" of Melbourne, Australia, while I was there, had a communication including within it the expression, "A nation that swills its drink like pigs should obviously be deprived of it." This seems to be a general opinion, although the drinking us-ages of America for years have been far less furious than those in British lands. Many newspapers of the empire declare that prohibition is "a complete failure," or "the tide of liquor swamps prohibition," or "the rich flout the law," or "intoxicating beverages are now flowing in torrents over all the borders of the United States."

The gullibility of the English public is, in some instances, severely taxed. The London "Daily Mail," August 31, 1922, had this extraordinary bit of news: "A water shortage has caused concern at Frostberg, Maryland. Consulting engineers report that the dearth of water in the reservoirs is due to the excessive consumption of water by the illicit liquor stills in the town. There are more than one hundred, the engineers say, and they use water at the rate of two hundred thousand gallons an hour." Comment seems unnecessary!

The confederation of some disloyal Americans with unfriendly newspapers abroad may carry with it reproaches on the country we honor and love. In a widely-read Australian newspaper there not long ago appeared a good-sized picture of a strikingly ugly, hatchet-faced narrow-chested, thin-limbed girl, with her finger in her mouth, a leer in her eye, with a bottle fastened to her garter, while under it were the words, "Prohibition dodge—some perfect young ladies in the U. S. A. have more use for their garters than mere ornamentation." I made personal investigation, into the origin of this slur on my country women and discovered that the picture had been sent abroad by a pictorial bureau in one of the great cities of the United States. For a little gain that business concern was willing to bring contempt upon the girls of America. I brought this subject to the attention of the government of the United States.

Questions associated with liquor on ships and the diplomatic negotiations between London and Washington are intently followed. The London "Daily News" of July 31, 1923, and two subsequent issues contained full information regarding a "get-rich scheme" of a whisky-selling baronet, Sir Brodrick Hartwell, who issued a circular regarding "the shipping of whisky to a place on the high seas within fifteen miles of America, and there selling it to rum-runners." Sir Brodrick said: "I am shipping five thousand cases of whisky abroad within the next four weeks and the vessel can carry at least another

LY. COL. SIR BRODRICK HARTWELL

YEOMAN HOUSE,
31, HAYMARKET, LONDON,

Dear Sir,

I CAN OFFER YOU AN OPPORTUNITY OF MAKING A PROFIT OF TWENTY PER CENT. ON YOUR CAPITAL EVERY SIXTY DAYS.

During last year over One million eight hundred thousand cases of good and bad Scotch Whisky found their way into America, where they were sold by AMERICAN dealers at enormous profit. These goods were exported by "Private British Syndicates," financed by men whose names are prominently associated with Joint Stock Banks, Manufacturing Industries and Public Companies. These Syndicates made a profit of over £3,000,000. Probably five times that sum was realised by the American interest which bought the goods on the "High Seas" and distributed them on land.

I have arranged with an American Syndicate to take from me and pay for at least 10,000 cases of high-class Scotch Whisky per month, and as a guarantee of good faith, they have lodged the equivalent of over £10,000 in Government Securities, also £3,000 in cash, to pay for shipping to an agreed point on the "High Seas" where

THE GOODS ARE TO BE PAID FOR AGAINST DELIVERY IN CASH.

My resources permit of me shipping 5,000 cases within the next few weeks, and the vessel can carry another 5,000 cases. Would you like to contribute from £2 15. 0. (cost of one case in bond) upwards, and make 20 per cent profit on your money?

HERE IS MY PERSONAL GUARANTEE TO YOU:

NOTICE.

Please understand this is not a "smuggling" expedition, neither does it in any way conflict with the laws of England or any other country. I sell my goods at sea to those buyers who come alongside to purchase. Some buyers, who can be seen by reference to the enclosed clipping, cover the distance from the sea vessels to New York in "less than two hours."

Now let this sink into your mind. The mouth of the Hudson River, up which these motor vessels travel laden with whisky, is no wider in places than the Thames, and one Revenue vessel stationed midway in the river could stop all spirits from entering New York City, yet 1,800,000 cases of whisky are said to have entered New York last year.

Dozens of bars in New York City are wide open selling beer and spirits. Many high-class restaurants serve wine and spirits on the tables just the same as before the Prohibition Act became "effective."

It will be evident to anyone giving the matter a moment's thought, that if the large quantities of whisky mentioned (in the enclosed cutting) can be brought in from the sea, landed at a dock, transported through the streets, warehoused, and finally distributed to the private consumer, that a huge business organisation with a large American capital must be employed, and that this capital is surely fully protected, opening a sound opportunity for British capital to gain handsome profits.

Barring Marine accidents (in which case I return your money as and when received from the Insurers) I guarantee to return you any money you invest plus four shillings in the pound within 60 days from date vessel leaves England.

YOUR MONEY BACK AND YOUR PROFIT.

You should participate in these assured profits, it being an exceptional opportunity to secure a large return for an investment.

Use the enclosed application form and envelope.

Yours faithfully,

Brodrick Hartwell

SIR BRODRICK HARTWELL'S CIRCULAR

The "enclosed clipping," to which the notice refers, is from the New York "World" of June 25, 1923. It tells of "210,000 cases of liquor on board fleet of fourteen vessels lying twelve miles off Ambrose Light."

five thousand cases." He also stated, "I can offer you an opportunity of making twenty per cent. profit on your capital every sixty days." "The cargo will be fully insured against all marine risks at Lloyd's." I have in my possession one of the circulars issued by this aristocratic rum-runner.

Dr. Chapple in Parliament asked Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs McNeill about this enterprise. The latter, who is expected to represent the views of the British government, is reported as replying, "The whole subject was engaging the attention of His Majesty's government," and that he was "not in a position to say at the present moment what steps should be taken. It was a very difficult matter to decide." Why should it be difficult to decide whether or no it is right to temporize even for money's sake on a question of assisting the law-breakers of a friendly power?

As nearly as I can sense the attitude of most educated Britishers, they are pleased because their nationals make huge money out of assisting American law-breakers, whilst in many instances they really are ashamed of doing so. They are often glad because the illicit business participated in by Englishmen enables them to say, "I told you so—American prohibition can't succeed," and to point to us as a law-despising, boot-legging people. But not a few of them seem apprehensive lest America's predicament, which is largely the creation of British business interests, may jeopardize their efforts to secure American sympathy in the "next war." They recognize that the entrance of America into the Great War resulted in a vast territorial expansion of the empire and are naturally apprehensive lest a hoped-for support of their imperialism may be neutralized by American resentment toward British rum-running.

Some Americans traveling in foreign lands apparently discredit the observance of their laws at home. In the "Metal Mercury" of South Africa, May 23, 1923, appeared a dispatch alleging an interview with George Holden Tinkham of the Appropriations Committee of the American House of Representatives, then traveling in South Africa. He was quoted as saying among other things: "Murders and major crimes have increased greatly." "Arrests for drunkenness in the large cities have reached the figures of normal years before prohibition was adopted." "The American people are coming to the knowledge at last that prohibition was imposed upon them by the expenditure of vast sums of money, much of which was raised by sectarian churches, who in this action have violated the first principles of the American social compact," and so on. He is stated to have predicted "a return to sanity."

I have spoken of the attitude of the majority of English-speaking people in various countries. Let us consider the position of a minority in the same far-flung lands. This minority is largely composed of church people and the success of prohibition in America is to them a burning question.

Visitors to America from England or the colonies have upon returning home frequently declared in letters to the newspapers that prohibition is successful. Some few have denied that such was the case. Temperance alliances have been busy. The South African Temperance Association reports that it requested the Prime Minister of that country to ascertain what effect prohibition has had on the grape-growing industry of California. They report that he applied to the British Ambassador at Washington for information. Space does not permit a copy of his guarded reply. It certainly, as quoted, could not discourage the wine growers of South Africa. The secretary of the S. A. T. A. a few months ago took up allegations made in "The Star" of Johannesburg based on a cable from London and appearing under the headline, "Prohibition fails in America." He cabled the American Secretary of State for facts. In due course he received a reply through the American Consul at Johannesburg denying that President Harding had made the statements adverse to prohibition attributed to him and including these words: "Prohibition and the enforcement thereof is not a failure and the President of the United States has made no such statement." From this it will be seen that our Federal Administration is sincere in its prohibition posture abroad.

While I was in Australia the editor of "The Patriot," a prohibition paper of Adelaide, Australia, when alluding to an incident connected with rum-running in an editorial declared, "The crowning humiliation of it all is that the protection of the Union Jack is claimed for this traffic." He adds, "This is trailing our flag in the mire." The Society of Friends of England, which for nearly three hundred years has so often taken the unpopular side when protesting against wrong, under date May 4, 1923, sent a memorial to the Prime Minister of England expressing its deep concern because of a reply made by Under-Secretary of State Gore in the House of Commons regarding rum-running from the Bahamas, in which speech that official was reported as stating that he would "certainly do nothing to interfere with British trade." The Friends added, "We believe that much harm will come from such actions, and that the good relations between the United States of America and this country are bound to be imperilled thereby." Are the Friends right? Is it not also very important that the prohibition backers of America see to it that they do not let the present situation create within America a spirit of antagonism toward our motherland?

There are two sides to the story. America must retain the position she has assumed, not only on her own behalf, but on behalf of her brethren abroad. We fight the prohibition battle not only for ourselves, but on behalf of millions beyond the seas.

A Doctor for Labrador

After spending several years at his station at Indian Harbor, Labrador, Dr. Henry L. Paddon, one of the hard-working doctors of the Grenfell Mission, is planning to "come out" for the winter of 1923-24, provided the International Grenfell Association, whose offices are at 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, can find a substitute. Here, indeed, is an opportunity for some medically trained man imbued with the spirit of Christian service. Another of the Grenfell stations where medical assistance is needed is St. Anthony, Newfoundland. There Dr. Charles S. Curtis is laboring to serve a vast territory otherwise destitute of professional skill. The hospital lacks a house officer. This position, as well as that on the Labrador, carries with it a fair remuneration over and above traveling and living expenses.

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley of pure food fame confesses that he does not know where any "speak-easies" are, and adds: "I don't believe any other decent citizen knows where they are. If they exist, it is not prohibition that causes them, but a violation of prohibition. You might as well say the increase in the number of bank robberies is due to the law against burglary." Dr. Wiley is as sensible as ever.

Chopin

By Zofia Naimska

[NOTE: Madame Naimska is instructor in the Institute of Musical Art, New York, and one of our best known pianists. She also was director of one of the Polish relief societies during the war and raised much money for the children of Poland.—EDITORS.]

SO MUCH has already been written about Chopin that it seems as if there was nothing left to be said. In this article, however, no attempt is made to present a biography of this Polish genius, nor is it the intention of the writer to repeat what has been told and retold about Chopin's life, music and compositions. It simply aims to present to the readers a few episodes of his private life which are not generally known and several interesting traits of his character, and also to call attention to a touching token of French appreciation which took place a few months ago.

Chopin was buried in Paris at Pere la Chaise Cemetery in 1849 and his remains reposed there. A committee of notable Frenchmen successfully started the agitation to remove the remains of the composer to his native country and thus to fulfil the longing desire of his countrymen and the dearest wish of Chopin himself, who, shortly before his death, said: "I wish that my heart be taken to Poland." His heart was taken to the land it immortalized by love and music. During the war, when the Russians were preparing to evacuate Warsaw, there were rumors that with other Polish national treasures Chopin's heart was likewise to be taken away. Fortunately, the precipitous retreat prevented the carrying out of this sacrilege.

The above mentioned action of the French committee coincides with the revived plan of erection of Chopin's monument in Warsaw. The model submitted by Wacław Szymanowski, one of the most famous sculptors of Poland, was chosen from among many by an international jury of sculptors of eminence. It represents Chopin sitting under a willow tree, the national tree of Poland. It is symbolic. Between the leaves of the widespread branches one can see many impressing faces lightly sketched. They are expressing extreme sadness, from utmost despair to profound resignation, from bravery to poetic exaltation. They seem to whisper in Chopin's ears the wonderful melodies of his incomparable music in which the sublime emotions have found their form of expression. Chopin's face on the monument reflects the emotions inspired by the melodious voices coming from the tree. He seems absorbed with the beauty of a heavenly music.

Chopin was a great lover of nature. We all know him as a man of extreme refinement, aristocratic tastes, shunning the sordidness and vulgarity of life, preferring the atmosphere of a Paris salon and luxurious environment to the simple mode of life. We usually picture him pale and melancholy, his long fingers scarcely touching the keys while playing, a sad suppressed smile on his lips. And such he was. Though surrounded by crowds and friends, he always felt lonely and sad, and to him can be applied the words of Leonardo da Vinci, "Artist, thy strength lies in thy loneliness." But there also existed a cheerful, buoyant, sarcastic, witty Chopin of whom we usually hear but little. Chopin's cheerfulness was always awakened when he happened to be in touch with nature. He felt freer and happier in the country. He did not, however, live an outdoor life, but spent most of his time in his room composing. One of the famous contemporary artists, Eugene

Delacroix, who was spending a summer with Chopin at Nohant, thus describes his impressions in a letter to a friend: "I am sitting on a sofa with a book in my hand. From time to time a soft and fragrant breeze carries the wonderful tones coming from Chopin's window. The smell of the roses and the song of the nightingales join with his heavenly music."

Chopin could be cheerful. It not seldom happened that when in a big company he would join all amusements, laugh and run and, hiding behind a curtain, improvise to all kinds of pantomimes which were performed. He really was then the spiritus movens of the party. He also liked to jest. He made fun of doctors and their prescriptions. In a letter to a friend he says: "I have an excellent doctor. When I ask his advice about hygiene all he says is that I need not lead a regular life."

Cheerfulness was Chopin's characteristic from childhood, and he had ever reason to be a happy child. His parents and sisters loved him dearly, he had the best teachers and his first youth was not clouded by worry or catastrophe. He used to write many a witty little poem, to the great enjoyment of his entourage. A most unusual characteristic of Chopin's genius was that at the age of fifteen he was a mature composer. There was no gradual development, nor did he imitate any composer. He was unique and himself from the start.

The only teacher of composition he had was Joseph Elsner, director of the Warsaw Conservatory, a man of great modesty, immense knowledge and wonderful ability as a teacher. It may be interesting to read some advice he gave to his pupil. He wrote to him: "What is true and beautiful should not be imitated, but felt according to one's own laws—higher laws. We should take as a model neither an individual man nor a nation. Only nature is perfection in itself." Or, "Playing should be only the language of one's own feelings." Elsner knew what a genius his young pupil was, and one of his chief concerns was to give him knowledge without touching his original and wonderful individuality. He succeeded. Chopin remained unique and became immortal.

Robert Schumann considers Chopin's music too nationalistic, but as one of the Polish writers says, "Chopin raises the national inspiration to such a penetrating power that it embraces the whole of humanity." And this is why Chopin's music is loved by all and understood by many. If his music should ever be lost it would create a void which nothing could fill. There would remain a world-wide longing which no other music could satisfy.

Chopin's music was thoroughly national, but this does not mean that it does not carry its appeal to every sensitive heart, under whatever flag it may live. Chopin was creative to the core. He never copied anything. He never wrote down the melodies he heard in the fields nor the mazourkas to whose tunes the peasant folk danced in the country taverns, or took them as a theme for his compositions. No, he only imbibed into his soul the beauty of their simple harmonies and songs—he listened to the rhythms as he had listened when a child to the rustle of the pine trees and the music of the cornfields on the waste plains of Mazovia. Thus he created melodies which had the spirit, the sincerity and the character of national songs, but differed in the new exquisite form and refined musical expression.

There is a belief among the general public that in Chopin's music sadness, melancholy and despair are the prevailing notes. Not many understand and feel the gigantic power of his sonatas, scherzos and ballades, the majestic sweep of his polonaise and the tragic but manly outbursts of his nocturnes. Although his compositions have been played so much in what is unjustly termed a "womanly" style—in soft and subdued wailing tones—and although he has been totally misunderstood by the amateur player, yet the genius of his music remains unchanged. Who can compose such polonaise as Chopin did? And is not the Polonaise in Ab major an expression of the splendid might and strength of his soul? Even in sadness and melancholy, as in Polonaise in C minor, there is no lack of power. Indeed, one feels there the might and despair in a gigantic soul. And it is Schumann who says about his preludes that they are like "eagle wings—bold and proud spirits."

Unfortunately, physical infirmity, especially in the last years of his life, prevented Chopin from expressing himself with all the power and rhythm he felt. As L. Enault says: "He was born to be strong. When one grasped his hand, which seemed so delicate and small, one was surprised to find so firm a grip. It was like the frame of a soldier covered with a woman's muscles."

Chopin did not like crowds, and probably this was the reason why he disliked public appearances. They tired him and seldom satisfied him, despite the tremendous success with which he always met. Being often in pecuniary difficulties, he had to give lessons and taught sometimes as much as seven hours a day. He did not, however, consider it a calamity. Though capricious by nature, he found the necessary patience to teach and rather seemed to enjoy it. His genius never rebelled against it until he felt too sick to endure it any longer, and even then his sense of humor never left him. Of one of his pupils who exasperated him he wrote thus: "I have a pupil who points at a note for a stretch of five minutes with his enormous hand which somewhere in Ukraine probably was used for the whip and reins."

Chopin improvised music with the same facility as one speaks. It came so naturally to him that he simply sat at the piano and "talked" in music, and his friends used to say that in his improvisations he was even bolder than in his finished compositions and showed more swing and daring. He hypnotized his listeners, who admired in silence the masterly execution and nearly superhuman, inspired tones. After having once heard George Sand give a description of the country—a description full of charm and poetry—he sat down at the piano and improvised a genuine pastoral symphony. The fantastic world always impressed him more than the real one and in his vivid imagination he must have pictured the real one as a wonderland.

At a concert in Vienna he electrified his audience by improvising on the stage variations on a theme given him by one of the audience. It was also characteristic of him that he would give musical sketches of the people, especially ladies present. In Paris his fame as an improviser was such that the beau-monde crowded the parlors where Chopin carried them into the highest spheres of beauty.

The premature death of Chopin was a blow to the world, although it was expected for a long time. His strength failed him rapidly toward the end and he became exceedingly depressed. What depressed him most was his inability to play. Delacroix, the famous French painter and one of Chopin's best friends, writes in his memoirs: "Chopin told me that he is tired out with doing nothing—he who loved to be busy all the time and so forget his worries." Though feeling his end approaching, Chopin tried until the last to show the same spirit of cheerfulness and hope in letters to his family. He only begged his married sister in a joking way to come to see him. "I really do not know why I want so much to see you," he wrote. "I am not very well and you will help me much more than the doctors. I will get well quickly and then take you back home and embrace all of you before I have to wear a peruke and a set of false teeth." These, however, were only glimpses of cheerfulness for the sake of his dearest ones, but his longing for music grew more and more as his health failed. He once more tried, like a wounded eagle, to lift his wings and soar into the sun—to sing his last song. He gave a concert in London, but he could not walk and looked like a ghost of himself. His wonderful tone was scarcely audible. A few weeks later he died, on October 17, 1849. With a trembling hand he wrote before dying the following words on a scrap of paper: "This cough will kill me, but I beg you, open my body and be certain that I shall not be buried alive." His very last words were, "Mother, my poor mother."

Chopin's funeral was an enormous demonstration. E. Guinot said that "when one looked at the imposing ceremonies and crowds one would think it was the burial of a king." The grief was general and it seemed as if Chopin had taken a bit of everyone's life and soul with him. Mozart's requiem was sung by two stars of the Paris Opera Company, Mrs. Castellain and Viadot Garcia. And so the beauty of tone, the sweet and wonderful music which was his very life accompanied him to the threshold of immortality. All the great ones, representing many nationalities, were present. Though the crowds and carriages were innumerable, not one human voice could be heard as they all stood near Chopin's grave. His friends threw on his coffin a handful of dust that he had brought from Poland years before. The softly blowing wind was the only sound which broke the silence.

The future will undoubtedly give us many a genius, but there will never be another Chopin.

If I Were a Layman

By Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D.D.

Bishop Coadjutor of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Central New York

PART III—THE FIELDS OF SERVICE.

I WISH that a layman could help the clergy by telling us simply and directly something of his conception of the priest's office. Meanwhile, let me try to show my conception of the layman's. Here it is, then:

1. He will try to master the content (not simply the contents) of the Christian revelation. He will not permit himself to be so immersed in his business, certainly he will not give so much time to his pleasures, as to leave no time for considering higher things. He will be an educated Christian, if he has it in him to be one. But whether he knows much or little, he will try to know Christ.

2. And in prayer and private devotion he will try to live close to his Master. Prayer, for him, will be learning to talk with God, not running to Him to get Him to do something or give something. He will endeavor to develop a real spiritual life; he will also wish his home to be a religious household. For his family, therefore, as well as for himself there will be prayer and devotion.

3. He will give his time and talents to the Church's service. Business ability, if he has it, will be consecrated to the work of the kingdom. He will free the clergy, so far as is possible, for priestly and ministerial work by doing his part in the work of administration and finance. He will seek to find his place in the body—where he is as truly a member as any clergyman. If he cannot find a priest who is a leader, he will at least strive by himself to find something to do; perhaps his enthusiasm will stir the flagging spirits of his rector. He will even teach in Sunday-school—teach, not talk to boys. He will, if he is a vestryman, disprove the ancient jibe which has been thrown into the form of a conundrum, "When is a business man not a business man? When he is a vestryman."

4. If the layman has really tested the Church's faith and worship in his own life, I imagine he will soon be rather keen to have others know about his belief and practice—he will wish to "extend the kingdom." That will make him interested in the missionary work of the church—not merely as extending Protestant Episcopalianism, but as giving to others what he believes to be the fulness of the Christian faith. He will be doomed to some disappointments, because sometimes he will feel that the church's leaders have not the right motive for missions; he will find some of them, apparently, thinking of nothing but the planting of little P. E. chapels in already overchurched communities, or often it will seem that they have become so gently liberal as to give the impression that they are busier about interdenominational schemes of reunion than about definitely "ministering the doctrine and sacraments and the discipline of Christ, as the Lord hath commanded and as this Church hath received the same." But it isn't quite as bad as it looks, and he has, of course, the right to place his gifts where they will do the most good. Moreover, he will try to trust the Church and be loyal to its larger life. He will understand that we have a special mission to the Protestant world which no other branch of the Church Catholic has the same opportunity of fulfilling, and that this very fact is our glory as well as our peril. He will try, for his own part, not to be sectarian in spirit or narrow in sympathy.

Especially towards the smaller churches of his own diocese he will be generous in gifts of money and service. If he is a member of a city congregation, he will remember that its growth may often be at the expense of the smaller places from which the stream of life flows to the town church. He will try to get into sympathetic touch with some of the anxious and worried clergy and the discouraged congregations nearby and warm them into life by his own cheery optimism. Of course, he will be loyal to the church in such movements as have its endorsement, the Nation-wide Campaign, for example. If he doesn't like its methods, he will adapt them in some way to his own parish and try to do "team work."

And as for his own giving—will it be too high an ideal to set before himself the biblical method and tithe his income? At any rate, he will conscientiously examine his expenditure and know how much he spends on himself and how much for the church. When he begins to give with reasonable generosity he will quickly discover the joy of sacrifice.

5. He will be as generous and sympathetic with his own rector as with the general work of the Church; generous in his thought about the financial problems of the clergy and active in interesting others to see that they have "a living wage"; sympathetic in helps and suggestions; not over-critical about preaching, but liberal in appreciation; big-minded in his consideration of all matters of parochial administration, knowing that the "business" of the church should be planned with the same largeness of outlook and readiness to adventure as mark other business enterprises.

6. He will try to learn what Christ meant the Church to be—a wonderful fellowship. And therefore he will be interested in all sorts of people—rich and poor, head-workers and hand-workers. He will always be human; he will try to be lovable and likable. So he will be doing his part to make the church grow. He will do all he can—short of making himself a crank and a bore—to create an enthusiasm for the church. He will not be ashamed to talk about it (much less ashamed to talk without cant about Christ, still less to talk simply about His religion) whenever he sees a chance of winning another man like himself to the life that is in God.

7. His fellowship in the great Christian democracy will make him do his best to carry his religion into his daily life. Whether he is a laborer or a capitalist, he will "regard industry not chiefly as a means of private profit or class advantage, but as an opportunity of service for the glory of God and the good of man's estate." This may lead him farther than he ever dreamed of going; it may make him understand that "churchmen should not commit the fatal error of insisting, on behalf of the Church, on the maintenance of the industrial status quo"; he may even recognize what the Lambeth encyclical suggests, that the present wage system fails adequately to give expression to the Christian principle of fellowship or co-operation in industry. To quote the words of an American layman, "He can test every proposed economical system, including that under which we are living, by the terms in which our Lord has propounded His own system, and in his own little, individual life he can face the two perspectives and can deliberately place first the seeking of God and His righteousness, using business, profession, home life, civic life, public life, as steps primarily to secure that end and only secondarily as means to secure a living. One who does this honestly and continuously, testing the problems of every day by it, will be amazed to see how truly 'all these things,' or enough of them for actual needs, will be 'added unto him,' though the conditions which would produce the full measure of the promise cannot literally be fulfilled."

8. If I put stress on these things it is because I have come to see more clearly in these days that it will rest with Christians to determine whether or not our present industrial, social and economic disorder are to issue in revolution or by evolution change into an order more consonant with the teaching of Christ and into a system wherein it will be made a little easier for men to follow His precepts. And I put the stress there because the adjustment to a more Christian order is distinctly the work of men "in the world"; the clergyman may be a prophet pointing out the path of duty, but it is not his business, nor that of the Church in its corporate capacity to frame programs, set forth plans or offer panaceas for the cure of all the ills of God's people.

9. The faithful layman will carry the same spirit of brotherhood into his relations with his fellow Christians of every name. He will meet them in the spirit of fellowship; he will work with them in many efforts, civic and religious for human welfare. He will try to break down the prejudices which make them, so often, look upon churchmen as narrow and isolated. He will recognize the good in every movement or organization calling itself Christian. Out of common work he will pray that there may come a deeper unity.

10. But he will not expect unity to come through "casting convictions into the discard." He will not be content with what Bishop Gore calls a "federation for mutual toleration or recognition, or a federation for good works, or an amiable condition in which we call one another by kind names." Therefore, he will, so far as he has the intellect for the task, seek to think things through: discover just what the Church is in the mind of Christ; whether the Christian life is possible without the driving power of the Christian faith; whether we are to drift into a unity which recognizes no definite creed and is willing to dispense with sacraments and a certain, sure and valid ministry; whether we are to find unity through a false liberality which thinks nothing worth contending for or by reasoned conviction, cherished as precious because proved so in experience and life.

11. And therefore the layman will try to know what his own church believes. Other men have labored and he has entered into their labors. What gave them the spirit which left him so goodly an heritage? What does the church stand for; not what would he like it to stand for; but what has it really stood for? What has it to contribute to the united Church that may be? And is he anxious that it should contribute all this, now, to his own life? So, is he faithful in its worship? Is he regular in the use of its sacraments? Has he tried to live according to its devotional standards? Has he let the Church's method have a real chance at moulding his life? Has he tried to be a real churchman, or is he a poor sort of nondescript? If I were a layman I should map out a course of reading to guide me in my thinking and ask my rector to give me a list of books to help me. (And if I were the rector I would tell him to read Carey's "Have You Understood Christianity?" and "The Life in Grace," Gore's "Sermon on the Mount," for sane guidance in present-day application of the principles of Christianity, and as many others of the books of both men as I could get him to buy. Whatever I recommended I would be sure not to start him on strong meat before I had tested his digestion on "milk for babes.")

12. All the while he will be trying honestly to use to the full his church privileges (communion, eucharistic worship, "godly counsel and advice" and what goes with it). And knowing that this makes him what he is that is good and can in time make him much more than he has ever hoped to be, he will lead his children in the same path he has chosen. Those boys and girls—does he think seriously and prayerfully of his responsibility for them? In this new day, when all is change and old customs have lost their charm and the new generation is seeking its own in its own way and youth is feeding on excitement—does he ask sometimes how his boy is to weather the storm? Does he remember that he is “a god to his boy”—a god whose feet must not be of clay? Does he pray that his daughter, however wide her eyes may be open to many things the older generation shut out—does he pray that she may come out sweet, clean, wholesome? And can he fail to know—what I believe from the bottom of my soul—that the great need of America to-day is religion?

If he has lived as long as I have he may wish sometimes that he lived in another sort of generation, when the wind had not swept through the windows of his mind and into the pigeon-holes of his brain and blown many of his nicely indexed ideas into a confused jumble. And then he will take courage and instead thank God that he lives in an age when all things may be made new. All things new—and the one thing that is ever new is the old religion, whose substance changes not though it take new form. The old order is indeed changing, giving place to new; but God can still fulfil Himself in many ways. And we are co-workers with Him in the new world that is yet to be. Are we?

An Interpretation of the Labor Movement—VI.

Rev. F. Ernest Johnson

Director, Research Department, The Federal Council of Churches

VI. THE LABOR MOVEMENT AND POLITICS.

PERHAPS the first thing suggested to most people by the title of this article is the corrupt partnership that is often formed between labor leaders and political gangs. There are, it must be admitted, labor leaders who are cheap politicians and who regularly sell out their organizations in disreputable political trading. When a “central trades and labor council” in a large city falls under the leadership of “approachable” politicians the result is one of the most evil alliances that ever disgraced municipal politics. In a municipality the political leaders and the labor leaders have very largely the same constituencies. It is very difficult for the reputable labor leader to hold his own against a barrage of evil influences whose aim is to make him “deliver” his organization for political purposes. But labor’s participation in politics has a very different and more honorable aspect.

The famous reconstruction program of the British Labor Party, “Labor and the New Social Order,” which was promulgated during the war, has been responsible for several attempts on the part of American labor groups to launch a labor party in this country. Programs were drawn up bearing a close resemblance to the great British document, which it will be remembered, was a four-fold platform, or, in its own figure, a house with four pillars: The universal enforcement of a national minimum income, democratic control of industry, a revolution in national finance, and the devotion of the surplus wealth to the common good. One can see at a glance that this is not a labor program in any narrow sense. There is little place in it for the familiar contention over wages and hours. In fact, the parliamentary leader of the party, Ramsay MacDonald, has been warning labor against an unworthy and fruitless preoccupation with those matters. The business of the party, as he sees it, is to develop and carry out a program of social reconstruction for the community as a whole. Bargaining in the workshop, necessary as it is, is often only a “class offensive” on the part of labor; the party program as formulated by British labor is rather a “community offensive.” The leaders of such a party, no matter what we may think of its merit, are not mere labor politicians—they are statesmen.

Thus far American labor has given but little endorsement to the labor party idea. To be sure, the Farmer-Labor Party, which is the present expression of that idea, last November succeeded in electing a Senator from Minnesota. The movement flares up now and then with marked virility. Yet the genius of the American labor movement thus far has expressed itself in a quite different way. The American Federation of Labor has a definite political policy, to which it rigidly adheres, which is hostile to the development of a labor party movement. Mr. Gompers and his associates on the A. F. of L. executive are committed to a non-partisan policy. They regard the labor movement as an industrial phenomenon, and fear that preoccupation with political interests will dull the edge of industrial activity. They believe that labor should seek control of elections by singling out candidates who are its friends. The slogan is, “Reward our friends, punish our enemies.” This policy does not prevent putting labor candidates in the field when no “friends” can be found on the regular tickets. The results of the elections last November seem to have had the effect of fortifying labor very strongly in this position. Opinions differ as to the relative importance of the many factors that entered into these extraordinary results, but labor was able to point to the success of many of its friends and the defeat of some of its enemies.

A commonly voiced grievance against labor is the passage of the Adamson Act of 1916, which secured to train service employees a basic eight-hour day. Regardless of the merits of the measure, many people resented the use of a strike threat to force an act of Congress. Yet it would perhaps be difficult morally to distinguish between this bringing of pressure upon the government by a labor body and the tactics of industrial operators who deliberately incur a stoppage of production rather than yield to a demand for recognition of organized labor. From the public point of view, the result is the same from whatever source the pressure comes.

The general public is probably no more sympathetic toward a labor "bloc" created through non-partisan action than toward a labor party. To support a candidate or a measure in order to further the interests of labor has the appearance of making government the ally of a group or special interest at the expense of the community as a whole. Labor's justification for its political policy is that its aims in seeking special legislation are in full accord with the interests of the whole community. This is the central fact in labor's relation to politics. Nothing is more settled in the minds of workingmen generally than that legislative power to-day is monopolized to a very great extent by property interests. The point is that, whatever the facts may be, labor has no doubt whatever as to the entrenchment of sinister influences in places of power. Labor organizations have their own "vested interests," and such interests are always a potential menace to democracy; but labor at least believes that in furthering the aims of the workers it is championing the cause of "the people." In acting on this theory, labor leaders, and especially legislative representatives, are often, to be sure, very stubborn and quite lacking in imagination. Following the recent catastrophe in Asia Minor the American Federation of Labor took the position that even the most temporary and limited modification of the immigration law to admit refugees would be an act hostile to labor. Preoccupation with a defensive policy has undoubtedly made labor too apprehensive of the approach of an enemy. Yet the attempt to break down protective legislation of every kind has been so insidious that even this unyielding attitude may be understood.

Superficially considered, labor's political program does not seem very constructive or broadly social. But those who take the trouble to inspect—as probably not many of the general public do—the proceedings of a national convention of the American Federation of Labor will find much that is of national and even international scope and importance. Workingmen's compensation is not merely an industrial, but a community matter. The industrial employment of children, against which organized labor takes a resolute stand, is a foe not of the workers alone, but of the nation. The national well-being is likewise involved in the effort to secure minimum wage and maximum hour laws for women workers. The struggle for civil liberties, so hard fought since the war, is closely identified with industrial disputes, but the issue is one of national importance, and every class in society has a stake in the outcome. Labor advocates the creation of a federal department of education. It favored the maternity and infancy benefit bill which became law in 1921. Labor backed the program of the government for the limitation of armaments, and favors American affiliation with the Labor Office of the League of Nations. It would be too much to say that labor is committed to internationalism even in the most ethical sense of that word. There is much less evidence of that kind of idealism in American than in British labor. But more and more labor in America, as elsewhere, is taking a world view of its problems. With reference to national issues, there is an evident lack of well-defined ideals. Organized labor in America seems to have no conviction, for example, on the tariff question. It has not been able to agree within itself on the question of nationalization of the coal mines or of the railroads. Its political offensive has rather taken the form of resistance to some particular proposal which was considered to be hostile to labor's industrial interests. On the other hand, there are not infrequent evidences of a political idealism and the consciousness of a national mission which have become so dominant a feature of the British labor movement. When Henrik Shipstead of Minnesota was finishing his campaign for the United States Senate he was asked by a news reporter what he counted on to bring him success at the polls. He answered that he expected to be elected by the force of public opinion. "Very well," said the reporter, "but public opinion is for sale, and you haven't the money to buy." But Shipstead replied: "In this case public opinion is paid for; thousands of farmers have paid for it with their farms, and thousands of workmen have paid for it with their homes." Regardless of all questions of partisan alignment, here is a clear indication of a strong social consciousness inspiring a political campaign. Labor has likewise played an important part in the new "progressive" movement in the West.

Broadly speaking, it is hardly too much to say that labor's attitude toward the government and toward political institutions is determined not by class consciousness, but by citizen consciousness. Not uncommonly, workingmen inherit their politics just as most other people do. But even the most politically aggressive elements in the labor movement, with the exception of the inconsiderable radical groups like the I. W. W., are seeking not to weaken or destroy or capture the political power of the state, but to make it serve democratic ends. On the whole, it must be admitted that the American labor movement has demanded little of the government in the way of special favors. One of the most prominent members of the A. F. of L. executive recently repudiated in the name of the labor movement the idea that labor needs or desires the advantages of class legislation.

The American labor movement, then, maintains an aversion to independent political action and to working class political movements on the one hand, and a critical attitude toward the dominant political parties on the other. It is not uncommon to-day to hear politicians of long standing party connection make light of the old party system and commit themselves rather to a non-partisan effort for the election of honest leaders and the development of constructive programs. It is impossible to say whether or not the diminishing significance of the dominant parties as rival political machines may yet give rise to a strong labor or farmer-labor party in the United States. In any case, there is evidence that the strictly class struggle is giving way to a struggle whose aim is the advancement of the interests of the whole community, a struggle in which labor participates heartily, but which draws its leaders from men and women of all classes, political and industrial. There is a growing alliance between hand workers and brain workers, and an increasing emphasis upon justice and the national well-being.

The "Manufacturers' Record" points out one element in the anthracite mining situation of which the public generally is unaware. Thirty-four years ago the Pennsylvania Legislature passed a law requiring that no man might become a certificated miner in that State who had not had two years' practical experience in the mines of Pennsylvania. He must also be able to answer intelligently and correctly in English at least twelve questions about the work of the miners. The law means that Pennsylvania miners have a monopoly on mining anthracite, for the two years' residence requirement makes it impossible to bring in men from outside to take their place.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Local Church Unity in Operation in Rural Communities

By Elizabeth R. Hooker

of the Staff of the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys

A LITTLE girl studying geography was distressed because a perfectly good mass of land—the largest, indeed, in the world—had been cut in two by the Suez Canal. Her teacher pointed out that in comparison with the earth, the canal was nothing but a scratch, not interfering at all with the unity of the continent beneath. And the child was comforted.

A good deal like this is the division of the Church into sects. The underlying realities about which we all agree are infinitely bigger than the superficial points of difference. Between the denominations there is no gulf fixed. For a few centuries past the fundamental unity has been subordinated to the dividing trenches, but at last the emphasis is changing, and in a surprisingly large number of places Christians are laying bridges across the moats. Others would like to do so, if they only knew how.

This paper is intended to help those in such uncertainty by describing experiments in local union made by certain town and country churches investigated by the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys. It will not attempt to give a comprehensive view of the movement. Desirable as such a monograph would be, the requisite materials have not yet been collected, or even to relate in detail the experience of these churches. The aim is simply to present such facts as may be of practical service.

The ball has been set rolling in a number of cases by decreasing membership in two or more churches serving together a community declining in population with consequent difficulty in raising money for separate church budgets, even where programs included only traditional activities. In two cases a fire that our grandparents might well have considered providential eliminated a superfluous church building. In time the men and women with the most vision and leadership began to talk over the folly of doing the same thing for two or three groups of Christians and for each so imperfectly. In one instance the matter came to a head through a chance meeting of three deacons of as many churches at a street corner. In course of time the matter was usually brought up at business meetings of the various churches and committees were appointed for mutual conference. In most cases the movement had to contend with bitter opposition. Aged church officers clung to sectarian doctrines, to lifelong associations with one local tabernacle, and perhaps, unconsciously, to their own positions of authority. Ministers of strong sectarian bias welcomed the prospect of union only if the members of all the other church would enter their own. Denominational officials were not always complaisant. Though in one instance the district supervising officers each bade their congregations go ahead if they had enough Christianity to carry out such a plan, yet much more frequently at least one of the boards refused approval to union unless the resulting organization was to be in name, ownership of property and every other essential particular a church of their own denomination. Opposition both local and official often lasted for months. In at least one case the strife was so bitter that when union was adopted some of the opposing faction moved away from town. Heated debate sometimes proved an advantage to the movement by insuring its being thoroughly canvassed and by stimulating the loyalty of adherents. Certain united churches that succeeded in enlisting only part of the churches of the community experienced prolonged hostility from churches staying out of the union. The minister of one openly declared his intention of killing the federation. He did not succeed; in fact, such opposition frequently serves to keep the united church braced to heroic efforts. Certain federated churches seem to be winning over the forces opposed to them.

Some of the combinations investigated, instead of arising from a synthesis of former competing churches were organized in districts recently settled by people with many different denominations where there was need of centralized work in evangelism and community service, in some cases over an extended outlying area. Under such circumstances there was less difficulty in getting together.

Co-operation sometimes began with union meetings held for a period of months to see how well people could work in double or triple harness. Or there were adopted terms of federation binding only for a fixed period, perhaps for one year. Sometimes, though not invariably, the experiments resulted in permanent unions.

In several cases there was difficulty in deciding how to combine forces. Sometimes a constitution was borrowed from a church in another community; sometimes advice was asked from a denominational leader or the editor of a religious periodical, or enlightenment was obtained from some printed book or article. The type of combination finally adopted was often the result of compromise or of being barred from the alternative at first intended. For example, two churches intending to federate, being opposed by both denominational boards, thereupon formed themselves into an independent church.

The churches studied fall into three of the four or five recognized types. Several are denominational churches so modified to make it possible for them to receive into membership Christians of all the Protestant denominations represented in the community. The creed of these churches includes only the great essential doctrines accepted by all Protestants. The method of reception is variable, candidates being immersed or sprinkled according to their own convictions. A number have a separate roll for "affiliated" or "open" membership intended for persons unable to subscribe to all the tenets of the church in question, yet desirous while in the community of allying themselves with the community church. A certain church on absorbing a small neighbor elected the deacons and other officers of the smaller church to similar positions in the augmented organization. Compromise is practised in details concerning the order of services, and in preaching and conference stress is laid not on points of difference, but on matters of agreement.

Churches of strong sectarian loyalty desiring to co-operate often united as a federated church. Under this arrangement each component part keeps its separate membership roll and continues to send money to its denominational board, with which it remains in full fellowship. Some of the federated churches, besides denominational rolls, have provision for receiving new members that so desire into the united church only. Pains is usually taken in electing church officers to give equal representation to the different denominational elements. In local matters the number of functions performed co-operatively usually increases as the people become used to acting together. The terms of federation are set forth in a formal constitution.

Union churches, independent of denominational boards, sometimes arise in long settled districts from denominational opposition to federation. They are found still more frequently in newly settled regions where the people vary widely in denominational affiliation.

Whichever type of combination is adopted, the new enterprise is likely to be confronted with puzzling problems, for it is too soon for the technique of such organizations to have been standardized. Some of the most common difficulties are connected with property. The buildings may still be owned and kept in repair by separate churches forming a federation. More than one may still be used for services, the one more easily heated being chosen in winter and in summer the larger, or one provided with a pipe organ. One organization arising from the union of two churches has moved both church edifices to a more convenient site, combining them into a building with quarters for worship, religious education and social life. Other united churches use one of their buildings, still in its old shape, for certain departments of the Sunday-school. A united church resulting from the combination of three component parts uses one of the three buildings for church purposes, has transformed the second into a gymnasium, and plans to present the third to the community as a library. Sometimes an extra church edifice has been converted into a community house.

If the buildings are devoted to different uses, there often arises a desire to administer them in common. At least two methods of facilitating this are in operation. Some united churches appoint a common board of trustees, who lease from the separate church organization the property of each. In other cases—none of them, however, among the churches studied—a community church is organized as a “holding company,” which concerns itself with all matters connected with the real estate.

Many of these churches find serious problems connected with benevolences. For the independent churches it is a question as to how to stimulate the members to take their share in the evangelism of the world as a whole in the absence of denominational machinery for applying the funds. For the federated churches it is a problem how to divide their funds so as to meet separate and unequal denominational assessments. Some of them have, besides the common treasurer for local expenditures, separate treasurers for each denomination represented. One church that tried this plan has recently substituted for the separate treasurers a single treasurer for all benevolences, and instead of meeting assessments divides all benevolent contributions on the fifty-fifty principle. As one denomination is both stronger and richer than the other, this indicates a growth in the spirit of co-operation. In other cases there is for each denominational group a missionary committee, who superintends the collection of the funds to be sent to each board. Another plan is to print on the pledge cards a column for each denomination, listing the causes presented by the several boards so that each contributor may apportion his subscription. The constitution of the church using this plan provides that the treasurer “shall keep an exact account and pay the money to the cause or institution to which it belongs.” Still another method is to provide on each envelope for benevolence a space for the name of the denomination for which the money is intended. Some federated churches find that the absence of ministerial leadership in collecting denominational benevolences renders it harder to raise the assessments. In one case, on the contrary, the minister, carefully comparing the denominational contributions of both sections of his church with those of other churches equal in membership in both denominations, found the per capita contribution of his own federated church to be unusually high.

The selection of a minister satisfactory to all elements is provided for in various ways. In one case a man who before federation served the smaller church, being acceptable to the larger church, was asked to become the first pastor of the united organization. The constitution of certain federated churches provides that their ministers shall belong alternately to each of the denominations represented. The wording in the case of a federation including elements of two denominations calls for such alternation “as long as there shall be two members belonging to” one of the denominations represented, thus betraying what the founders believed would be the future of that federation. Other churches, instead of alternating, choose a minister of a denomination different from any represented in the union. In still another case the constitution provides that the denomination of the minister “shall not be made known, or at least shall not be the chief factor in the decision.”

In regard to combining their subordinate organizations, newly formed united churches are apt to move slowly. The first to be merged are often the Sunday-schools, since it is easy to foresee the advantages in greater efficiency and increased enthusiasm. Most united churches soon consolidate their women's societies. Young people's societies are frequently amalgamated from the first day of union. Slowly, as people live along together in their church life, each party finds the other easier to work with than they dared to expect, and more and more parts of the work are performed in co-operation.

The united churches, representing if not, as in many cases, the whole community, at least more than a single element of it, and being composed, in the nature of the case, of people of progressive and altruistic outlook, are not satisfied with working merely for themselves, but undertake an unusual amount of service for the community. Sometimes they organize work for a “larger parish,” providing Sunday-schools and preaching services for outlying neighborhoods. Sometimes they build a community house in which they direct many social and educational activities. In other cases, their special work for the community is in the line of religious education.

The federated and otherwise united churches have many problems not discussed here, since the data presented come from the experience of a comparatively small number. Doubtless other such organizations have found out what to do about that serious obstacle in the way of combining forces—the conditional endowment. Others may have learned how to render certain individuals willing to have the church in which they were baptized converted into a community house, instead of being kept empty and useless out of sentiment, while the young people seek questionable recreation elsewhere. If so, will they not share their experience?

Some Missionary Teachings of the Psalms

PSALM 67:1-7

"Let the peoples praise Thee, O God; Let all the peoples praise Thee."—Psalm 67:3.

POETRY gets its hold upon thought and feeling where prose fails. One has said, "If I may but make the songs of a nation I care not who makes its laws." Song books are more powerful than law books. Luther understood the value of verse and music. The doctrines of the Reformation were put into hymns and were sung in triumph over Europe. People to-day are more familiar with the Psalms than other parts of the Old Testament because their rhythm enables them to be easily memorized. They have a larger place in public worship than other Scripture. These things give them a peculiar influence over the religious life of our time. They were likewise of peculiar influence in the religious life of Israel. They were the most effective means found for spreading great truths and fixing them in the minds of the people.

Missionary enthusiasm is the splendid flowering of the teachings of the New Testament, but, like many another Christian excellence, its roots reach down into the old dispensation. From it the Jew learned respect and esteem for foreign peoples. But not all of the Old Testament teachings were of a nature to inspire such feelings. Some were of a character to inspire hate rather than regard toward other nations. Not all parts of the Jewish scriptures were of equal spirit and nobleness. There are some Psalms that breathe out cruelty and vindictiveness. This attitude had its provocation in the terrible wrongs which Israel suffered. But it was a passion of the human heart which needed to be repressed rather than stimulated. Had the ancient Jew given the imprecatory Psalms the foremost place in his thought and adopted their spirit as the foremost motive of action his life would have been debased rather than ennobled. He had to choose between the higher and lower teaching even as men of every time have to choose between the higher and lower in the mass of things which is set before them. Not until one has power to separate the better from the base, the higher from the low, and follow it is he really under the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

The greatest of the Psalms are the missionary Psalms which breathe out the spirit of good-will toward all nations. The natural tendency of the individual is toward narrowness, egotism and selfishness. The tendency of a nation is even more naturally toward these things. Patriotism easily produces national vainglorying and an attitude of exclusiveness. The Jew had greater reason for hating foreign nations than we have to-day. He had suffered more from alien peoples than we have suffered. He had less of commercial and intellectual acquaintance and contact with them. The surprising thing is that he ever rose above this attitude. How came he to the nobler passion? The secret of Israel's kindlier spirit toward the nations was its God. There is no greatness of the Jewish nation whose source may not be traced to the greatness of the Divine Being whom it worshiped.

In early times Jehovah was the God of Israel alone. His power was thought of as confined to its own land. That was the entire field of his activity. Gradually the sphere of his action and concern was enlarged. The idea came to the prophets that Jehovah was using Assyria and Egypt as agents for executing punishment on the nation for its sin. This involved some kind of authority over them. The fuller implication of this thought was quickly seen and followed, that he was supreme over all the world. "Jehovah is a great God, and a great King above all gods." Next came the assertion that his power would become so manifest that all nations would acknowledge him as God and worship him. There was something of egotism and chauvinism in this declaration. That Israel's God should take precedence over all the earth was a way of asserting the pre-eminence of the nation. Sometimes the fealty of other peoples was conceived of as one to which other nations would be constrained by defeat in battle. But in the Psalms with which we are dealing national egotism and the idea of constraint are left behind and the devotion of the peoples to Jehovah is a willing, glad devotion.

*"Let the people praise Thee, O God;
Let all the peoples praise Thee.
Oh let the nations be glad and sing for joy;
For Thou wilt judge the peoples with equity,
And govern the nations upon earth."*

The thought is that his reign will be one of justice and peace. The peoples are thought of as escaping from the tyranny and wrong from which they have so greatly suffered and coming with joy under the dominion of the King of kings. He will accept and acknowledge their allegiance.

In the One Hundredth Psalm we go a step higher. The thought of Jehovah as the loving Shepherd of Israel is a common one in the Old Testament, but here it is asserted that he is the Shepherd of all the peoples. All are the great Shepherd's sheep and are dear to him. The theme of this lesson may be taken to be "Jehovah, the Shepherd of all nations." It was a lofty and daring thought for the time when it was set forth. God's thought and heart are large enough to include all the world. Of a like significance with this Psalm is the declaration of Isaiah that "Israel shall be a third with Egypt and with Assyria, a blessing in the midst of the earth." To these nations is assigned equal part and honor with Israel. Amos asserts that the Ethiopians are as dear to Jehovah as the people of his own nation.

Jehovah the loving Shepherd of all nations is the same in meaning and significance as the universal fatherhood of God. Both declare that the heart of God is as big as the world, that none are left out of his thought, that men of every race and condition are dear to him. This truth is the foundation-stone of all missionary enterprise. Missions are the expression of brotherhood. No adequate or sufficiently powerful sense of brotherhood can be had without the truth of God's universal fatherhood. No other truth gives such value to human lives. No other imparts more of compassion. If the foreigner and the outcast are of value to God then they must have value for us. To worship God truly is to gain the attitude toward the peoples of the world which he has toward them. We, like the writer of these Psalms, worship a God of compassion toward all the earth.

Respect for the peoples of the world is the first effect which is produced by this teaching. There are races which are uncivilized. There are those which possess traits which are repugnant. There are peoples guilty of cruel and wicked practices. But when it is seen that they are all God's children and dear to him they are changed in our sight. We no longer despise but honor them. We no longer shun but seek them. It is natural to care nothing for millions of persons on the other side of the globe whom we have never seen, but when we realize that God is their Shepherd as well as ours, then our interest and concern follow his to the uttermost parts of the world. Every soul has as much worth as it has in the sight of God. With the truth of God's universal fatherhood we leave behind the sin of cold disdain. Men see that they must not treat with coldness and contempt that for which God cares. The lesson which these Psalms teach has not yet been fully learned by mankind. God is not a provincial or a tribal God. He is the God of all the world. God has a use and a place for all the nations. God does not choose one nation for a position of great honor and bestow upon it peculiar privilege at the cost of withholding his regard and concern for others. He purposes good not alone for one nation, but for every nation. A genuine spirit of brotherhood exiles conceit. It sees that others have abilities and capacities. God has given his gifts to all. He is able to develop out of rude and uncultured peoples wonderful instruments of his truth and grace. "God is able of these stones," said Jesus, "to raise up children unto Abraham." Again and again he has chosen the foolish to put to shame the wise, the weak to put to shame the strong, the base to put to shame those claiming to be righteous. Some now despised people may in the future attain to the position of leadership of the world. Unless we respect other peoples we cannot act toward them as Christians.

A second fruit which the truth of the fatherhood of God bears is service. Its proper place is after the lesson of respect has been learned. To serve while really despising the object of our service is not a heavenly but a diabolical act. It never helps but always harms. Pity taken alone is no adequate motive for philanthropy. We must have power to see the gold that lies beneath the dirt and misery. Charity which does not recognize others as the Father's children, and as such as of equal honor with the giver, is not charity of Christian quality. World-wide brotherhood means world-wide service. We have a God who has world-wide love for mankind. To worship him is to become like him. Human kindness kindles its great passion from the heart of God. Because he loves we must love all mankind. Because he ministers we must minister. When Emperor Constantine was founding Constantinople and his officers expressed amazement at the large plan for the city which he traced he replied, "I must keep on till the God who goes before me stops." So we may set no bounds to our love and service except such as God himself may establish. In going out to minister to the world we are only going where his love has gone before. God is a missionary. In the twilight a little child came running to his mother saying, "O mother, God has just hung out his service star." God has a right to hang out his service star. He is the great servant, and it is because he is such that his followers become great servants. Like him they exclude none from the range of their graciousness and kindness. This is what the worship of a universal God involves. It means the inclusion of all mankind in our love. We cannot have God for our God upon any lesser terms.

Both missions and democracy have their only solid foundation in the great truth of the universal fatherhood of God. Democracy, too, is the respect for mankind which springs from the sense of brotherhood. We seek to be democratic, but our democracy lacks much if we have respect only for our fellow citizens. Missions are the larger and fuller democracy of spirit.

It is fellowship, brotherhood, which the world needs. It is brotherhood that shall remove the jarring discords between class and class, nation and nation, and bring an enduring world-peace. It is brotherhood that is to remove ignorance and misery from the earth. The needed sense of brotherhood we shall not get until we more truly worship God as the universal Father and as the loving Shepherd of mankind.

OLIVER D. SEWALL.

IN GLASGOW

A sturdy youth from the North settled in Glasgow and arranged terms with his landlady. These were to include a meat sandwich and a flask of tea to take with him to work, as it was impossible for him to get home at mid-day.

"Was your piece to your liking," the landlady asked on the first day, and he replied: "There was awfu' little breid."

The next day she gave him four slices and still he complained. On the third day she cut a loaf in two, put a piece of ham in the center, and put the "sandwich" in the little leather bag in which he carried his food.

"Was it a' richt the day?" she asked when he came home.

"O, it wasna bad," was the reply, "but I see you're back to twa slices!"—The Wall Street Journal.

CHAPLAINS NEEDED FOR THE NAVY

By Rev. E. O. Watson.

Secretary, Federal Council of Churches, General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains

Existing law permits 151 chaplains for the present enlisted strength of the Navy. Careful study of the need for chaplains shows that while there is no immediate need for the total number (151), there is decided need for 120 to 125. At this writing there are only eighty-four chaplains in commission. For several years the position has been firmly held by the Department that appropriations would not permit an increase in the number of chaplains, although there was unquestioned need. Recently authority has been given to bring the number up to one hundred during the current fiscal year. This means sixteen new men to be appointed. While this number will not fully meet the needs, the appointment of so many additional chaplains should give new impulse and added efficiency to spiritual ministry for the men of the Navy. Much as they are needed, however, men will not be appointed just to fill a place. The Navy desires and deserves the best young men of the ministry for the chaplaincy. A man in service needs, and should have, a spiritual ministry equal to the best "back home." No pastorate at home, no mission field, whether at home or abroad, offers a finer field for service. Naval men and officers touch from time to time the ports of the world. Their influence is potent. Every chaplain has a supreme opportunity second to none in the ministry of the Church. If the Church fails to furnish such ministry there is a serious breakdown in the plan of religious education. If our young men of the ministry fail to respond to such a call a great opportunity for service in the kingdom will be missed.

The General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains, co-operating with the departments, asks your help in finding just the men needed. The men and officers of the Navy should have the best ministers the church can provide.

Navy chaplains should be well educated, having not only a college degree, but a full course in some theological seminary. It is also highly desirable that they should have experience in work for men and in athletics. The type of man required is virile, red-blooded, broad-minded and genuinely consecrated; tactful and a good mixer, but standing foursquare and not easily led away by surroundings. He must be a real man and a man's man. Such a man will appeal to officers and enlisted men alike. The Navy desires and will accept only the finest and best-equipped men for chaplains.

The maximum age limit for chaplaincy in the Navy is thirty-one and one-half years. One enters with rank of junior lieutenant; after seven years' service is promoted to lieutenant; after four years as lieutenant, or eleven in all, to lieutenant commander; after which time promotion is according to record by selection. At present the highest rank to be reached is captain, which corresponds to that of colonel in the Army.

That the right men for the chaplaincy may be found leaders of the churches are urged to suggest young men who will meet the qualifications of the chaplaincy and be fitting representatives of their churches in this vital service. The committee would ask that names of men thought to be qualified for this service be sent to the undersigned that correspondence may be entered into. Young men who are equipped for such service and who desire to make investment of their lives in this high and fruitful ministry are also invited to correspond with the undersigned.

THE BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE MEETING

[We have already published some account of the great meeting of the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm. The following letter from Dr. Harry S. Myers, who recently got back to this country, has much of fresh interest in it. Dr. Myers is one of the secretaries of the Northern Baptist

Board of Promotion, and is in charge of its very extensive stereopticon department.]

The Baptists of Sweden celebrated their seventy-fifth anniversary' in a three days' meeting before the Baptist World Alliance met in Stockholm, Sweden, July 21-27. It was a great transformation that had come over Stockholm and Sweden in these seventy-five years. The first Baptist was exiled. These were welcomed by the city, and men of every Christian faith made them feel that Baptists were the kind of people Sweden delighted to have. One Swedish Baptist in every six hundred is a foreign missionary, and seven were commissioned at one of the most impressive services ever witnessed on the second evening. These are now on the way to the Congo in Africa and to Shantung, China.

The Alliance Congress met in a Free church. Welcomes came from the Prime Minister, who was present in person, from the Archbishop of Upsala, from the city, and greetings were read from the King, President Harding and Lloyd George.

The first session was impressive because of the roll-call. As the countries of Asia, Europe, North and South America, Australia and Africa were called, the delegates stood while their spokesman gave a word of greeting. The Russian delegates from the Evangelical and Baptist group came out of great tribulation and sang as a part of their response a song that told of a man in great trouble—literally in a hole—who prayed the Lord for deliverance. One of these delegates was released from prison by the Soviet Government to permit him to attend the Congress. The Letts furnished color to the scene as they sang the hymns of their country, dressed in native costume. The largest delegation outside of Sweden came from England. This delegation came on a steamer and lived on it, anchored in the harbor, during the Congress. The American Northern Baptists furnished the second largest delegation.

There were several remarkable sessions. The first will be remembered longest by those who had not realized the extent of the Baptist brotherhood. The sermon by Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, of London, on Sunday night in the Cathedral at Upsala, the Archbishop having given the invitation, was a remarkable meeting. Here among the tombs of kings, prelates and scientists was felt the common interest of all in Christ and the greatness of the Christian fellowship. The ties between the state and free churches were greatly strengthened in these days, and plans of fellowship were extended.

Sunday afternoon thousands gathered around three platforms in Hagaparken to hear the Christian messages given by delegates from many lands and translated into Swedish. Relief work in Europe, of which American Baptists have done so much, was given a place sufficient to show its value and the continued need. As one met and talked with the delegates from Central Europe, France and Russia he was ever reminded of the horrors of war and revolution that have swept this ill-fated land in these last few years, and became more and more conscious that only an enlightened Christian conscience interpreting the spirit and meaning of Christ for every human relation is competent to bring the relief that is so greatly needed.

The meeting on mission work, to show comity among Baptists and with other communions and to plan for a better and larger work, did much to help all to see the greatness of the evangelical task, and the meeting, addressed by representatives from the non-Christian lands, gave vivid emphasis to their need.

The present status of women in Christian work was discussed freely and frankly, and great interest was manifested in the American idea as advanced by Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery. The Old World is not ready for many of our ideas as to the place of women, but on the other hand they show an awakening interest in these new movements. The place of young people in the work of the church and the belief that all types of Baptist work must be harmonized and co-ordinated was agreed upon without dissent.

The Congress was a "mass meeting," with delegates from various Baptist bodies without any representative delegation. Its sessions were conducted in English, and followed the English forms of procedure in many respects. Business therefore was a subordinate matter and not much seemed to be on the program. The election of officers received considerable attention. Robert Stuart MacArthur was the president at the time of his death a few months ago. The sessions were presided over by representatives from different countries. Dr. E. Y. Mullins, of Louisville, president of the Southern Baptist Convention, was elected president; Dr. J. H. Shakespeare, of London, secretary for the Eastern Hemisphere, and Dr. C. D. Gray, of Lewiston, Maine, secretary for the Western Hemisphere. Dr. Shakespeare, who has done much in the last fifteen years in planning the policies of the Alliance, is anxious to work in fellowship with all other communions, as is Dr. Gray.

One of the interesting resolutions was that on peace, which read as follows:

"1. The members of the Baptist World Alliance, meeting in Stockholm, recognize with thankfulness that there are many signs of hope on the far horizon in spite of the fact that the war spirit is still at work among the nations. The sense of the horror and wickedness of war has burnt itself deeply into the heart and conscience of all the members of our churches.

"2. The Congress urges the members of all Churches throughout the world to pray for peace, to counterwork everything that is likely to provoke Governments to act against each other, to foster kindly and just judgments upon each other; to cleanse the educational books of all nations of all racial and national antagonisms especially in their writing of history; and to kindle admiration for the leaders who devoted themselves to the deliverance of the oppressed, the healing of the diseased, and the service of all. Further, the Congress believes that the cause of peace would be furthered by international church conferences and the meeting together of Christian people of different nationalities in the interests of brotherhood and good-will.

"3. The Congress earnestly desires that all the nations should be brought into co-operative efforts to secure peace through a representative Tribunal or Court for the Settlement of international quarrels.

"4. This Congress, representing millions of citizens and belonging to different governments, appeals to the governments of the world to make the maintenance of peace their first aim, for the sake of each nation and people, and for the sake of the happiness and well-being of mankind."

The declaration adopted by the conference (printed in THE CHRISTIAN WORK of September 1) was voted to be neither a creed nor a standard, nor a test.

The greatest thing in the Congress was the fellowship. The provincial American was constantly having his eyes opened to the greatness of these Europeans, even if they could not talk the American, or even the British, type of English language. The courtesy, the strength of character, the humility of the Swedish leaders was a constant source of surprise and a lesson to many. The British-American delegates held a luncheon together, and later a company of Americans visited the British steamer. As a result a little organization was perfected to help secure better acquaintance and fellowship through an exchange of visits, letters and papers. All this means greater fellowship for the Christians and larger work in the future. Baptists as never before are united, and are conscious of the greatness of other Christians, and have a greater longing for fellowship with all who love the Lord.

On Saturday evening, after many delegates had gone, about one hundred met in Skansia Park as the guests of the Swedish friends to talk missions. It brought us closer together than any other session and means a better mutual understanding for us all in the future. The two factions in Russia agreed to unite. This will mean an organization of at least 1,500,000 Baptists there.

The next session of the Alliance in 1928 will be held in Toronto.

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. relaxed, there would be a blending of the two races, which, for many of the more populated Southern states, would mean a mixed blood population; hence, the determination of the whites to maintain the caste of color and to keep the Negroes as near the old "hat-in-hand" type of pre-war days as possible. He says: "So long as the Negro behaves himself" in the South he is safe"; but as Negroes more and more grow in intelligence, power and independence, and assert their equality, the more resolutely will they be resisted by the white man.

He holds the theory that as the percentage of the Negroes in the population becomes small, they tend to be absorbed and to disappear. The writer sees, therefore, in the South no amicable adjustment of relations between these two races since "the South alone among the Nations is to-day making a fight against a universal ethnological law of race-blending." Others may not agree with his arguments and conclusions. "Can actual warfare be avoided?" He believes so, and advocates two measures of amicable solution for the Southern situation: (1) Negro migration to the North, East and West, where Negroes will be a very small percentage of the total population, and will gradually be eliminated by absorption; and (2) colonization in Africa by revival of colonization societies and possibly by the support of the Federal Government for all Negroes who wish to take this means of escape from American democracy.

The Program You Need

World's Temperance Sunday, November 4th

AN ENLIGHTENING REVIEW

Sunday-schools, Young People's Societies, Churches and people in general will be interested in the program which is prepared for World's Temperance Sunday. It consists of music, recitations, a dialog, responsive readings and articles dealing with world conditions. It is one of the most concise, comprehensive and suggestive programs to be had anywhere, and will be especially timely, as the election of Congressmen, Senators and Governors involves the subjects of prohibition and law enforcement.

These programs now ready will be furnished upon application, and will be equally adapted to patriotic and religious services.

A LONG MARCH

This story harks back to a little girl who played about a parsonage forty years ago. At morning prayers the family sometimes sang the old hymn—

"I'll away, I'll away to the promised land,
When my Father calls me to meet Him in the promised land."

Little Tabitha had never heard "I'll" used with the twist which it has in that line. The only word that she thought of was the church "aisle." Tabitha was one of six children. The oldest brother, a shy little boy, used to show his embarrassment in walking up to the family pew toward the front of the church by screwing on his feet at each step. Tabitha conceived of her brother's method of locomotion as "aisling." You see the picture. People walking down this narrow, almost indefinitely long aisle which ended in the glory of the "Promised Land," everyone of them screwing as he went. Such was Tabitha's vision whenever the family sang "I'll away, I'll away to the promised land."

THE FALL OF THE GERMAN MARK

Last week, Wednesday morning, it took three billion German marks to make one dollar; Wednesday afternoon one could buy from four and a half to six and a half billion for the same dollar. The German government presses are prepared to issue five and ten billion mark notes. Perhaps they already have brought out twenty, fifty and one hundred billion mark notes. No wonder the butcher, baker and candlestick maker do not want to take such money. On the Wednesday of which we have spoken people had to pay a half billion marks for a pound of meat or sausage in the butcher shops; a twenty-four-ounce loaf of bread cost eighty million marks, and the next day one hundred and ten million; a twelve-ounce pound of butter cost six hundred million; potatoes were seven and one half million marks per pound, and grapes one hundred million. A mark now is worth only a fraction of a Russian Soviet ruble, one-seventh or even less. The Polish mark is now worth six thousand times as much as the German mark. That is a measure of the financial disintegration of Germany. A week ago the Germans had 8,600 trillions paper marks outstanding. The complete break-down of the medium of exchange means that everyone who had depended upon a fixed income is left completely stranded. Many of the middle class are joining the bread line because they have no money to buy food. Indeed, it is difficult to see how even the workman's wages can supply his needs, since money worth two dollars to-day may not be worth forty cents a week hence. Of course, it is partly on account of the economic crisis which has come with this break-down of the mark that the Germans have suspended their constitution and made Stresemann constitutional dictator. Only the extreme Nationalists and ultra-reactionary anti-Semitic groups did not attend the session in which he was granted that power, but those who attended voted almost unanimously for the law creating the dictatorship. It was carried by a vote of 316 to 24. With his new power Stresemann can make a great many changes in the law without submitting the plans to the Reichstag. He cannot, however, increase the length of the working day. Germany now fully recognizes that she must make terms with France and Belgium.

THE CITIZENSHIP CONFERENCE AT WASHINGTON

The great Citizenship Conference, planned by the Federal Council of Churches in order to help educate the nation as to enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment, has been a very decided success. Because of the character of the speakers and because they have dealt with prohibition problems first-hand, and often without gloves, the conference at Washington received an immense amount of publicity. The outstanding speech of the first two days, so far as reaching the nation at large is concerned was one by Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania. A good part of the failure to enforce the Volstead Law he laid at the door of politics. To prove his point he detailed something of the story of the Federal prohibition directors in Pennsylvania. The first two, he said, were Democrats selected for political reasons. The third director, a man named McConnell, was known to be against the Eighteenth Amendment when he was appointed. His appointment was promptly followed by a release of many hundreds of thousands of gallons of whisky on permits which it was alleged were fraudulent. He said that, a little later, McConnell and his assistants were indicted for the release of this whisky. "McConnell's performance," Governor Pinchot said, "was precisely what must have been looked for by any one who knew him. It is difficult not to believe that what he did was expected and intended by the power to which his appointment was due." McConnell's successor made a record "which offers no chance for praise." The next man was removed when his work had scarcely begun. The present director, Major William G. Murdock, "is the first in the history of enforcement in Pennsylvania to whom the State may look for real results." Governor Pinchot well insisted that officials themselves should observe the law and drove his dictum home by saying, "Washington has set the bad example, and it is for Washington to repair the damage." F. Ernest Johnson, head of the Research Bureau of the Federal Council, and Dr. Charles Stelzle reported the results of their survey of the liquor situation. Immediately after the Eighteenth Amendment was passed the consumption of liquor and the social symptoms that accompany its use suffered a sharp drop. Since 1920 there is evidence that the use of liquor has been increasing. "The former high level has not been reached, but the trend is unmistakably toward it." President Coolidge himself is as strongly committed to the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment as was President Harding. But to a considerable extent the solution of the problem lies with the average citizen. If he insists that the prohibition law be enforced, it will be enforced.

THE CHURCH AND THE KLAN IN OKLAHOMA

As outsiders look on at the remarkable episode in progress in Oklahoma they may forget that the people of Oklahoma are not very different from the rest of us. The State has, to be sure, made itself ridiculous by passing a law to limit the teaching of evolution within its borders. But for all that many men and women in the State look at public questions with level eyes. Oklahoma, we may expect, will not only take a thoroughly American attitude toward Governor Walton's attempt to turn dictator, but will deal intelligently with the Ku Klux Klan. It is hopeful to see that the Church, through some of its representatives at least, has been giving the people of the State very good counsel in regard to the Ku Klux. We have received, for instance, a copy of a sermon preached recently by Dr. George S. Fulcher of the First Presbyterian Church of Okmulgee, Oklahoma. A few quotations will show the spirit in which Dr. Fulcher approached the whole problem:

If the [Roman] Catholic Church is in error, either as to doctrine or polity, and I believe it is greatly in error as to both, and if you wish to combat that error, there is but one way holding the possibility of success. So present the truth of your religion that the conscience and will of the Catholic shall be won to your position. You never can change a man's faith by persecution. If your order, and you know better than I do, is endeavoring to bring the pressure of social and business and professional ostracism upon Catholics and Jews and aliens in this country, you are in an un-American order, no matter what your statement of principle may say. If your order is not anti-Catholic, anti-Jew, anti-alien, then you should see to it that the propaganda of half-truth which channels down through your members, ceases. The principles of the order set forth a faith in free speech. If that is not an empty boast, you should be fostering the freest discussion of your activities and purposes. . . . You know whether those who have criticized you behind the closed doors of your order have incurred your wrath. If this institution of which you are a part deals with the public welfare in such a way as to shrink from investigation, it is an un-American institution. Your order stands for white supremacy. . . . What is the possibility of the overthrow of white supremacy in Oklahoma and the Nation? Here is a race of people less than one hundred years out of slavery, who need kindly help and patient development that they may find a place fitted to their capacities for useful and respectable service among us. I appeal to you as a churchman, is the attitude taken by your order toward this race the attitude that you think Jesus Christ would sanction.

The significant thing is that the local press very generally approved what Dr. Fulcher had said. People everywhere respond pretty well to what is just and fair, once it is made clear to them.

AMERICAN EDUCATION WEEK

Some good people have conceived the idea of devoting a week to getting the American people to think about education. The President has approved the idea and has issued a proclamation recommending the observance of the week beginning November 18th as "American Education Week." The President's proclamation ran in part:

From its earliest beginnings, America has been devoted to the cause of education. This country was founded on the ideal of ministering to the individual. It was realized that this must be done by the institutions of religion and government. In order that there might be a properly educated clergy and well trained civil magistrates, one of the first thoughts of the early settlers was to provide for a college of liberal culture, while for the general diffusion of knowledge primary schools were established. This course was taken as the necessary requirement of enlightened society. . . .

We have observed the evidence of a broadening vision of the whole educational system. This has included a recognition that education must not end with the period of school attendance, but must be given every encouragement thereafter. To this end the night schools of the cities, the moonlight schools of the southern Appalachian countries, the extension work of the colleges and universities, the provision for teaching technical, agricultural and mechanical arts, have marked out the path to a broader and more widely diffused national culture. To insure the permanence and continuing improvement of such an educational policy there must be the fullest public realization of its absolute necessity. Every American citizen is entitled to a liberal education. Without this there is no guarantee for the permanence of free institutions, no hope for perpetuating self-government. Despotism finds its chief support in ignorance. Knowledge and freedom go hand in hand.

In order that the people of the nation may think on these things it is desirable that there should be an annual observance of Educational Week.

Now, therefore, I, Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim the week beginning on the eighteenth of November, next, as National Educational Week, and urge its observance throughout the country. I recommend that the state and local authorities co-operate with the civic and religious bodies to secure its most general and helpful observance, for the purpose of more liberally supporting and more effectively improving the educational facilities of our country.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN PERU

The President of Peru is so ardent a clerical that he attempted last spring to get the Peruvian Congress to adopt a concordat between Peru and the Vatican. The concordat would have re-established in Peru the status there before 1910. Practically it would have destroyed religious liberty and closed all non-Romanist public worship. But the Peruvian Congress would not approve the concordat. The Roman Catholic archbishop then conceived another scheme for accomplishing the same end without having to submit it to the "godless" Congress. Last summer, with the President's approval, he announced that he was going to consecrate the whole Peruvian people to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. That meant that every Peruvian would be understood individually to have committed himself to "the Sacred Heart." The students of the University and the five thousand workmen who are in university extension courses immediately protested. They arranged for a procession and public meeting. As the procession marched up the streets of Lima it was halted and fired upon. A student and a workman were killed. The government soldiers tried to get possession of the bodies, intending to give them a quick and secret burial and so prevent any demonstration in connection with the funeral. But the students and workmen secured the bodies and all night long, more than a hundred strong, they guarded them inside of the University building. They threatened to burn the University sooner than surrender the bodies. At two A.M. the President of the Republic came and called off the soldiers. The next day something like ten thousand people formed a great procession at the funeral of the martyrs. Soon after notices appeared that the plan to consecrate the population had been given up. The archbishop himself took an early ship for Rome.

A NEW BINDING STONE BETWEEN MEXICO AND UNITED STATES

Thirteen American students and educators were among the three hundred and five students attending the summer school of the National University in the City of Mexico this year. The thirteen Americans were led by W. I. Kelsey, the student Y. M. C. A. secretary of Michigan. Most of his associates came from the same State. Casting about for some plan which might express international friendship, the Americans conceived the idea of erecting a statue to the memory of the two greatest citizens of Mexico and the United States—Benito Pablo Juarez and Abraham Lincoln—to be placed somewhere along the border. At the reception given to the summer school students at the Young Men's Christian Association in Mexico City, Mr. Kelsey presented the project to a cosmopolitan audience of six hundred. His listeners received it enthusiastically. President Obregon also has approved it. In order to make it count for as much as possible in the way of educating the people of the two countries the committee in charge of the plan suggests that the money for the memorial be raised by the school children of each nation. The Mexican Secretary of Public Instruction,

Jose Vasconcelos, has appointed the Inspector General of Teaching to work out some method of carrying out the plan so far as Mexico is concerned. The summer school students appointed a committee consisting of Dr. Harry T. Collings of the University of Pennsylvania, Dr. Guillermo Hall of Boston University, Prof. C. Scott Williams of Hollywood High School, California, and W. I. Kelsey, to take up the plan in America. The Mexican papers have already brought the project before the Mexican public. It now remains to acquaint the teachers and children of this country with it. The monument as proposed would represent the two great men clasping hands across the border. It might carry some such inscriptions as the following, in Spanish and English:

Lincoln, by whom slavery died, and thee, by whom "America has produced two heroes, Lincoln and thee: Liberty lives."—Victor Hugo, in a letter to Juarez.

"Friendship is the bond which holds nations together."
—Aristotle.

"Respect for the rights of others is peace."—Benito Juarez.

"With malice toward none, with charity for all . . .
let us strive . . . to achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."— Abraham Lincoln.

A joint committee representing the students and educators of both nations will have charge of the campaign. The whole scheme is an excellent one. It would indeed be well if we in America were better acquainted with Juarez. He was a man of very great devotion. In the dark days when Maximilian and his French followers held Mexico he played the patriot, despite all obstacles, danger, poverty, loneliness. He won independence for Mexico when it seemed an impossibility.

THE INCREASING CARE OF THE CHURCH FOR HER MINISTERS

By the first of this year the churches and Christian people of this country had subscribed more than sixty-five million dollars for the endowment of pension and relief funds for aged ministers, missionaries and their widows and orphans. The Congregationalists, as the report which will be presented at the meeting of their National Council in Springfield this month will show, have thus far collected more than seven million dollars for this purpose. That is an increase of more than ten-fold in ten years. In 1912 the invested funds of the Congregational Ministerial Board were $642,771. Nearly as much as that has come into the board's treasury in the first seven months of this year. In 1917 the Congregationalists determined to mark their celebration of the tercentary of the landing of the Pilgrims by the foundation of a Pilgrim Memorial Fund of five million dollars. Two years ago, at their meeting in Los Angeles, the National Council decided that the fund ought to be eight million dollars, in order to meet the increased cost of living. Already more than four and one-half million dollars has been paid into the fund by over a hundred thousand subscribers and there is nearly two million in subscriptions still to be paid. The Congregationalists, like some of the other churches, have for their retired ministers, etc., both a pension system somewhat in the nature of old age insurance and a system of grants. Any minister who is a member of their pension system, called the Annuity Fund, pays in an equivalent of six per cent. of his salary. The new Pilgrim Memorial Fund, however, lightens the burden for the men of smaller salaries. The income of the Memorial Fund provided in 1923 ninety per cent. of the dues of ministers whose salaries were $1,340 or less; sixty per cent. for those whose salaries were $2,000, and fifty per cent. for those whose salaries were $2,400. Beginning with his sixty-fifth birthday, the minister who becomes a member of the Annuity Fund at the age of thirty will receive an annuity for his own life equal to about one half the average salary upon which he has made payment, or a joint life annuity which will cover his wife's life as well as his own equal to about two-fifths of the average amount of his salary. In the event of his death before that of his wife, her annuity will amount to three-fifths of what they received together. The local church is expected in each case to pay one-half of the annual dues for its pastor. Of the fifty-six hundred Congregational ministers in the United States over eighteen hundred are already members of the Fund and eighty-three ministers and widows are now receiving annuities. The Annuity Fund for Congregational ministers now has an annual income of over three hundred and sixty thousand dollars and its assets amount to eleven hundred thousand dollars, forty per cent. more than last year. Its assets should go on increasing rapidly for some years to come. The Congregationalists also have a Board of Ministerial Relief with which thirteen State boards co-operate. These boards have now invested funds of approximately two million dollars and received an income of two hundred and forty thousand dollars last year. According to their last report, they were paying pensions to seven hundred persons, aged ministers and widows and orphan children. It would seem the logical thing for the Congregationalists some time to unite their various boards and funds for the relief of aged ministers and others. The record of the Congregational churches in caring for their aged ministers in the last decade is encouraging, but they must not for that reason rest on their oars.

THE JOHNSTOWN AFFAIR

On August 30, 1923, a Negro, apparently crazed with bootleg liquor or drugs, fired upon police officers, killing three and wounding three others at Rosedale, a small settlement in the outskirts of Johnstown, Pennsylvania. Rosedale is a settlement of Negroes and Mexicans employed at the nearby steel and coke plants. Only one Negro, himself previously known as a "bad man," did the shooting. There seems to have been nothing of a riot or attempted riot on the part of Negroes, though the press reports gave a quite different impression. On the night of the shooting and the next morning the police arrested from nearby houses more than twenty colored people or Mexicans as suspicious characters. Some of them were fined on that flimsy ground and ordered to leave town. They left. The morning after the killing of the officers certain elements of the population of Johnstown talked of reprisals. However, the city police took precautions and called in members of the State Constabulary for counsel and help. No more trouble arose. The Ku Klux Klan burned fiery crosses on a hill opposite the city on the night of the tragedy and again a week later when it was reported that the mayor had issued an order that the Negroes who had not been resident seven years or longer should leave the district. The action of the Ku Klux Klan naturally stirred up the Negro population very much. Many respectable and law-abiding Negroes in Rosedale denounced the crime of their fellow Negro. A Negro minister, speaking for the Negro voters and their white friends, said: "The issue when boiled down rests with the lawless elements of our city," because "the general consensus of opinion of Johnstown's rational, unprejudiced citizens, both white and colored, is that the cause of the recent deplorable occurrence in Rosedale was the laxity of the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment." The constituency of the leading Negro church, Cambria Chapel, A. M. E. Zion, expressed sorrow for what had occurred and asked that city and county authorities put forth every effort to close the places of vice and dissipation and the sources from which drugs were procured. More than a week after the murders one of the newspapers announced that Mayor Joseph Cauffiel had made the following announcement: "For their own safety I am ordering all newly arrived Negro citizens at Johnstown to leave town. . . . I have worked over our Negro problem in Johnstown and have kept on the job night and day during the last week trying to work out a solution. My mind is made up: the Negroes must go back from where they came. They are not wanted in Johnstown." The Associated Press also reported that he had ordered all Negroes who had not been seven years in the city to leave. That seems to be a legally impossible suggestion. What right did any mayor have to prescribe where free Americans should or should not live? The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Federal Council of Churches sent telegrams of inquiry and protest to the Mayor and Governor Pinchot. The Pennsylvania Federation of Churches and the Federal Council's Commission on the Church and Race Relations sent representatives to Johnstown to study the situation. The Mayor denied emphatically that he had ordered the Negroes who were not seven years in residence to leave. He said that he advised them to leave for their own good. He said, "that on the night following the shooting of the officers the center of the city was crowded with angry citizens, and that automobiles ready to go to Rosedale lined the streets; that he had to use every power of persuasion to prevent their going en masse to shoot up and burn Rosedale." He also stated that should a police captain who had been severely wounded, die, he feared that the white people would burn and shoot up Rosedale and another Negro settlement named Franklin; that the city had only fifty-four police, and that even with the help of the police of a local steel company, little could be done against thousands of armed, angry citizens. There is little evidence apparent to support these statements. The very fact that the mayor of the city should say that he could not prevent deeds of violence would seem to make him also a particeps criminis in cases where there was violence. A man of sterling courage would declare that if there was any movement toward a riot he would, if necessary, bring in all the forces of the State of Pennsylvania in order to maintain peace. Mayor Cauffiel certainly gave the impression that he had ordered the Negroes to leave the town, and a local resident who knew the situation estimated that between four and six hundred Negro men who had lived in bunk houses and tenements actually went, many of them leaving good jobs in the steel mills and coke ovens nearby. To-day in Johnstown relations between the colored and whites are apparently normal and friendly. We have to thank the Federal Council's Commission on Church and Race Relations and the Pennsylvania Federation of Churches for a dispassionate report of the event. Such reports greatly help to secure justice to all the parties in a dispute.

The Anglican Reunion Proposals

SINCE the issue in 1920 of the famous Lambeth Appeal to the churches representatives of the Anglican Communion and of the Free Churches have held three conferences for the discussion of the memorable document. The last conference was held on July 6th. Since that conference a memorandum, presented by the Anglicans, has been in private circulation. On Tuesday, September 18th, this document was presented to the Federal Council of the Free Churches, where it received long and careful consideration, at the end of which an answer was made. The publication of the Anglican document and the reply of the Federal Council of the Free Churches creates another landmark in the Christian Unity Movement.

The Anglican Memorandum deals at great length—almost exclusively—with the status of the Free Church ministry, which is the crucial issue in the whole case. The Church of England writers of this memorandum intimate at the beginning that they are prepared to go much further than the Anglican Communion has ever gone in the recognition of the validity of other ministries, but they want it understood right in the beginning that to them “ordination” is one of the most holy, fundamental and important orders of the Church, of divine origin and significance, therefore they wish it to be understood that whatever they have to say about the Anglican ordinations, they have in mind “ministries that rest upon a long-established order, which have been conferred by some solemn and authoritative act implying ordination to the ministry of the Universal Church, and not merely commission to the ministry of a particular denomination, and which are regarded as involving a life-long vocation.” Having thus made quite explicit what they mean by ordinations, they proceed to state their attitude toward Free Church ordinations. The significant thing is that they go further in recognition of these orders than the Anglicans have ever gone before, just as the Lambeth Appeal went further in recognition of the Free Churches as real parts of the Church than they had ever gone. The signers even go out of their way to reiterate in separate paragraphs their faith that the ministers of the Free Churches they have in view are “real ministers of Christ’s word and sacrament in the Universal Church.” Here are the exact words:

“Such Free Church ministries we find it impossible to regard as ‘invalid,’ that is, as null and void, or as effecting none of the purposes for which the ministry has been divinely ordained in the Church of Christ. Indeed, we wish that the terms ‘valid’ and ‘invalid’ could be discontinued, involving, as they seem to do, a knowledge of the Divine will and purpose and grace which we do not possess, and which it would be presumption to claim.

“But we consider that we are entitled by manifest tokens of Divine blessing which these ministries possess, and also by the spirit and the terms of the Lambeth Appeal about them to go further, and to say that we regard them as being within their several spheres, real ministries in the Universal Church.

“It seems to us to be in accordance with the Lambeth Appeal to say, that the ministries which we have in view in this Memorandum, ministries which imply a sincere intention to preach Christ’s word and administer the sacraments as Christ has ordained, and to which authority so to do has been solemnly given by the Church concerned, are real ministries of Christ’s word and sacraments in the Universal Church.”

We feel sure that the heart of every Free Churchman must have beat faster as he read these words, as did ours. At last our Anglican brethren were graciously acknowledging a fact patent to the whole world, namely, the validity as well as effectiveness of orders in other branches of the Universal Catholic Church, and thus the chief and last obstacle to reunion was in the way of being removed. But our high hopes were dashed to earth by the succeeding words, words which to us, as to the Council of the Free Churches, as will be seen in their reply, invalidate all that has gone before, if they do not actually contradict it. For after having made these remarkable and to everybody who knows Anglican history surprising concessions, the Memorandum proceeds to point out that the custom and tradition of the Church of England is that of episcopal consecration or ordination, and then there follows this unequivocal clause: “Thus the Anglican Church is bound to secure this authorization of its ministers for its own congregations, and no one could be authorized to exercise his ministry among them who had not been episcopally ordained.”

The Free Church Council received the communication with great seriousness. They recognized its gracious words and they rejoiced that their Anglican brethren recognized them as real and true ministers of the Word and Sacrament as they themselves had always recognized their Anglican and Roman Catholic brethren in the ministry as real and true ministers of the Word. In their reply they took occasion right at the beginning to express in most cordial terms their appreciation of the declarations regarding the validity of Free Church orders. They called attention to the fact that the Lambeth Appeal itself had spoken of these ministries as possessing "spiritual reality" and as having been "blessed and owned by the Holy Spirit as effective means of grace." But their brethren in this memoranda had gone much further: "It is now explicitly said of them (a) that they minister the Gospel of Christ, (b) that they minister also the sacraments, and (c) that they are within the Universal or Catholic Church." This was a great step forward, and they go on to say: "If the recognition thus so unmistakably given in words were translated into unmistakable actions a great and difficult problem in reunion would be within sight of practical solution."

Alas, this is the trouble, and the Council of Free Churches had to reluctantly admit and say that the clause insisting on episcopal ordination nullified all the gracious words of recognition. For it denies the validity of all extra-episcopal ordination in the Church Universal. The contradiction contained in the Anglican statement is one the Council of Free Churches did not touch upon. It is this: the Anglican signers insisted that these Free Church ordinations which they recognized as real must be ordination into the Universal, Catholic Church, and then proceed to treat their own ordination as to a sect. ("The Anglican Church is bound to secure authorization of its own ministers by episcopal ordination.") The Council says, and rightly, that "the plan contemplates and even insists on, for the exercise of a full ministry within the Anglican Church, precisely that plan which would be followed, and which is followed in the cases of persons possessing no kind of ministry—namely, episcopal ordination." That is, after recognizing the Free Church ministers as real ministers it virtually says that they must be considered as ordained candidates for the ministry and submit to reordination into a sect before they can minister there, although they are recognized as real ministers in the Universal Catholic Church. To quote again:

"This means that what has just been conceded in the most satisfactory language is not to be given effect to in practice. Any question—either on the part of the Anglican Church or of that of the Free Churches—of 'irregular' or of what may be regarded as 'defective' denominational commission is quite another matter, to be dealt with in its own proper way; but that way certainly is not ordination to the ministry of word and sacrament in the Church of Christ of a man already acknowledged to be in that ministry. All this seems to us manifest and even axiomatic, and we are unable to believe that the position which at one moment acknowledges that Free Church ministries are 'real ministries of Christ's word and sacraments in the Universal Church' and at the next requires nevertheless that those in them must be ordained in the ministry of that very word of Christ and those very sacraments of Christ—that such a position will be found one on which our Anglican brethren, with consistency of thinking and acting, can permanently stand."

The Federal Council does not want to drop conference with its Anglican brethren, but it expresses emphatically the opinion that there is really nothing now to be done to achieve unity except for the Anglican Church frankly to meet the Free Churches on the question of ordination. Nothing stands in the way except the refusal of the Anglican Church to recognize the real validity of orders outside its own fold. The Free Churches do—there is nothing further left for them to do. They feel that about as much has been accomplished by discussion as well can be, and that the time has now come for actions, deeds: "The Federal Council makes the above comments on the Memorandum which it has received in an entirely conciliatory spirit toward what it recognizes to be a friendly as well as a sincere statement. In the interests of union, the representatives of the Free Churches have endeavored to meet their Anglican brethren at every point as far as they could do so without sacrifice of vital principle. The question of ordination is the place where we look to the Anglican Church to meet its Free Church brethren. The Council has felt that, after three years of fruitful conference, it could express its mind on this subject, as it has done, with perfect frankness. This movement towards reunion has now passed the stage when it can be dealt with simply by discussion. We have come to the crucial issues, and must deal with them with clearness, courage and charity. The Council adds that the recognition of Free Church ministries given in the Memorandum which it has considered enforces the contention which the Council has more than once emphasized, that the deliberations over union in conferences and committees should be accompanied by practical action."

Expert Investigation on Reparations

LOYD GEORGE has put France's attitude in a nutshell in defining what the invasion of the Ruhr means. It is an attempt to get the milk of reparations while killing the cow for the beefsteak of security. That the payment of interallied debts depends on the payment of reparations is obvious to all. It is as true, but less obvious, that disarmament and world progress are bound up with reparations and debts and with the whole attitude of Poincaré in subsidizing buffer states, preparing a large African conscript army and in failing to understand the philosophy of a debtor nation's capacity to pay. America is profoundly concerned in helping our good friend, France, to get expert information on this subject.

The volume of nearly four hundred pages, just issued by the Institute of Economics in Washington, entitled "Germany's Capacity to Pay," is the most thoroughgoing discussion of the philosophy and data of the question that has appeared. The large resources of the Institute, founded by Brookings and endowed by Carnegie, have supplied means for that exhaustive investigation which Secretary Hughes urged and which Poincaré has declined. It behooves thoughtful Americans, wearied with this perplexing subject which threatens the possible breakup of Germany, and the continuation of European misery and unrest, to study carefully the main points brought out by the disinterested experts of the Institute, which has among its officers and trustees Arthur F. Hadley, A. Lawrence Lowell, Paul Warburg, David F. Houston and others of like eminence. The following statements are largely quotations or paraphrases of statements of this enlightened analysis. The book is not pro-German and scarcely touches the political, ethical and psychological aspects of the question. It is concerned chiefly with the philosophy of reparations, about which ten thousand heated editorials have confused the public mind.

A nation may pay its internal debt very much as a corporation or individual pays its debts. The payment of foreign debts bears no analogy to this. Much mental confusion has come from confounding the two types of debts. Government financial administration involves many complications that do not occur in paying private debts. An individual pays domestic debts with money gained from sale of goods. A nation can pay hardly any foreign debts except by money derived from its excess of revenues above ordinary expenditures. When a government owes its own people, it can pay them with surplus money derived from taxation. This can only slightly be done in paying foreigners. An understanding of what is involved in converting available domestic revenues into means of foreign payment is needed to understand the problem of reparations.

When internal debts are paid no money leaves the country, the total merely changing hands. The total supply of gold in Germany at the close of the war was $560,000,000. In 1923 it was around $250,000,000, about enough to pay reparations for six months. The total production of gold in the world from 1492 to now is little more than half the sum which the reparations commission exacted.

Attention has often been called to France's alacrity in paying the indemnity of 1871. There is a popular notion that she paid this off in less than two years by her energy and thrift. True, she effected adjustments acceptable to Germany, but the French government borrowed in one way or another practically all of the funds used in paying Germany. Taxes were not increased even to meet the increased interest charges. France has never entirely got rid of this indemnity burden, but has been carrying it for fifty years. The French people never did through economy and heavy taxation liquidate the indemnity. Their present annual interest on this indemnity at three per cent. is 165,000,000 francs. This is a startling revelation to most people. The total paid by France was only about one-sixth of what Germany has already surrendered.

For a time, Germany could exchange paper marks for foreign currency and bills of exchange which the reparations commission would accept. But unless Germany could ultimately redeem paper by gold, foreigners would not continue to buy her paper. The maximum of purchases by foreigners of Reichsbank notes between 1919 and 1921 is estimated at three billion gold marks. The money received by the reparations commission was not necessarily gold, but bills of exchange that could be converted into gold. But the mark sank lower and lower and foreign purchases ceased.

In the long run, current production in Germany is the only source out of which payments can be made. She must annually produce large exports. Whether payment is in cash or in kind, the debtor nation must export goods across its borders. If France were paid in bills of exchange from America, which bills were payment for German exports, France could not get gold from America, for there is too little even here for such transaction. France must turn those bills into goods from some country. Thus, even cash payments are really payments in kind. Not only must there be exports, but there must be an excess of exports over imports. Germany's exports must annually exceed $14,000,000,000 gold marks to meet the cost of reparation.

Ray Stannard Baker quotes from the secret minutes of the Council of Ten at Paris in 1919 the "immortally stupid words of the French Minister of Finance: 'The Allies had never agreed to supply raw material. The devastated countries would never agree to raw materials being supplied Germany, where the factories were still intact, until their own industries had been re-established.'" If Foch's urgent proposal then to take the left bank of the Rhine had been carried out, added to Alsace-Lorraine, Germany would have lost eighty per cent. of her iron ore, thirty-three per cent. of her smelting, thirty per cent. of her textile industries and had great losses in the wine industry, mines and railroad traffic. It was assumed that Germany could make the bricks of reparations without the straw of raw materials.

It is a great fallacy that a nation's capacity to pay is measured by the excess of annual production over annual consumption, however true this may be of the individual. Only such part of the annual production can be turned over to a foreign nation as is in exportable form. There may be increased wealth in the debtor country in railroads, canals, buildings, and so on, which cannot be turned over. German construction with labor and materials obtained at home and paid for in paper money by private individuals has been excoriated as producing wealth which might have gone for reparations. Every high school boy ought to be taught to refute such shallow criticism. The excess of exports over imports is the only true measure of what a nation can, year after year, actually pay abroad. If the Allies took German railroads, traffic would be paid for in unacceptable paper money. The same result would ensue were attempt made to enter Germany and collect her general revenues.

Four widespread fallacies are refuted in this remarkable report by the Institute of Economics: 1. That Germany can pay the Allies by borrowing from the United States and from neutral countries. 2. That Germany can pay by delivering to the Allies reparation bonds and the discounting or sale of these bonds in neutral markets. 3. That Germany can pay by delivery to the Allies of the securities of German corporations. 4. By transfer to the Allies of title to property, lands, houses, castles, and so on. The refutations are too long to report in detail, but are based on the futility of getting any real values except from exportable products paid for in money acceptable to the Allies. One exception is when Allied purchasers of real estate leave their own country and occupy their land purchased; but if they remain in their own country and want to get income from this property they can receive it only by exports from Germany, as its money would be worthless.

The importation of raw materials and foodstuffs was seriously hampered by restrictive and punitive legislation to prevent the export of capital, until finally permission was given to retain abroad such portion paid in foreign currency as was needed for future purchase of raw material. Guaranties and control agencies will prove of no avail if they do not increase German exports relatively to imports. Nearly all of the discussions have been largely beside the point because they have revolved around only one angle of the question, the budgetary angle.

In May, 1921, Germany's reparation debts were reckoned by the commission at thirty-three billion gold dollars. In the exceptional year, 1913, Germany could have paid less than half the annual reparations' stipulation in the "agreement" of 1921. The payments in cash, goods and ceded territory acknowledged by the commission are over eight billion gold marks. The Germans claim far more and computations vary greatly, due to a difference in the principle of evaluation. The difference between what Germany lost and France received is chargeable to the destruction of wealth or of income producing power in attempting to transfer wealth from one country to another without regarding commercial considerations. The sum total of what Germany has surrendered already in one form or another to the Allies is estimated by the Institute of Economics as between six and seven billion dollars. Part of this was cash and movable property, and this type of possible payment is about exhausted.

Large imports are essential to German economic life. About twenty million people must be fed by imported food, and raw materials must be imported for factories to create the exports needed to pay reparations. Germany could get the largest output by purchasing raw material abroad and paying for it by those commodities which she could produce most advantageously. Net imports of foodstuffs have fallen to fifty-seven per cent. of those of 1913. Tourists buying delicacies in hotels, and reporting ability to get everything they want, know little of what nine-tenths of the German people are experiencing as they look in horror to the coming winter. The common assumption that Germany has inflated her money to cheat her creditors means that she would have done this regardless of practical destruction of professional, educational and scientific activities and acute suffering of the great majority. Although making enormous paper profits, nearly all business men have been steadily becoming poorer in tangible wealth. The heaviest losers through the depreciation of corporate indebtedness have been the industrial and financial interests themselves. After August, 1914, all gold obligations were declared payable in other legal tender. Paper money has been legal tender and the government has thus paid its internal debts, thus virtually taxing its citizens enormously and wiping out internal debt. Its early payments of reparations would have been impossible without the selling of paper currency. Inflation is inevitable, sooner or later, when a nation cannot balance its budget. Such inflation occurred after our Revolution, when the expression, "Not worth a continental," became proverbial. Our greenback inflation after the Civil War will be remembered by many.

It must be reiterated that the ability of Germany to develop an export surplus is the essence of the whole problem of her capacity to pay. It is not certain that the increase of this capacity is what Poincaré chiefly wants. He apparently is thinking quite as much about preventing Germany's being a competitor in trade as about securing reparations. Until there is a sound philosophy on reparations, computations of statisticians have little value. It must be seen that the customs duties which the Allies hoped to secure, paid in foreign currency, must themselves be paid by Germany in value of exports.

All this seems intricate and puzzling to the average reader. The bearing of it on the American Christian's duty may seem perhaps obscure. But no great principles about doing justice and loving mercy, bearing one another's burdens, bringing God's kingdom on earth, are of much avail unless they can be applied to concrete problems which concern world prosperity and peace. Whoever would play the spiritual Samaritan in a distressed world must not pass by on the other side and refuse to see and think and to create just public opinion. Let him tell all the facts, e.g., that Germany offered to supply material and labor to rebuild the devastated districts, but that French workmen who wanted the jobs protested and the offer was refused.

Space forbids more than these few comments on this sketch of some of the points involved, but a full study of the investigation would show the shallowness of the common popular assumptions regarding reparations. Neither the Germans nor anyone else know how, in view of all the conditions, Germany will be able to have any export surplus. Any promise to pay a definite sum a year, under military compulsion and without a moratorium, would be worth nothing. If the cow is to give milk, it must be fed and allowed to live. The peace of the world depends largely on sound views on economics as well as on ethics. L. A. M.

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

A White Australia

ADELAIDE, Australia.

THIS is still the foremost policy in the mind of Australia. There is no other question that can supersede it, and never has there been so much talk about it as now. It is the center of attraction.

Australia has always believed that her vast continent would be settled out of the loins of the English-speaking peoples. But of late years there have been some rude awakenings. Pretty vigorous efforts have been made to induce people to come, but the results have been meager. Only a ripple of immigrants has as yet seen its way clear to enter the continent.

Moreover, Australia has lost no small number of her own young men by immigration to other lands. For instance, in California alone there were over seven thousand Australians. Another loss, perhaps the most serious of all, was the death of sixty thousand of her best men in the Great War and the maiming and crippling of many thousands of others for life. No other country on the planet could so ill afford to lose so many men, and the people here have taken the loss sadly.

Still another reason for the present concern over the policy is found in the surplus population of other countries. There are several countries not far away from Australia whose complaint is that they have no outlet for their over-increasing population—Java, Japan and other countries. Japan is increasing at the rate of eight hundred thousand to a million yearly. She does not like to see the doors of thinly populated and large countries barred to her people. She objects to the laws which discriminate against her. And consequently the question is asked here as to when will these lands so densely populated start trekking their millions hither. Can this country rightly be held for white folks if they do not develop it and inhabit it? Large sections of it remain uninhabited, unworked. There are five and three-quarter millions only here—less than the population of New York City. Most of these are on the coast in fine cities and it is doubtful whether the white people will ever go into the northern territory. There are lands overcrowded, but here is a land of infinite resources largely unpeopled and undeveloped. There are those who say that such a plan cannot continue. There are eight and one-half millions of Britishers in the United States. All have entered the United States within one hundred years. But here is a land making herculean efforts to fill her empty spaces with British people, a part of the British Empire, battling away with three million less than there are in America.

The chief obstacle in the way is distance. Canada and the United States are near to England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, but Australia is twelve thousand miles away. It is comparatively easy to cross the Atlantic, but the journey here is long and the adventure calls for a separation from the old folks at home whom one may never see again. If Australia were situated where Marseilles is she would fill up in no time. Her great misfortune is distance.

It was widely reported in the newspapers during the war that at the close of the war there would be a great influx of white people, but the war came and went and there has been no noticeable increase as yet.

Much interest is being manifested just now in the visit to the commonwealth of the British government commissioners who have been sent out to ascertain the prospects for a big stream of immigration. It is feared, however, by some that an extremely conservative report will be made to the home government. Drastic changes concerning the selection of adaptable and the rejection of unsuitable immigrants are expected on account of the influence of labor. So that there is little hope of any great increase in the near future. The proposal was made recently that several of Dr. Barnardo's homes should be allowed to send inmates here as prospective settlers. Premier Barwell, of Adelaide, has also been on a visit to London with a view to stirring up the mind of Britain on the dire need of filling in the empty gaps in Australia. Barwell is a radical on the question of population. He realizes that if men and women of his own race cannot be induced to settle here it will be necessary to take up the matter with other races.

It would not be beside the mark to say, despite the drawback for want of people, Australians would vote almost to a man in favor of a white Australia. Those who contend that the policy cannot stand if Australia desires to build up her industries are in a painful minority, although possessing some strong men.

One of the first objections one hears is that mixing the races in America has been a dismal failure. Reference is frequently made to the Negroes and the perplexing nature of the problem they present to America. The Antipodean reads only of lynchings and outrages and draws the conclusion that nothing good has been done for the Negroes at all. He does not know that a great advance has been made. Only the incapacity of the colored race and the cruelties of the Americans to the black man are laid before him in the flimsy cables he reads in his papers. He does not read of the many thousands of churches, the millions of acres of land, the homes, banks, newspapers, periodicals, physicians, lawyers, nurses, agriculturists, primary schools, clergymen, common to the Negro in America. The white Australia points to the conglomerate Americans as a living example of the utter failure of racial admixture. He is not near enough to see the benefit millions of Europeans have derived by immigrating to the States, nor of the help the immigrant has been to the country. Nor does the average man under the Southern Cross ponder the fact that a huge sociological problem is being tried out in America. Some nation must make an earnest effort at race assimilation, and America seems especially fitted for that purpose.

It is asserted in certain quarters here that labor is the chief offender in this matter of immigration. Labor fears that incomers, whether white or colored, would immediately depress the Australian wage. If labor's objection is purely economic it would seem that one glance at the experiences of other countries would suffice to convert it. Certainly wages and salaries have not decreased in the United States since Europeans and Asiatics were introduced.

The reply of Labor to this indictment is that they have no quarrel with the broad principles of immigration, but that it is folly to inspire immigration as long as economic conditions remain as they are. Labor's contention is that the country cannot even now employ all the workers available. There is an unemployment problem here. Some people are homeless and houseless. There is talk of using the drill halls to shelter them. "Why," asks Labor, "paint rosy pictures to folks in other countries in an effort to persuade them to come here when the country cannot conduct and control its economic life even to the point of supplying work for those already within its gates?" Labor recognizes the fact that the country has room for millions more, and that life would be advanced both for new and old settlers and makes the provision that before immigration is stimulated local economic conditions must change for the best, otherwise the immigrant comes under false impressions. This has been the case, according to Labor, in some instances. The immigrant has become disillusioned and quit the country. Great project schemes of land settlement have been drawn up and submitted abroad. Labor deplures this and contends that whenever good land is open for selection there are hundreds of disappointed applicants at home.

In a word, Labor says, Get rid of unemployment, poverty, lack of housing, find work for your own men, find farms for your own children before you make any prodigious effort to allure other millions here. Charity begins at home.

It is safe to say that both parties are responsible for the rigid laws controlling immigration.

There is a fear here of the possibility of surrounding peoples one day taking the country. This begets a racial antipathy. Strange to say, this fear has come into the heart in spite of the fact that Japan or China have never signified a desire to immigrate millions to Australia. The fact is that Japan and China are not anxious to settle in Australia at all.

Some day a government will arise in Australia that will change the present laws and admit a certain percentage of people of another complexion. Not millions—just enough to settle the unworked portions of the productive soil and to tap the resources of the land. It is not necessary to visualize hordes of colored folk led by some Japanese or Chinese Alaric who will immediately overwhelm the country.

The Hon. William Hughes, Prime Minister of the Commonwealth from 1915 to 1923, has recently written some strong words with regard to the right of this country to remain practically empty. He says: "We have our rights like others. All men have the right to life and the pursuit of happiness. But to encircle a continent with a girdle of words is a poor substitute for its effective development. We must prove ourselves worthy to fence off from an overcrowded world one of earth's fairest possessions." Referring to the colored race, he adds: "If these millions knock at our doors, how are we to deny them admittance? Let us sweep the cobwebs of fallacies from our minds. For in this matter we are face to face with the stern realities of life and death. It is not a battle of wits in which we shall then engage. The issue is not one that can be submitted to the arbitrament of some conference or to the League of Nations. We cannot hope to find shelter behind some treaty, Washington or another. What, then, are we to do? Are we to speak to these starving millions, when they knock so insistently at our gates, of moral rights? Or the rights of small nations; or our superior civilization? Or talk to them, perhaps, with smug hypocrisy of the Brotherhood of man? What will these things avail in the eyes of the millions brought into a world that denies them the right to live?"

THE OBSERVER

A Treasury of Religious Poetry

I HAVE had a very illuminating and happy three hours this beautiful Sabbath afternoon. I have been journeying through the great religious poems of the ages. I never quite realized before how rich our language is in beautiful and often exquisite religious lyrics. Of course, all of our hymnals contain many verses that rise to great lyric heights. "Lead Kinkly Light" ranks with the best poetry of all times and classes, as do some of Whittier's hymns. There are few poems in our language that surpass in lyric rapture John Wesley's "Thee Will I Love, My Strength, My Tower," or Edward Caswall's "Jesus, the very Thought of Thee with Sweetness Fills my Breast," or Keble's morning and evening hymns; and, of course, Bernard's hymns of Jerusalem the Golden, touch the stars. There are many others, but outside of the literature of hymns there is a great body of religious verse which, while it is too subtle and too philosophic for singing, yet throbs with beauty and with passion. English and German literature abound in mystical verse; so does the Scandinavian literature. The earliest English poetry is religious, and readers of Chaucer and Spenser will remember many stanzas of incomparable beauty which sing some phase of the soul's quest for God. Almost all of the great British poets, too, have left religious lyrics of immortal beauty—Burns, Cowper, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Browning, Tennyson and Matthew Arnold. There have been many others, minor poets, prophets whose lives were devoted to preaching, such men as the Wesleys, John Keble, Dr. Lyte, Charles Kingsley, Bishop Wordsworth, T. T. Lynch, Cardinal Newman, and Frederick Faber, who occasionally burst into song and left, each of them, one or two religious lyrics that remain forever among the great lyrics of all time. In America the same thing has happened. Phillips Brooks was a preacher and a bishop, but one Christmas day "O Little Town of Bethlehem" sang itself through his heart and became one of the world's treasures.

Some years ago Francis Turner Palgrave, the editor of "The Golden Treasury," most famous of poetic anthologies, edited "The Golden Treasury of Religious Verse." It is a very excellent collection, but limited in its scope and confined largely to British poetry. But now comes from the Macmillan Company this wonderful collection of religious verse of all times and nations, "The World's Great Religious Poetry," edited by Caroline Miles Hill. It is of inestimable worth and inexhaustible beauty. Miss Hill has gathered here both the passages from the poems of the great and immortal bards and the lyrics of the minor poets. Here are the most beautiful of the hymns, those that are real poetry and possessing lyric beauty and poems dealing with every phase of the religious life and the soul's aspiration after God. As I said above, even one who is familiar with religious verse is struck with amazement at the wealth of great poetry dealing with God and the soul's communion with Him. The volume ranges from the classic Greek hymns and St. Bernard's hymns of heaven to the latest free verse. Two things impressed me as I read on and on through these wonderful pages—two things Miss Hill mentions in her preface that grew upon her as she sought these verses in the world's literature—first, that almost all religious poetry is based on the Biblical poetry—again and again the great lines of the Bible find their way into these poems—and, secondly, the fact that practically every singer of the soul's longing of every age sings ultimately of God—bears incontrovertible witness to the existence of a spiritual order. As Miss Hill says, "There must be a spiritual world." After reading, I felt as Professor Willett, who writes the introduction, felt: "To wander through the aisles of this great cathedral of music and song; to thread these forest paths where the saints have walked; to drink of these streams in which the generations of suffering and rejoicing pilgrims of the holy life have quenched their thirst—this is itself a joy and an enrichment, a renewal of fellowship with the best who have gone this way, a fresh discovery of the eternal secret of friendship with God."

Most anthologies are gathered under the author's name or arranged chronologically. This book, of nearly a thousand poems, is arranged by subject. While the author probably did not have the preacher in mind, this arrangement enhances its value, for he can turn, when he is preaching on some theme, to see what the great poets of all ages have to say. And the poets are the seers. They are worth a hundred commentaries. Thus it so happens that the very first division is the poems of Inspiration: How to the singer comes the song? Here we have poems by Benton, Blake, Mrs. Browning, Cowper, Cranch, Gilder, Kilmer, Longfellow, Amy Lowell, Markham, Sara Teasdale, William Watson, Emerson, Samuel Johnson, Angela Morgan, Thoreau, and many more of all climes and ages. The second section of fifty poems is concerned with the search after God. Then come a hundred poems of all ages on the vision of God, the consciousness of the Eternal in one's heart. Another section—and there are some exquisite poems here—are of God in Nature—God immanent in His world, God in the country, in the trees, in the flowers, the heavens, the mountains and the ocean. I suppose that everyone who reads this volume—will complain that some poem which has been omitted should be here, so it would be an ungracious thing to begin to criticize because of omissions. Indeed, I think Miss Hill has been almost providentially guided, as were the editors of the Canon of the Scriptures. There is, however, one poem which should have been included in the section, "God in Nature," namely, Henry van Dyke's "God of the Open Air." It surpasses in lyric rapture almost all modern songs of God in the great world of mountains, seas and sweeping winds. I would say to Dr. Hill, however, that this is the only one really serious omission in her book.

Under the heading of "God in the Life of Man," Dr. Hill had great scope and it is interesting to note her divisions. Of course, most of these poems deal with the Incarnation, God in the life of Jesus Christ, and here the poets, both ancient and modern, rise to great heights. There are also some very interesting verses here from the pens of the radicals, those outside the Church, or even the faith, as we commonly think of it, but who cannot escape Jesus Christ. There is much truth in Francis Thompson's characterization of Jesus Christ as "The Hound of Heaven." He simply will not let men go. "O love that will not let me go." Under this general heading of "God in the Life of Man" we have God in the soul, in history, in the family and in the Church.

Turning from the thought of revelation, Dr. Hill brings together the fifty great poems on Faith, both the old and the new. It is very interesting to contrast Cowper, Madame Guyon and Isaac Watts with John Burroughs, Arthur Hugh Clough and George Eliot—the tremendous certainty of the former, the wistful longing of the latter. I was a little surprised not to find Matthew Arnold's beautiful "Dover Beach" in this section, but perhaps Dr. Hill thought that "Self-Dependence," which she prints, is Arnold's best expression of real faith. I wonder how many of us realized that practically all the poets, ancient and modern, were continually yearning for communion and touch with God? In all of them are poems on prayer and prayers which shaped themselves into verse in the poets' hearts. Miss Hill has brought together a hundred of these and from all religions. I wonder, though, if anything ever written on prayer quite reaches the height of the sonnet Bishop Trench wrote a hundred years ago, and which is printed in this book—in which the whole nature of prayer is summed up in the last two lines better than in all the volumes on the shelves. Let me quote it here:

"Lord, what a change within us one short hour
Spent in thy presence will avail to make!
What heavy burdens from our bosoms take!
What parched grounds refresh us with a shower!
We kneel, and all round us seems to lower;
We rise, and all, the distant and the near,
Stands forth in sunny outline, brave and clear,
We kneel, how weak! we rise, how full of power!
Why, therefore, should we do ourselves this wrong,
Or others—that we are not always strong—
That we are overborne with care—
That we should ever weak or heartless be,
Anxious or troubled—when with us is prayer,
And joy and strength and courage are with thee?"

I had not thought of dwelling upon all of the contents of this book when began to write, but only of uttering some thoughts that came to me as I read and expressing my thanks to Miss Hill for the invaluable service she has rendered. The other sections, on Worship, Comfort in Sorrow and Immortality are as rich in inspiration and beauty as those I have mentioned. There is much talk of this being an age of doubt, and there is a fear abroad that our modern poets lack the spiritual and positive note. There is some truth in this apprehension; yet I find, as I go through Dr. Hill's book, almost all of the poets of our day, even the revolutionary ones, singing songs of the world of the spirit, of God and prayer, and the eternal life, of the high nature and destiny of man and men laying their tribute at the feet of Christ.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Fashion of Eternity

By C. F. Aked, D.D., LL.D.

Minister of the First Congregational Church, Kansas City, Mo. Preached in Kensington Congregational Church, London

"And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."—I John 2:17.

"And the world, with its cravings, is passing away; but he who does the will of God lives in eternity."—Suggested Reading.

LET us try to understand the words we use. The technical explanation may be a little tiresome, but if it is careful and if it carries conviction the old words will become luminous with new and wonderful meanings. The world passeth away, says the text. The word for "world" is "cosmos." And when Tennyson says,

The old order changeth, yielding place to new,

And God fulfils Himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world, he amplifies in his own manner, blending philosophy, poetry and high prophecy, the plain prose of the text from John. When you read this statement of the loved apostle you are not to think of the world of the geographer or the geologist; you are to think of the "order" of the English poet. You are not to think of the day of wrath seen in the blood-red nightmare of frenzied seers, of a day when the earth shall be consumed with liquid flame and the heavens rolled up as a scroll and flung aside. Better call to mind the dictionary definition of the word "cosmos": "order—good order, good behavior, decency;" and then, "a set form or order, the mode or gashion of a thing;" and then only, "the universe considered as an ordered scheme," and in contrast with what we call chaos. It is the cosmos which John said was passing, the order of things in which he lived, the forms of government, the constitution of society, and the customs and conventions which composed his world. So might men have spoken in the last quarter of the eighteenth century. So, indeed, they did speak in America and on the Continent of Europe. "Let us erect a standard to which the wise and good can repair," said George Washington; "the issue will be in the hands of God." George III lost his colonies and the American Republic was born—for the blessing of mankind. "The nations of Europe are leagued against France," said Danton, the man of the too tremendous metaphors; "we accept their challenge and throw at their feet in gage of battle the head of a king." Louis XVI lost his life and the French Republic was born—likewise for the blessing of mankind. On either side of the Atlantic it was the break-up of the old order; it was the emergence of a new. That cosmos was doomed, and to all timorous and flocking souls and those that loved not the daylight it seemed as though chaos had come again. The world, in John's meaning of the word, that world, the world of people-eating kings and perjured priests and people born as sheep to be shorn and slain, was passing. The powers that preside over the destinies of nations finished a chapter of human history, mounting to a climax, and rounding off the final sentence with a full stop. The next chapter began with a new world.

Before our own eyes, within these last ten years, a world, a cosmos, has been shattered. The world of my day, the world I left behind me when I sailed from Liverpool sixteen years ago, has gone; and it can never come back again. Neither this generation nor any generation which will come after us will pick up the pieces and put them together again, even on a different pattern. You broke the power of Germany and sent the throne of the Kaiser tumbling to the dust. But you broke and ended much besides. I cannot find the world I used to know. But short views are false views. "Happy thought! Let's take short views of life," is good enough maxim for summer day in forest, field or seashore, when the soul makes holiday. But in world-business, in the rise and fall of empires, in the destruction of age-old tyrannies and the upheaval of new democracies, in the surge and beat of cosmic forces which bring light out of darkness, order out of chaos, and peace from the blood-red agony of war, he who takes short views will take false views, and justify the keen reproach that the only lesson history teaches is that nobody ever learns it. The world I knew has passed away: he who does the will of God abides forever.

John spoke of his own time. His world, the world in which he lived, was passing away. He himself, though he saw it only dimly, was hastening the break-up of the old system and mightily preparing for the coming of a new. The world which he knew best, the world in which he was born, the world of Judaism, was passing away. He could not see that nearly twenty centuries after his dust returned to the earth and his spirit unto God who gave it, the Jew, without a country, without a government, without a national law, and, indeed, without a nation, would be triumphant in the gates of his enemies, prosperous and dominant in laws and governments and nations throughout the world. He did not see this. What he did see was that Jerusalem had been destroyed by Roman armies, that the heathen had encamped in the holy city, and that the inheritance of Jacob was a prey to the jackal and wolf. The world, he said, is passing by. Of the other world, the world which seemed to have swept this world of Judaism back to chaos, John knew something.

He knew Ephesus, the life of Greece, beautiful in disease, and in corruption destined to immortality. He knew nothing of her immortality; he saw that death reigned in her mortal frame, and he said that the world of Greece was doomed. He knew—he could not help but know—something of Rome. The tramp of her legions was over all the earth. In every village, as along every post road, were the visible evidences of her divine instinct of empire. He knew nothing of her divine instinct. He knew that the old strength which had been born of piety and fidelity was departed from Rome. He knew that in the City of the Seven Hills sat a throned monster who was at once a priest, an atheist, and a god. And he knew that the sentence pronounced in the heavens could not fail of execution on the earth. And he said, "The world is passing away."

So much for one phrase. Let us try another. "He that doeth the will of God abideth forever." And that "forever" is a glorious word, far more glorious than you know who are forever using it, and who think that it means "for ever." With the tautology of emphasis we say in our English speech, "forever and forever;" but the Greek said, "to the ages of the ages." "Life eternal," says our English text; "This is life eternal, to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent," and Tennyson translates it, not translates it, "life æonial," and of these æons or ages demands, concerning the making of man, "Shall not æon after æon pass and mould him into shape?"

I wish I could make it clear. I would do much to make it clear. The idea of everlastingness is not the governing idea of the word. The idea of duration is not all nor even chief. The word is big with conceptions which mock at the mechanical notions of duration and transcend time. The conservative may live in the past, the radical in the future, and the person who claims to be practical and nothing else may live in the present. But what if I tell you that I live not in the past, nor in the present, nor in the future, but in eternity, and demand that every discussion of the future life shall be conducted in the present tense? He that doeth the will of God lives—not shall live but does live—in eternity, in the ages of the ages. I know that it is difficult to explain it completely. If it were not difficult, do you think it would not have been explained long ago? You cannot reduce Eternity to kindergarten words. Perhaps we shall see it better if we abandon definitions and come to cases. Only, try to grasp the idea that it is more a question of quality than of quantity. It is a question of a quality of life so high and deep that you cannot make it local, topographical and transient. It has to do with causes that crown the centuries, with principles that are older than protoplasm and more lasting than the Pleiades, with elemental and primæval things, indestructible and infinite, the life of God in the soul of man! If God has set eternity in my heart, I will not be satisfied to swim in a pool. I want the ocean. And when I live in eternity I sail the shoreless seas of God.

There are exalted moods in which the hardest and coldest of us feel ourselves one with the physical universe. We are one with the solemn mountain peaks, one with the brave old pines, with the noble, placid river, the green encircling hills, one with the dimly distant stars and the slanting moonbeams on the unresting sea. In a book of hints to ocean travelers much loved of passengers on their first voyage one finds an intimation that it is not good form to talk sentiment if the moon happens to be anywhere near the full; that in the old days the sentimental person was thrown overboard, and that a good custom should not have been allowed lightly to fall into disuse. To be sure, it is good form to gamble on the day's run, treasure the hints about next year's fashions you picked up in Paris, and conspire to defraud your native land of customs dues. But the sentimentalist ought to be drowned. Believe me, it is not less sentiment we want, but more; and the sentimentalist has a mission to a money-loving age. I, for one, will do honor to the man or woman who feels deeply, and as deeply dares to be known to feel. Shall I sniff audibly throughout the last act of a mock-heroic play in a London theater and furtively keep my handkerchief ready between the pages of the latest novel of the weeping-willow variety, but shame to have it known that suns and stars and stellar spaces, old ocean in his glory and the mighty mountains, purple-breasted, bring me thoughts that do lie too deep for tears? Matthew Arnold is usually self-contained enough for the strongest of us, but he, the most religious of unbelievers, lost in wonder, love and praise between ocean depths and star-gemmed sky, utters himself the devoutest of pagan prayers:

"Ah, once more," I cried, "Ye stars, ye waters,
On my heart your mighty charm renew;
Still, still let me, as I gaze upon you,
Feel my soul becoming vast like you!"

If you have never felt yourself caught up and carried out of yourself; if you have never felt as though you were being absorbed in the great wonderful universe and becoming immortal like to it, why, may the Lord have mercy on your prosy little soul! Go home and pray that the good God will help you to feel again! I have quoted Matthew Arnold as a religious unbeliever. But what have you to say of Shelley—Atheist Shelley, as his generation dubbed him? He could feel that this vastness had immortality hidden at its heart. For him it robbed death of its sting and the grave of its bitterness. In the physical universe he found an eternity of spirit. Keats died, and you know how he sang of him:

He is made one with Nature: there is heard
His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder to the song of night's sweet bird;
He is a presence to be felt and known
In darkness and in light, from herb and stone,
Spreading itself where'er that Power may move
Which has withdrawn his being to its own;
Which wields the world with never wearied love,
Sustains it from beneath, and kindles it above.

He is not far from the kingdom who can feel that physical phenomena and the order of nature and the song of birds and the stars in their courses rebuke the boastings of death. And God is not forever removed from us when the heaven and the earth which He has made call us from a cosmos that is passing away to live in eternity.

This is high, and it may be that some will ask, How shall I attain unto it? But I invite you to rise to the contemplation of yet higher things. Unless we have wholly misread the greatest spirits of the apostolic group and wholly misunderstood the mind that was in Christ, it is clear that we shall not best live our lives here and now in time unless here and now we are living in eternity. The practical business of life, the adjustment of conduct to circumstances in an ever-changing world, is to us an education in righteousness when we live in principles and causes and the march of deathless generations and movements that roll back the tide of human sin. Let us see. In the world of moral effort we meet the idealist whose sublime head strikes the stars and who tramples human hearts beneath his feet. He lifts up his eyes above the mountains and he does not know of any healing ministry for the devil-haunted child in the crowded street. The Corn Law rhymist in England eighty years ago described a type of philanthropist with whom our generation is scarcely less familiar:

Their noble souls have telescopic eyes
Which see the faintest speck of distant pain;
While at their feet a world of agonies,
Unseen, unheard, unheeded, pleads in vain.

With better intentions and purer life, the idealist may yet fritter away his strength in endeavor as futile. But in the world of moral effort we meet still more often the person who thinks himself practical and takes pride from his belief. He will not look to the far-off future; no, not he! He is not going to sow the seed and wait for after ages to reap the harvest. He tells you that he wants results. He wants crops. He wants to get there, and to get there "right away."

He is the get-rich-quick of the world of altruism, philanthropy and reform. If he is called to preside over the councils of a great nation the best you can say of him is that he is an extempore statesman, a statesman trying to set the world right by rule of thumb, profoundly ignorant of the nature of the forces with which he is playing, and proudly indifferent to the far-reaching, age-long, world-wide consequences of his acts. This is the best you can say of him—if you are a patient and sweet-natured person; but if you are not, why, you say something besides your prayers. A man may mean well. But men and nations need to avoid the devil's short cuts to a desired end.

What then? The idealist may be a failure and the practical man a fool. What we want is the practical man who lives by the power of the ideal. Often he has to work in the dark; slowly he gropes through the broadening dawn. But he sees the light and whence it flows. And he knows that each steady step is toward the rising sun. He has certain principles. They may be few. But they are sufficient. They are clear-cut, firm-footed, four-square to all the winds that blow; and they are safe. He knows, as the world knows, that this same world is not ready to apply those principles immediately and universally to the whole round of human conduct. But he knows what the world does not—that these are the principles by which alone men live, and that the nations which will not adopt them God sends down to destruction. He, too, is an idealist of purest type; but he will labor night and day to apply his principles where and when he can, winning from the unprincipled, anarchic world here a little, there a little, and every little looking to the one far-off divine event to which the whole creation moves. Do you tell me that he is living in each little act, each little step, each little gain of justice upon injustice, each day's work well done? I tell you—no. He is living in the whole, the good and the beautiful. He sees life and sees it whole. He is living in eternity. Wisdom is always justified of her children. "Rhapsodizing" you are permitted to call such preaching as this; and if you can show that it will not work out right in practice, you are justified in calling it rant. And the ranter in the pulpit belongs to a vanishing age. This works out right. It is stimulus to action and salvation from despair. It is easy to pardon the pusillanimity of a passing panic, so long as you are assured that it is passing. When Jesus suffered the rough hands of the Temple police to drag Him from Olivet to the high priest's court, to Pilate's judgment hall and Herod's barracks; when He suffered the Roman soldier to lacerate His back with the horrible flagellum, to nail Him to a cross to die in the darkness, and to crown Him in derision with agonizing thorns, it is sad, but it is not shameful that fear paralyzed every other emotion in the breasts of His disciples so that they all forsook Him and fled. This was the hour and the power of darkness and sin. Look out upon the world of wickedness paraded with scare-heads in every edition of the daily press. Let your mind take an Asmodeus flight over great teeming cities where Satan's seat is. Give your imagination reins for a minute or two and visualize the piled-up infamy of night which affronts the Living God. The mind reels before the appalling vision. But, I tell you again, if you take narrow views you will take false views. You are not to think of yourself, solitary and powerless in a universe of sin, nor of your effort, begun in the morning and abandoned at night, as an isolated and abnormal wonder, unrelated to the ceaseless beneficence of God. That way madness lies—and the Gehenna of the inefficient. But broaden out your view, swing into line with the ages and live in eternity. Your every single stroke for God and goodness has the universe on its side. Your day's work is a part of the eternal order. If the battle is not won to-day it will be another day. Our campaign is for the centuries. We have time to win. We have plenty of time. We have all the time there is. And there is nothing there is so much of as time. I am immortal until I have got my work done, and my work is immortal after that.

But time flies, they urge; live now or never!

He said, "What's time? Leave Now to dogs and apes; Man has Forever!"

Temporary discouragement there may be for us, for are we not human? But despair, by the grace of God, there shall not be to those who will live in eternity.

How Many Children?

By George N. Luccock, D.D.

Pastor of the College Church, Wooster, Ohio

[NOTE: This article is a chapter from Dr. Luccock's new and very suggestive book, "The Home God Meant." Other chapters are Chastened by Children, Home Happiness, Family Faith, Teaching Trustworthiness, What Home is For.—EDITORS.]

IT is much easier to name the minimum than it is to fix the maximum. How many children there ought to be in a home, even whether or not there should be any children in the home, is a question upon which no man or woman outside of the home, unless it be the family physician, has a right to assert judgment. It is primarily a question between the home builders and God.

There are certain general principles which a man and a woman bringing their lives into union for the purpose of making a home are bound to regard in determining for themselves what the will of God for them is in the matter of having children. It ought to be well understood by us all that except the Lord build the home, "they labor in vain that build it." No home enduring in its pleasures, satisfying in its possessions, was ever yet built in defiance of the will of God. To their own Master every man and woman must stand or fall. And while outsiders have no right to sit in judgment upon them, it is for them to judge themselves, to seek and find God in all the ways of their home life. The house that is built upon the sand of mere sentiment, or the quicksand of mere infatuation, is bound to fall. But, like the house built upon a rock, the home that is built upon the principle of hearing and doing the sayings of Jesus Christ can not fall; though the rains descend and the floods come, and though the winds of whatever adversity blow and beat upon that home, it will not fall.

Foremost among the principles in determining what this duty must be reckoned God's first command to the first husband and wife. They were told by their Maker to be fruitful and multiply. By so doing they would replenish and subdue the earth. There is close kinship between the first commandment to parents and the first commandment to children. In obedience thereto lies possession, with enjoyment, of the earth. The first commandment with promise is to children, namely this, that they should honor their father and mother. The promise attached to obedience is well-being, with long life, on the earth. Antecedent to that, involving essentially the same assurance, was the command to become parents. By being fruitful and multiplying their kind upon the earth they would be able to subdue it, dominate it, use it for their own well-being. And from the days of Adam and Eve to the day of the latest pioneers that assurance has been demonstrated. A few hardy settlers locate in the wilderness. On every hand is danger. Their homes are all but bare of comforts. Slowly, surely, their numbers increase, and by and by the very wilderness is brought under human control and made productive in human comfort. As it was in the beginning, it is now, and ever shall be, so long as man dwells upon the earth. God said then and means now that husband and wife shall be fruitful and multiply their kind upon the earth.

The duty is not diminished, but rather emphasized by the advance of civilization. The change from sparse rural settlements to congested city populations does but increase the need that they who look to God for guidance should be fruitful and multiply their kind. The other kind keeps multiplying. If the earth is to be kept in subjection and ruled for the good of humanity it must be accomplished by the leadership and Christian dominance of those who fear God and keep his commandments. If the birth rate in good homes decreases while the birth rate in evil homes increases the result can only be a return to wilderness standards. The last state will be worse than the first, for in this new reign of animal selfishness and cruelty the forces of evil will have the advantage of all the tools of modern invention. The birth rate among the unworthy has little prospect of decrease. Much can be done by educating and Christianizing their offspring, but from motives utterly selfish they will multiply and replenish the earth with their kind. As in the beginning it was necessary for husband and wife to be fruitful and multiply and reproduce their kind in self-defense against the dangers imperiling them on every side, so likewise in the multiplied moral dangers of modern life the hope of preserving the earth and the good thereof for the benefit of mankind lies in its replenishment with children of men who are also children of God.

There are indeed conditions that make the rearing of a large family difficult. In the olden days children very soon became a financial asset. With grandmothers and aunts always available, there was no need of a trained nurse, and almost as soon as the little ones could walk there were things that they could do to release the energies of older members of the family for other work. The addition of a child meant a new unit of power in the forces of the family. It is quite otherwise now. The money cost of having a baby in the house in these days, to people without large incomes, is simply staggering. And as the children grow, instead of adding to the income producing power of the family, as in former times, they become an increasing tax upon that income. Furthermore, the educational requirements, in order to an equal chance in the competitions of the modern struggle for existence and fortune, involve home saving and sacrifice through many years that children may have the proper start in life. It is not, therefore, a subject for an off-hand judgment as to how many children a modern home, modest in its circumstances, ought to have.

Nevertheless, for all the difficulties, there are innumerable homes with children enough to be described as large families, that in this our day are obtaining a good report for themselves. They pay their bills. They get along. They acquire polish by friction. They suffer humiliation, in comparison with the less pinched. They keep growing. They have compensating joys, possible only in a home alive with a lot of children. Granted, then, that it is one of life's biggest adventures to take the risk of bringing a large family of children into this modern world, it is nevertheless true that when the books of life's deepest satisfactions are posted the balance is to the good of the large family. Moreover, to them especially are the promises of God. "Have faith in God."

Both during courtship and after marriage three is an undesirable number. It is true that three in a home are better than two. But three never yet made the best stopping place. Where there are three, there ought to be at least four. For many reasons that is true. It is easier to rear two children together than one alone. Two or more children help to raise each other. Parental life is broadened by having to deal with the unexpected in children of different dispositions. The training of a child is at the same time the spiritual education of the father and mother. One must not forget or seem to cast a slur on the truly noble Christian character found in both husband and wife in many a childless home. It is their double misfortune not to have children. It may be that some husbands and wives never want children, feel more than satisfied to be without them. But that may be doubted. Part of the time they may feel that way. It is hardly possible to feel that way always. The simple reason is that God made them so they would not feel that way all of the time. The little girl who loves and hugs her doll can hardly grow into normal womanhood without having arms that sometimes ache for the feel of a child. It is easy to believe that every woman is born into the world with the heart of a mother throbbing in her bosom.

To live without children may be selfish. It may be self-denial. But it is always loss. The loss is of different kinds. One of the kinds is the loss of a peculiar type of pleasure, the pleasure of playing with children. There are some chambers in the hearts of men and women the key of which God places only in little hands. Except these unlock them, they remain closed to the end of life.

Another loss is that of the pride and joy that come with the character and service attainments of a son or daughter. "Greater joy have I none than this, to hear of my children walking in the truth." Compared with such exultations, what is the pitiful negative satisfaction in being free from the care and responsibility of having and rearing children!

Once again, to have no share in the task of training children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord is to be without one of the best disciplines men and women can have for their own souls. Doubtless some reader mentally observed, while perusing the sentence about the pride and joy of parents in the good work of sons and daughters, that there is an offsetting pain, which sometimes intensifies to anguish, in the sin and shame of profligate children. All that is very true. It is almost a universal belief that in every family there must be a black sheep, which is not true at all. But sometimes boys, and alas! girls also, do go astray. Many a broken-hearted parent has known the tragic meaning of the words,

"How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is To have a thankless child."

Nevertheless, even at the worst, it is better to have loved and lost such a child than never to have had that child to love at all.

In the very agonies over a wayward child the parent who walks with God, and loves with God and like the Son of God goes to seek and save the lost, sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied. Reckoning all his suffering and all his gain in godliness, he is richer for all eternity because of that experience. And then it may be, the chances are that it will be, that, scanning the distant hilltop over which the road from the far country winds, he will see, while yet he is a great way off, the lost lad coming to his father's house again. Then there will be such joy of life, such merry-making, as is never known save in a human father's heart tuned to the music in the heart of our heavenly Father. Looking at it from any point of view, a home without lads and lassies is a home with lots of losses. But let it be remembered, and remembered tenderly, not harshly, that to some wives it is not given either to bear or mother children.

The training of the child, just as really as the discipline of parents, makes clear requirement for at least two children in the home. It is asking more than is fair of any boy or girl to withstand and triumph over the temptations to selfishness that so easily beset the path of an only child. Any child, though born one of a dozen, will have all sorts of temptations to selfishness, and we do well to remember that sometimes an only child is better reared than some in large families. When that happens it is greatly to the credit of the parents. The point is that the path to unselfishness is rough enough at best, and ought not to be made harder for any little one by lack of another child with whom the blessings of home must be shared. Also, it must be remembered that a child craves and has the right to other child companionship.

It happens not infrequently that for good and sufficient reasons a woman may not become a mother a second time, just as now and again a good wife that is of the Lord cannot bear children at all. But over against that fact is a corresponding fact, so fitted to it as to suggest that God meant them to be mated. Many children are born into the world to lose their mothers. Sometimes a babe is deserted. Sometimes the mother dies in giving her child life. Sometimes terrible misfortune overtakes parents so that they are unable to provide for and rear their children. As there are many childless homes, so there are many homeless children. Is it assuming too much to say that God meant them for each other? In many a home where husband and wife have been perfectly happy in each other and both longing for children, but find that none will be born to them, they decide to get children in the way that God gets him children among men, that is, by adoption. It is rare to find such adoption a disappointment. Sometimes there is indeed disappointment. But so also many times there is disappointment in the way children turn out who were born in the home. The risk is absolutely no greater in adopting a child than in having children by birth in the home. In either case, the hope of parents is in the promise of a covenant-keeping God. Whether it be for a home where there are no children at all, or for a home having one child or more and wanting another, there are desolate little hearts in the world needing, oh, so sorely needing, the hearts and the home of a mother and father.

It is a blessed fact that a relation by arrangement can be as tender and full of affection as a relation by blood. It is profoundly true that blood will tell, but the blood that tells most is the redeeming blood of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. He himself said that his true kin, mother, brothers and sisters, are those who do the will of his Father in heaven. And it is one of the blessed laws of God, wrought into our very natures, that people who live together, cultivating the same ideals, striving together to know and do the will of God, become possessed by an all-controlling, all-satisfying love for each other. Under the working of that law of our natures adopted children become unspeakably precious to their parents by adoption.

It is in accordance with the same law in our natures that God gives the hearts of children to those who become their second mothers by marriage. All honor to the good step-mother! It is sometimes the fashion to say harsh things about her. No doubt there have been unworthy stepmothers, just as there have been unworthy natural mothers. The woman who goes into a home to become mother to the children of her predecessor faces big responsibilities and opportunities. She may, and for the most part does, bring into such home a molding influence of love. From the first, the mother heart with which she was born goes out to these motherless children, and she becomes in very truth a love mother to them. And, though oftentimes it takes great tact and patience to love down initial prejudice, in the end she has her reward in the very great love in the hearts of the children for her, and she herself comes to know the deepest joys of motherhood, though she never held her own babe to her bosom.

Prohibition Imperilled

By Stanley High

[The facts presented in the following article are gathered from a nation-wide prohibition survey which is just being completed by "The Christian Science Monitor," in which that daily newspaper seeks to arouse dry opinion in the United States to the imminent danger to prohibition in the new campaign of the wet forces.]

PROHIBITION is in danger. This statement is not compounded from the lobby opinion of New York hotels or the boisterous convictions of some hip-pocket-esque evader of the law. It is a conclusion, rather, which the facts of the present situation, surveyed in nation-wide perspective, make inevitable. Any less positive assertion would indicate either lackadaisical optimism or ignorance of the facts. Feverish activity of the wets and a sudden awakening to the emergency among the dries are two immediate indications of this peril. For months past a clandestine campaign has been developing, fostered by underground agencies and bent upon honeycombing, with widespread propaganda, the foundations of the Eighteenth Amendment preparatory to its final wrecking.

When President Coolidge summons a conference of governors to meet in Washington during the present month to consider the prohibition crisis and means for meeting it; when at the same time the Federal Council of the Churches issues a summary call for a rally of the dry forces of America; when many Protestant churches in many parts of the country are uniting in a special campaign of publicity to meet this new wet drive; when the proponents of prohibition are so signally aroused it is apparent that the situation is serious, so serious, in fact, that only definite and immediate action will prevent fatal modification of the enforcement laws.

It is by viewing conditions from the wet side, however, that the actual menace becomes most apparent. The survey which "The Christian Science Monitor" is just completing carried its representatives into the headquarters of the anti-prohibitionists of nearly every State in the Union, gathered wet—dripping wet—data of every sort and from every angle, it co-ordinated these data with many interviews with men and women in a position to know the tendencies of the situation, and set forth the data and the interviews with a view to arousing dry opinion to a realization of the growing power of wet sentiment. Here is the situation, in brief.

Overwhelmed in the field of politics by organized dry sentiment, the wets have, with more success, taken to fighting from ambush. Last year they boasted they would win Congress and they failed. They carried the contest into Ohio and California, and they lost Ohio and California. Now, having learned their lesson, they have substituted propaganda for politics and ambushes for the ballot box. By a campaign of indirection they are accomplishing more than by any other method they have employed. Their program—all of it—depends upon putting into circulation among the general and more or less neutral public a vast array of false declarations against prohibition to serve as a basis for forming positive conclusions in keeping with the desires of the wets.

Take a few samples from this wet assortment: We are meeting A. D. Plamondon, president of the Illinois division of the National Association Opposed to Prohibition. Mr. Plamondon, so he tells us, proves that "prohibition is doing no good," for, says he—and this is a fair illustration of the stock in trade of the wets—"prohibition has not lessened drinking." "Everybody is making gin at home—everybody." "The whisky that is being bought now is nothing but poison and it can be bought anywhere." "The prohibition law cannot be enforced." Relentless repetition of these statements, scattered broadcast throughout the land, leads to a picturization of overwhelming lawlessness, of an army of bootleggers, and rivers of "hootch" tumbling into a sea of smuggled goods. More liquor, it is implied, is smuggled in now than ever was brought in legally before the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted.

Well and good—but put the facts alongside of this. The United States Statistical Abstract for 1920 (pp. 232, 233) indicates that the 1916 liquor consumption in the country was 19.4 gallons per capita. Taking twenty gallons as the former New York consumption, Orville S. Poland, New York counsel of the Anti-Saloon League, points out that to satisfy the pre-prohibition thirst of ten million New Yorkers two hundred million gallons would be needed, and that it would take 6,666,666 touring cars speeding down from Canada, each carrying thirty gallons (which would give no room for passengers and would hardly allow for concealment) to supply the demand. This number of cars, Mr. Poland explains, is about six times as many as there actually are in New York. Placed bumper to bumper, they would reach thirteen thousand miles, or four times between the Atlantic and Pacific. It is easy to see what there is in the assertion that "prohibition has not lessened drinking."

Take another sample. Prohibition, we are told, from New York to Puget Sound, has increased drinking among the youth. Colleges, quiet, peaceful, saintly colleges have been transformed since the Eighteenth Amendment into bacchanalian resorts and the younger generation, from these reports, is consumed with passion for law evasion and a passion for drink. Good folk, secure in their own homes, may smile at this. But let them make even the briefest inquiry and the general acceptance of this view will become apparent.

Like the rest, there is much of force but no truth behind this declaration. Answering the question, "Has drinking increased among college students since Federal prohibition came into effect?" the following results have been tabulated from 274 American colleges and universities, representing 406,162 students, in a poll taken by F. G. Southworth, president of the Meadville (Pa.) Theological School:

	Colleges	Students
Marked decrease	134	181,532
No increase	111	125,960
No drinking before or since.....	16	9,929
Marked decrease or no increase.....	261	361,421
Increase	13	44,741

"Over ninety-five per cent. of the colleges, with over eighty-seven per cent. of the students, thus reported a marked decrease or no increase, and of those reporting an increase not a single one attributed this exclusively to prohibition."

Massed behind the wet forces of the United States are the foreign liquor interests whose bank deposits in this country went glimmering with the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment. Not only have they hit, indirectly, at the United States by discriminating against Denmark and Norway and Iceland in order to secure repeal of prohibition legislation; they are actually investing money in the campaign in the United States. And, in this country, it is among the foreign population that the wet propaganda is working hardest and is most certain of results.

Some of the immigrants who come to the United States, particularly the Scandinavians, are as dry as the Volstead Act itself. Many more, probably the majority, become whole-hearted supporters of all American customs and recognize that they and their children gain by prohibition. But a proportion of the immigrants, met at the docks by wet arguments, are "Americanized" in a law-breaking version. It is this class which furnishes boundless raw material to liquor interests. Here is an illustration of the approach which the anti-prohibitionists are making to the newly-arrived foreigner. This "Declaration of Principles" is sent out from Chicago by the "United Societies for Local Self-Government and Liberty League." It embodies the tone of all the wet propaganda directed at the immigrant. It should be a revelation to wavering dries:

"For what do the United States stand? The citizens of many foreign lands came to America . . . because of their love for an ideal, because of their passion for liberty. Naturally, they expected no curtailment of the liberties to which, even in the monarchical Old World, they are accustomed. They had no expectation that in this Land of the Free decent, law-abiding men and women would be shackled in thought or action. . . . Puritanism came to them as a distinct shock. They were unable to grasp its significance in a country of supposedly free speech and freedom of action. They were good citizens. . . . They saw this land and they grew quickly to love it, to love it in spite of its faults. . . . But they also saw that in some respects this promised land had strayed far from the ideals of its founders. They saw that liberty was given more lip service than deed service; the Puritan idea of liberty, which means only liberty for the self-constituted 'better classes,' the 'elect,' and an enforced conformity upon the part of the multitude with these notions of the minority, was obtaining an alarmingly strong foothold in this sanctuary of freedom."

Thus the wets are carrying on. In Michigan they are driving to control the press, and already have the support of two prominent Detroit papers in a campaign for a $250,000 fight fund. In California they are out for 120,000 signatures to begin a drive on the Wright Enforcement Act—the "Little" Volstead Act—and to work its overthrow in 1924. In Missouri the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment has twice as many branch organizations as one year ago—fifty in all—with a man continuously on the road for more. In Wisconsin appeal is being made to the farmers. It is said, although economists deny it, that acreage formerly growing brewing grains has been changed to wheat since prohibition, with the consequent drop in wheat profits. To this last argument Chester Rowell, a prominent California economist, replies:

"The beverage market was never anything more than a minor factor in the use of grains. No wheat was used for liquor and very little corn, compared with the other uses. And even at the low estimate of a dollar's worth of whisky made out of five cents' worth of corn, every dollar's worth of corn sold for distillation reduced the purchasing power of the community for other corn products $20."

Despite this the wet argument persists and is being hammered home, for its strength lies not in its truth, but the number of times it is used. Manufacture of industrial alcohol, it is further charged, "which might be of great benefit to farmers in utilizing their wastes, is made virtually impossible by the restrictions of the prohibition law." The extent to which these two wet arguments are being used may be gauged by the fact that copies of a speech by Edwin S. Broussard (D.), Senator from Louisiana, on industrial alcohol and other grain charges were sent out to the number of two hundred thousand copies.

It all comes finally to the necessity for a reawakening of dry sentiment in the United States and for a familiarity with the actual facts of the results of prohibition. Once those facts are given as wide circulation as the fallacious arguments of the wets there will be little need for further efforts to insure maintenance of prohibition. In the meantime, however, this guerrilla warfare of the wets goes on. Definite dry activity is needed to combat it.

A "C. E." Dairy

By Richard Knowles Morton

President of the Shaw Christian Endeavor Union

A YOUNG man once told me the following experience: One night he had gone to a prominent amusement center, being tired of his every-day, drab tasks. He went there for reckless amusement, diversion, bustling fun. This resort happened to be situated near the seashore, and this young man wandered down into its twilight quiet and coolness. Then he turned around and saw the dazzling lights, masses of heedless pleasure seekers, gaudy, dishonest display, rancorous scenes, and the noisy scrambling. There flashed upon his mind then the great contrast between the man-made amusement center and the beautiful beach. Like a flash, he said, there came to him, as never before, a vision of what Christian Endeavor had been trying to teach him. He returned home immediately, and his steady devotion to the Church thereafter testifies to the tremendous change wrought in him.

I met an Endeavorer one day on the street. Conversation drifted soon to society work. I had long known that he had a reputation for conceit and boastfulness. Only a few days before he had recited to me how he had recently become vice-president of a large concern, even at his present age of extreme youth, and how he was in daily touch with big men and big business deals. He was, in reality, a clerk in the office of a paper company.

"That meeting the other night did me lots of good," he began. "Until that time I confess I did not really know how a young fellow should regard the world as he sets out on a business career. That meeting taught me humbleness and magnanimity and friendly faith in others. Big business men are modest, the leader said, and I have been thinking that I was already qualified for the presidency of my company." I could see what this lesson had meant to him, and I thanked God for a society that had made possible this contribution to the direction of youth.

"But the pastor went further than that," my friend hastened to add. "He said that Jesus, at the height of His popularity, actually did menial tasks. Then he said that true greatness lay in humbleness, citing as examples John the Baptist, Lincoln and Frances E. Willard. I have made a fool of myself, but now I am going to show you and everybody else that Christian Endeavor has given me moral strength enough to start to make a real man of myself."

I remember clearly an Endeavorer to whom the society meant the realization of a fond hope and the discovery of a method for personal efficiency. This young man made it a constant practice to sit up front at the meetings. He drank in all the testimonies and ideas given, seeming to pick out those which applied to his life. Whatever practical idea dominated a meeting would always be his special interest during the following week.

"Christian Endeavor has recently given me many ideas, every one of which I have practised for at least a week. I had a habit of spending too much for bowling, but the young people seemed to agree that wholesome recreation in the open air should occupy that time, and it now does with me." He also admitted that he was apt to be lazy on the job, for it was not of a type peculiarly adapted to his character.

"But C. E. taught me an antidote for that," he declared. "I make it a point to get specially interested in some idea expressed in a meeting. I keep that before me and work to reach its aims. In this light, distasteful work is not half so bad, and the time goes faster. I believe that C. E. can really help a fellow, and I wish more fellows who know it in their hearts would have the gumption to say so." I happen to know that one rule he followed was that of beginning promptly at seven in the evening some creditable reading or studying. Nothing would interfere with this rule, and it worked wonders with him.

I have records, too, of a young friend of real ability. But, upon his graduation from high school, his extremely narrow outlook upon life and its philosophy permitted him to believe that he knew about all there is to know, and that he was ably fitted, at the moment, to assume any position. Reluctantly and leeringly he came to C. E. meetings. The testimonies there, of course, jarred tremendously his favorite theories. To his dismay he could not defend them convincingly before an impartial leader. But he made two fortunate friendships, and soon his awakening was in full progress. His first move was to throw into the society his considerable talent; then he forgot his ambition to be a farmer's helper and entered business.

"I do not enjoy thinking of those days when I was blind to so many things," he said recently. But as long as Christian Endeavor can thus transform young lives it is for us to serve, not to chide or gloat.

During one vacation I chanced to visit a farming district. I met father and son, both farmers, who thought little of higher education. The father held his son closely to farm work. But they became interested in the local society, the "crowd" to which all wanted to belong specially requested their presence one Sunday evening. The leaders were tactful enough to challenge these prospects without antagonizing them. That evening they saw that their ideas were separated radically from popular ones.

They happened to be present one evening when the topic concerned education. A young college freshman presented so forcefully his arguments in favor of a college education that both the new members were profoundly touched.

"George, there must be something in that," was the father's meaningful remark. The next fall the town discovered that that C. E. meeting had given to the son, indirectly to be sure, a college training.

A few weeks later an evening paper contained the statement that a group of sadly demoralized young men had held up a young couple as they were going home. They requested the young woman for some dark purpose. Shielding her from them, he put up such a bold ruse that they were all foiled, and a policeman arrived.

"When my mother heard of this episode," the young man said, "she told me that, much as she loves me, she would rather have me risk injury than honor. And, fellows, it was the thought of our society and of my mother that made me vow to hold my ground to the last! You can laugh, if you want to, but honestly that society can build up a chap!" Several of his hearers clasped his hand and all were thrilled. Truly, when the seed of C. E. is sown in youth it bringeth forth much fruit.

A Christian Endeavor visit, just a few weeks ago, took me into the Italian quarter of Boston. I had visions of squalor, heathens, filth. I met some of the local young people. Most of them were uneducated, but I never have since heard such singing, such fervent praying, and such wonderful testifying. A young girl had rescued ten boys from the gutter. They had been smoking, drinking, swearing, and throwing away their health and moral force in all kinds of folly. This C. E. worker soon procured for them a club-room, good jobs and banded them together in a society, requirements for membership in which demanded high standards of purity. To-day these young people are meeting society engagements, telling in wonderfully glowing terms of their conversion and religious experiences. Wine, smoking and dissipation have all fallen before Christian Endeavor.

A short time ago I had a wonderful experience when out of town. I was to speak before a small gathering. The local people were trying to arouse interest in right living and religion. Many of them could understand very little except the Finnish language. The evening's prayer was given by a minister who apologized for having to give it in Finnish. Fully half of the audience, although profoundly religious people, could understand little that I said, but more attentive and courteous people would be hard to imagine.

"We knew you were talking in the interests of Jesus Christ," said one, "so even though we could not understand you generally, we derived much benefit from the meeting."

There are many Endeavorers who find it difficult, at first, to play the piano, sing or speak before a society. One young man's mother had for years hoped and prayed that her son would have strength enough to overcome his fears. He kept coming to the meetings, so one night a leader prepared a forceful talk specially for his needs. He did not seem to respond, but now the C. E. has brought it about that he is willing to take any part (or the entire part, if he is allowed) of a meeting. His mother was overjoyed and the experience proved in every way happy. Christian Endeavor can do this for others.

The society once taught a young lady how to preside over a gathering. She hated to recite in college, and was rather unusually reticent. Christian Endeavor took her in hand and she was asked, as a society officer, to preside over a meeting. It was rather unruly, but to the astonishment of all she rose to the occasion and nearly scared the offenders to death in managing superbly the problems before her.

"If my Endeavor friends had not helped me," she said, "I could never have done that. But, do you know, I am getting better marks in college now, and I am fast overcoming my nervousness. In each new class now I shut my eyes and make believe that I am in a society, and everything goes smoothly then."

Christian Endeavor brought in from the golf links, too, one fine young man who had simply neglected religious duties as uninteresting and flat. He was made a society officer, and saw in a new light his relationship with the world. His experience was so keen that he appeared the following week with the majority of his friends of the golf links, who were scarcely less impressed than he. These young men are now living more abundant lives of service.

Christian Endeavor, I know, teaches magnanimity and generosity. A young man was being offered a union position. The one whom they wished him to displace had long been a friend and idol of this young man. Although the position carried with it prestige and power, this young man said: "As long as my friend can serve I refuse to step into his place, for my work for the Master can wait." This has been equalled in my experience only by a young woman who was offered the presidency of a large society at the time when its church was celebrating a notable event. She had been offered and had practically accepted the position when facts were given her which tended to show the wisdom of putting in a promising young man who might be completely converted to life work by the experience. The young woman, with gracious magnanimity, withdrew, and the young man fulfilled the expectations made at the time of the sacrifice. With young people like these the world can accomplish much. To be an Endeavorer is, indeed, in itself a golden, memorable experience.

During the time when another society needed money for important expenses appeals were made to members to sell large bunches of tickets. Although in line for no reward, notice, or commendation, three girls in the society sold large numbers of tickets—so many, in fact, that the event was an unusual success. C. E. meant to them unquestioning service and sacrifice of time, money, energy, talent, personality, resources.

I find the idea of altruistic service the special virtue of Endeavorers. In my own church the Endeavorers have banded together in a Choir Guild, furnishing church music and entertainments of superb order. They advertise the church, assist the pastor in many ways, collect the offering, usher, distribute hymnals and other materials, assist the janitor, call on the ill, sing in nearby hospitals, and contribute hundreds of dollars to foreign missions. Another group is constructing a radio for the use of poor shut-ins. This same group has interested itself in building up the prayer meeting of its church. The pastor is delighted and responds with interesting talks which have held the young people for months. The prayer meeting is almost as large as the church services. Endeavor has done it all.

Indeed, the pages of Endeavor experience of even one worker are glowing with cherished incidents. To be in this great work is a blessing. Let other Endeavorers read of these experiences and then try to emulate them. Endeavor has given to youth most cherished and worth-while opportunities. Let us all therefore dedicate ourselves to the unselfish promotion of its great ministrations.

An Interpretation of the Labor Movement—VII.

Rev. F. Ernest Johnson

Director, Research Department, The Federal Council of Churches

VII. WORKERS' EDUCATION.

IT IS commonly said by employers that the industrial situation demands the education of the workers along lines of sound economics. It would doubtless surprise many employers to know how great an interest workers' organizations are taking in this kind of education and in general cultural studies as well. Labor's interest in education is not new. Says Professor Frank T. Carlton of De Pauw University: "The concept of universal and free education as a powerful economic and social engine did not arise to a prominent place in the social consciousness until the wage earner became an important factor in political life. A demand for free, tax-supported public schools appears when and where the workingmen have the ballot." Back of the new movement for "workers' education" is a very definite conviction on the part of labor as to the primary importance of public education.

But just as the ultra-conservative elements in America have since the war been looking apprehensively upon the institutions of public education as a possible means of spreading dangerous propaganda, so labor organizations have been turning their attention to the schools in the fear that they are becoming the medium of class education of a different sort. The Lusk laws, which were placed on the statute books in New York during the period of high tension following the war, in an effort to put definite limits upon academic freedom, have furnished an illustration of this attitude. They called forth the vigorous opposition of conservative people, including many stalwart churchmen, and aroused much hostility on the part of labor as constituting improper interference with the economic and political views of teachers in our schools. The New York legislature has now yielded to this adverse opinion and voted to repeal the laws.

There is a widespread impression in labor circles that the colleges and universities are dominated by what one might call a property psychology; that the economics they teach is the economics of privilege, in which the commodity theory of labor and the priority of property rights are central and dominant. This feeling is by no means universal. The head of a great "left wing" union said to the writer that he would welcome closer contacts between the workers and the universities. The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers boasts of the large proportion of the children of its members who are in college, and is offering the aid of its new co-operative bank in Cleveland to those who need financial help in completing a college course. This aid is not given without discrimination, however. A recent editorial in their journal, which is a remarkable magazine from the educational point of view, quotes David Starr Jordan as saying: "It is a shame to waste a thousand-dollar education on a fifty-cent boy," and then adds, "It is even more shameful to waste a thousand-dollar boy on a fifty-cent college." The journal is making "a careful study of educational conditions and costs in every college and university in America."

Yet by a large section of the labor movement our institutions of higher education are thought of as controlled by "vested interests" and as fitting young people very poorly for leadership in the effort toward a better social order. Established schools are viewed by this section of the labor movement with the same misgiving that many religious people have when they compare ecclesiastical and "secular" schools, to the disadvantage of the latter.

In all this there is a marked up-surge of class-consciousness. From the scientific point of view it is absurd to talk about "capitalist economics" and "labor economics." Yet this antithesis is definitely in the mind of the more critical element in the labor movement. And the chief reason for it is the alignment of "standard" economists and their activities and preachments with the conservative business interests of the community. A well-known business man has just started a correspondence school to teach "economics for executives." Similar projects have been undertaken before, and they give the impression, not unnaturally, that there is only one kind of recognized and respectable economics, and that is the kind that strengthens the position of property holders. This impression is deepened by the frequent demand of employers for the teaching of "sound economics" to the workers. To this plea one of the foremost labor organizations has replied that labor is to-day doing more sound thinking than employers. To understand the situation one must put aside, for the moment, his own convictions and listen to what labor says. Thus the president of the Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor: "The suggestion of a college or university reminds the active unionist of the persecution of some professors who have shown too much interest in the welfare of the masses, and brings to his mind pictures of college students as strikebreakers—the college bred men who assumed the 'patriotic' duty of helping to break the railroad strike last year."

Since this series of articles was commenced the writer has been urged to recognize that the opposition of interest between employer and employee is imagined rather than real. He feels, however, that while this opposition can and must be dissolved, it is real at least in the minds of large sections of both groups, and that the first necessity is to understand it. This requires patience and sympathy on both sides.

Aside from economic theories there is a very practical basis for labor's desire to have schools and study courses of its own. As long as there is a labor movement it will pursue its peculiar ends and seek to maintain a solid front for its own interests. This is inevitable. Labor organization and administration have their own technique and call for trained minds. Collective bargaining is in itself a highly "skilled" performance. Hence workers' education is as natural a development as a labor press.

There are not a few educational and civic leaders who support labor in its contention for a more "human" interpretation of the economic organization of society and of industrial history. They are the "intellectuals" in the labor movement about whom so much is heard. Many of them are college professors, some are publicists, some are ministers, and some came directly from the working class. They have helped to launch an enterprise which has now reached such proportions as to be called the Workers' Education Movement.

It would be a great mistake, however, to suppose that the chief aim of workers' education is to gain certain immediate "class" ends for the labor unions. There is a deep desire on the part of multitudes of workers for a scientific and cultural education. The Hamburg (Germany) Workers' College had in the winter of 1921-1922 the following enrollments in six of the leading departments of study:

Economics	966
Philosophy, religion and education.....	787
Language and literature.....	661
Art	347
Biology, physiology and hygiene.....	279
Physics and chemistry	190

The students were prevailingly industrial, clerical and commercial employees. The writer confesses his surprise at these proportions, particularly the second group. An instructor in the Boston Trade Union College, whose classes are conducted in the evening—one session a week—reports that he and his colleagues "have all felt themselves more than repaid for their pains by finding among their new students a hunger and thirst for knowledge very different from what they have encountered among the university undergraduates with whom they have been familiar."

The movement in America is much newer than in Great Britain. Beginning there in 1903, it comprised in 1920 2,526 organizations, 1,071 of which were trade unions. The Workers' Educational Association is self-characterized "a missionary organization working in co-operation with education authorities and working-class organizations." It has to its credit the bringing together in an effectual unity of effort the British universities and the British labor movement. The credit for originating the plan belongs to Oxford. The American counterpart of this association is the Workers' Education Bureau, through which are affiliated a variety of separate undertakings under different auspices. The course conducted by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers was thus announced to the union's constituency: "The Amalgamated is out for a drive of two hundred thousand leaders—for better unions, for bigger lives, for new hope, for greater power, register to-day!" The subjects announced include the political and economic organization of the United States, psychology as related to economics and trade unionism, and the history of social and labor movements. The International Ladies' Garment Workers have a well-developed and specialized program. At Brookwood College, Katonah, New York, a labor professional school may be seen in operation—the first of its kind in America. It undertakes to train economists, statisticians, journalists, teachers and union organizers, all with reference to the requirements of the labor movement.

The Workers' Education Movement at its best is in line, pedagogically, with the latest conclusions of our educators as to the best method in adult education. "It is not an attempt," says one of its leaders, "to teach workers what to think, but rather how to think." It emphasizes group discussion as against the formal lecture method. The possibilities of the movement are unlimited. Its danger is manifest authorities on the subject, "whether workers' education for class struggle and class hatred. The self-consciousness of the movement as interpreted by some of its representatives is such as to excite admiration and to awaken fear at the same moment. "It is idle to debate," says one of the best authorities on the subject, "whether workers' education can be controlled by others than the workers. It cannot be. Controlled by 'public' authorities, by universities, by middle-class persons, it is adult education. It is education. It is useful. But it is not workers' education. Workers' education can no more be outside the labor movement than a trade union." This doctrine cannot be dismissed as revolutionary or as propaganda of class strife; it is merely an account of what is going on in the labor movement. But it presages, nevertheless, a deepening of class cleavage in our industrial life.

If such an outcome is to be avoided it would seem that the educational program of the community as a whole must be broadened so that it may take advantage of what is vital in labor education and may at the same time free itself from all suspicion of being more concerned to conserve institutions than to secure for men and women a more abundant life.

The Desert Places

BY WILLIAM C. ALLEN

WE THINK of the desert as the equivalent of desolation. The sea has its glory, its beauty, its moods. The heavens declare the handiwork of God. But to most of us the desert appears unfruitful, hard, inhospitable, cruel.

The alkali plains of America are white and arid. The sands of the Sahara sweep like a torrent across the blinding sunshine. The Cobi desert of Northern Asia is a weariness to the traveler. The vast treeless levels of Australia at periods promise no loveliness or charm. The wild wastes of South Africa are masses of heaped-up rocks for hundreds of miles. Yet we may love the desert wherever we find it. Its alternate grayness and exuberant colorings, its lights, its shadows offer rare instruction to our intellects and souls.

At times the Christian perforce crosses parched places as he journeys through life. There are experiences wherein no beauty cheers him, there are trials that hide from his sight the eternal hills of hope. His feet bleed as he treads the rock-strewn valley or laboriously climbs the mountains of despair. He thinks of the ancient cry, "My soul thirsteth for Thee in a dry and weary land where no water is!" He appeals to God for help.

Yet the desert may be good to trek across. In it is stillness—how often the world-tired heart when temporarily deprived of earthly joys finds in the desert of the soul the quietness, the holy communion that imparts fresh vigor for physical outlay, for spiritual success. Within the desert, or close by its borders, are undreamed riches which, like the diamond mines of Kimberley, yield splendid stones of renown, scintillating, exquisite, pure. In the void places of the earth have been discovered vast supplies of material things for the use of millions of men. The forsaken wastes of far-off countries contain precious minerals and metals yet to be extracted from their confines—this is the story from many lands. Even so as the follower of Jesus moving through the dull or difficult experiences of life halts to discover the secret treasures they contain he finds there is rare reward in doing so—he acquires courage, patience, love. His earthly trials become of value beyond all estates, shares, gems, gold or bonds. The desert has yielded to him her treasures. If wise he retains them in his grasp when again he enters the pleasant country and once more participates in the lovely things of life. How often whilst touring the solitary places we fail to realize the years of happiness yet to be!

Some of us who have traveled widely have observed that often the serpents match the hues of the rocks or soil of their environments. But contrarywise, let us think of the gracious things of the desert, the marvel of the flowers. In the Karroo of South Africa there are little plants the color of the leaves and bloom of which imitates the stones amid which they grow. Their very shapes copy the broken rocks about them. You thoughtlessly kick aside a stone and, behold, you crush one of the tender plants of God. Even so may the tired Christian whilst passing through flinty places by gesture or with voice do violence to his better moments and inadvertently trample on the material or spiritual aspirations of others who also are endeavoring to live above their solitude, their pains, their fears. May we remember that we oftentimes hold within our keeping the faith and fortitude of others as they too tread the desert paths.

Is there enchantment in the desert? Is there beauty, fragrance, vision? At some seasons of the year their bare, bleak lowlands or mountains are bedecked with captivating flowers. We know of one vast desolation in Western Australia which claims six thousand different kinds of wild flowers, of which three thousand are said to grow in no other land. Is it not true that there is One who makes the wilderness to rejoice and blossom as the rose? Shall we trust Him? Is it not true that the followers of Jesus may sometimes be insulted or defeated yet, like their Master, who knew the loneliness of the desert, feel all the while their unseen nearness to their Lord? We obtain long views in the desert—we see wonderful things in its rarified, pure air. From amid the sands and thorns we very often gaze across great distances to the purple mountains crowned with glistening snow. O, you who read these lines, do not, in hours of weakness, forget to look away from the aridity about you up to the everlasting hills of God—they will renew your strength—the names of those who do so are recorded in the Book of Life. God never fails to finally lead or guide His faithful people out of the desert places into the Promised Land.

Foreign Correspondence

Fear and Hope in Europe

[The last three years Mr. Kirby Page, who writes the following letter, has been one of the leaders of the American Seminar, a group of Christian men and women who have visited Great Britain and the Continent as students of the problems facing humanity in its attempt to bring about the reign of real brotherhood. The "Atlantic Monthly" over a year ago published an illuminating article by Mr. Page on the situation in the steel industry in America.]

WE HAVE just returned from a most interesting and profitable trip to Paris, Berlin and Geneva. Some three weeks earlier we made a tour through the Ruhr and the occupied area around Cologne. In Paris we were privileged to discuss international and economic questions with a number of influential citizens. Receptions were given for our group by the Governor of the Bank of France and by the "Le Matin," the famous newspaper. We were addressed by M. Seydoux and Count Fleury of the Foreign Office and various other officials; Stephane Lasaunne, editor of the "Le Matin"; various business men, labor leaders and churchmen. We also had a memorable trip across the battlefields to Arras, Lens and Vimy Ridge.

In Berlin we were equally fortunate in being able to secure interviews with a number of prominent persons representing various point of view, including two members of the Cabinet; the American Ambassador in Berlin; Sigmund Schultze, the famous pastor; Director Voegler, chief associate of Hugo Stinnes; several important trade union officials, leaders of the German Red Cross, social workers, etc. We were privileged to secure seats for the Reichstag the afternoon that Chancellor Cuno gave his last address, and followed with intense interest the commotion created by the Communists. While in the Ruhr we had an interview with the head director of the famous Krupp works. From Berlin we went to Dresden, Prague and Geneva for short visits.

I am finding it no easy task to reach conclusions with regard to the major problems over here, so complex is the situation and so contradictory is the evidence presented. Just now I am trying to classify and digest the voluminous data which we have gathered. I have tentatively summarized my chief impressions as follows:

1. The nations of Europe are desperately afraid—afraid of each other and afraid of the future. In France evidence of this fear is found on every hand and is not difficult to understand, especially after a visit to the devastated areas. France is afraid that her fair land will again be invaded, and that once more rivers will flow with the blood of her finest young life. In her fear she has ceased to have any confidence whatever in other means of protection than military force. She is, therefore, maintaining a larger standing army than Germany had before the war, when the mad race of armaments was at its height. In order to do this she is drawing upon her colonies for troops and scores of thousands of black troops are enrolled in the French army. The presence of these dark-skinned African troops—the French make a careful distinction between dark skins and black skins, hence their insistence that there are no black troops on the Rhine—in the occupied areas is having a most terrible psychological effect upon the Germans, especially so since they are required to maintain brothels of German women out of German taxes for these troops.

2. All the available evidence has convinced me beyond the shadow of a doubt that as a result of her fear and hate France is determined to crush Germany completely. To understand her present actions in the Ruhr it is necessary to go back to the Peace Conference and to the secret treaties negotiated between France, Russia, England and Italy during the early years of the war. These treaties provided that generous slices of German territory should go to France. During the Peace Conference, France insisted not only upon the disarmament of Germany and the restoration of the devastated areas—in which the whole world joined her—but also upon the annexation of the Saar, the separation of the left bank of the Rhine from Germany, the military occupation of the Ruhr, the shackling of Germany's economic life, and a war indemnity far in excess of the preposterous sum finally set by the Reparation Commission.

It is well known that France was successful in having the major portion of her demands written into the treaty. We sometimes forget, however, that it was her insistence upon the permanent separation of the left bank of the Rhine from Germany, the annexation of the Saar and the military occupation of the Ruhr which almost wrecked the Peace Conference and caused President Wilson to cable for the "George Washington." France was finally compelled to yield her extreme demands—at least temporarily. All the evidence seems to indicate that those demands have never been abandoned and that she is as determined as ever to dismember and destroy Germany. Indeed, as we have often been reminded, Clemenceau said in the Chamber of Deputies that the Treaty of Versailles is only a means of continuing the war.

The penalties for failure to carry out the treaty—many of the provisions of which are utterly incapable of fulfillment—are so drastic that Germany is at the complete mercy of France. We were frankly told by French officials that they looked with favor upon the dismemberment of Germany, and that they thought this would be a good thing for the Germans as well as for Europe. Now that the United States has withdrawn, Great Britain is handicapped by colonial problems and weakened by the industrial depression, Germany is completely disarmed, France is at the height of her military power and is backed by a group of allies, she seems to be carrying out her original intentions. If she is successful it not only means the end of Germany as a world power, but also the political and economic chaos of the whole of Central Europe, with its seventy or eighty millions of German-speaking people.

3. The present policy of France is placing the moderate elements in Germany under a terrific handicap. The stronger the pressure of France in the Ruhr and elsewhere, the more certain it becomes that Germany will swing toward one of the extremes, communism or monarchical dictatorship, and that civil war becomes imminent. I do not for a moment believe that the German government has done or is doing all that it could to carry out the Treaty of Versailles, or that it has sufficiently curbed the power of German industrialists. But the fact remains that as a result of pressure from without the extremes are gaining in power at the expense of the moderates.

In spite of surface evidences of prosperity and the reports of tourists, I am wholly convinced that Germany is now in a desperate condition and that there will be indescribable suffering among the masses before the winter is over. As to the reasons why she is in this terrible plight much might be written. After a visit to the famous museum of war in Berlin—where one sees the glories of war and glimpses the part it has played in German history, and indeed in the history of Europe—I was haunted by the idea contained in that old verse, "They that take the sword, shall perish by the sword." Then, too, as I saw the hotels and pleasure houses crowded with profiteers—Germans and foreigners—eating, drinking and being merry upon the very blood of the poverty-stricken masses I found it difficult to restrain my feelings. Especially was this true after a visit to the slums of Berlin and interviews with social workers and Red Cross officials who gave us descriptions and statistics of malnutrition, slow starvation and disease. But these millions who are suffering beyond description, were they guilty for the war? Are they responsible for the present situation?

What of the winter? What will starving and desperate multitudes do? No one knows. Everyone is afraid. There was general agreement among the persons with whom we talked that there is certain to be violence and a revolution of some sort before the winter is over. This morning's paper reports the mark at eleven million to the dollar, with unemployment increasing and conditions getting steadily worse.

4. The experiences of this summer have fully convinced me of the desirability and inevitability of the League of Nations if European civilization is to endure. There can be only one end to the mad policy of militarism now dominant in France and elsewhere. Not only Germany, but the whole of Europe will topple into the dust of chaos and decay if this policy is continued much longer. The only answer to national armies is conference and co-operation. I am more than ever aware of the failures and limitations of the League, but I am filled with admiration and hope at what it has already accomplished, in the most unsettled period of human history, in the face of giant obstacles, and without the participation of three of the great nations. I find it difficult to describe my feelings of humiliation and shame when I think of America—rich and powerful beyond all nations of the earth—attempting to follow an isolated and selfish course at such an hour of crisis in the history of mankind.

KIRBY PAGE.

The Playground and Recreation Association of America held its annual meeting October 8th to 12th. According to figures which they have compiled, where playgrounds have been established juvenile delinquency has decreased by forty-four per cent. Five hundred cities and towns in America, they report, are without a single playground or a single play leader. Naturally, the association believes that the work should be extended to these cities and towns. Of course, it also wants to strengthen the work already started.

We all know some of the reasons why immigrants come to this country. Abol Ghasen Bakhtiar, late of the Persian royal army, is now a student in Syracuse University. He walked from Bismarck, South Dakota, in order that he might see how Americans live, as well as because he enjoyed the "hike." He had taken breakfast on the first farm where he put up—ham and eggs, coffee with fresh cream, biscuits and jam. It overwhelmed him. "If I should tell my folks back home what farmers here ate every day they would think America was a fairyland." But a more important question is, Are American homes really happier than homes over in Persia?

Prayer, then, I say, is first and chiefly the establishment of communion with God. Praying is the clearing of the blocked roads which are crowded with all sorts of worldly hindrances. It is the preparing of the way of the Lord. When I turn to the Lord in prayer I open the doors and windows of my soul toward the heavenlies, and I open them for the reception of any gifts of grace which God's holy love may wish me to receive. My reverent thought and prayer perfects communion between my soul and God.—J. H. Jowett.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

The Philosophy of Plotinus

DEAN WILLIAM RALPH INGE, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is the most stimulating minister of modern Anglicanism. His selections from Lucian, two volumes of "Outspoken Essays" and "Speculum Animæ" are substantial works that afford full proof of the scope and versatility of his mind. "The Philosophy of Plotinus," in two volumes, delivered originally as the Gifford Lectures for 1917-1918, is now before the reading public and has been favorably reviewed in numerous leading periodicals. One is glad that the Dean deals with the fascinating personality of Plotinus in a large and comprehensive way. Some critics of Dr. Inge comment upon the tincture of pessimism and even hardness and severity which they detect in his spoken and written words. It would be fairer to urge that he is our modern Erasmus; less brilliant and far less witty. Yet with the ill-concealed contempt for irrationality and superstition which marked the prince of Renaissance scholarship, I understand "the gloomy Dean" to be very jealous for the honor of God and of the Church. He is keenly aware of the disrepute into which creedal religion has fallen, and being, at heart, a truly devout and believing man, he is desirous that what is religious shall be shown as also reasonable and cleansed of the beggarly admixtures of false sentimentality and extreme credulity. Few sensible people will dispute the value of such aims. But many may wonder how Dean Inge will deal with Plotinus as the personalized link between spiritual paganism and Christian mysticism. The majority of intelligent men and women are tempted to regard mysticism as vague and formless, without efficient vehicles of communication, a weakness of the higher sensibilities of the soul. They feel that no matter how pure, how purged how radiant the mystic's momentary vision of God may be, it is but a fleeting image, confined to the percipient spirit. Moreover, to assert that because one wistful waiting heart has obtained a glimpse of the Eternal Being, therefore the Unknowable has been known, is an unconscious heresy, an innocent but misleading exaggeration of the reality at issue.

Truth-seeking is never a closed process; it is a ceaseless quest for the unification of all human knowledge in the super-knowledge from which it proceeds. Neither man in himself nor any one of his social organizations is much more than embryonic. The perfect of to-day is the sadly imperfect of to-morrow. Hence, contemplation in the mystic may outrun correct observation; and imagination be invoked to supply the deficiencies of what the visioned spirit sees, or thinks it sees. So mysticism has been identified with ecstasies, dreams and kindred mental and spiritual phenomena of varying degrees in value. The uprush of primitive as well as cultivated instincts has been confused with the inspirations of the Eternal Spirit within mortals. Minds that care nothing for dogma or doctrine, for churches or their ordinances, are associated in current thinking with mystical tendencies. Now that science has entered the arena of the invisible, and finds there far-reaching moral and even religious implications which it has not courageously explored, the entire position of organized knowledge toward the knowledge which cannot be organized is likely to be materially changed. Even the restricted product of medieval mysticism is being analyzed. It was ascetic, negative, given to other-worldliness, intent on the Beyond. Few mental states would seem to be so far away from the modern mind as those of medieval mysticism. The theories of to-day point to effort, not quiescence; to active assimilation, not passive obedience. Doubtless both these types of spiritual culture take color from surrounding circumstances, and from prevalent contemporary ideas. However that may be, one feels certain that a seeing of God in Nature is long overdue. The recognition of the Creator in material creation in ways that symbolize spiritual realities, would confer upon science a dignity and a purpose it has not yet acquired. A distinguished French savant urges that modern knowledge is lop-sided, and not a little is, therefore, injurious. It stresses things that do not matter, at the expense of things that do matter. It has been estimated that at least one-half of what scholars know is either useless or injurious. And the stipulation is made that unless the invisible life can be more completely realized the visible will take a determinate leap and die.

For these and other reasons Dean Inge's Lectures should not be deprecated, but read, studied, mastered, by every clergyman and by intelligent laymen. The expansion of learning has strained our old religious machinery to the breaking point. All who have to do with the unseen are more or less bound to find for it a more far-reaching philosophy and adequacy of expression. The true mystic is essential to the effective cure of souls, and he is scarcely less essential to the safety of their earthly conditions. His vision begins with a purification of self from dross. He cannot realize his inmost being; leave alone diffuse its light and help, unless that being is consecrate. It must also be consecrated to the highest he knows—to God, to Christ, to Divine Love, and to the supersensitiveness of that love. St. Paul indicated the matchless result of this self-dedication when he said: "The spiritual man judgeth all things." In our time he will not work against Nature, nor despise the scholars who instruct us in her marvels. He will work with Nature, accept the verified results of science, and avoid a fatal repression which mistakes mutilation for consecration. The patient discovering within us by means of psycho-analysis of the wondrous latent powers of the soul when truly orientated is a lure beyond description for every progressive preacher. The children of this world have been wiser than the children of light. They were quick to seize the opportunity presented by the modern mind, wearied, as it is, of crass materialism and its intolerable burdens. In consequence, the actualities of mysticism have been betrayed by a hundred caricatures and reflexes of grosser thought. Those who want a more excellent way than mystical cults which worship the flesh can offer, will be wise to believe that what should be, ought to be the chosen ground for what is. If we should be pure, holy, sacrificial, serviceable, then we cannot go far astray by directing our spiritual energies in the channels of purity, holiness, sacrifice and service. Unless I am mistaken, Plotinus, as he is interpreted by Dean Inge, is a true guide. He does not give us all the light we need, but he gives us enough light to find the Light. His mysticism suits the Western temper, because it is sane and glad; an experience of zest and joy, without the vanities of subtle self-assertion, intent on the energies of a Higher Power. His happy character and the psychological knowledge of Dean Inge enable the student to discern what is best and worst in the processes of mysticism. The determinations of the spiritual life which explains the New Testament Faith, and are vital to its continuance, are here discussed, and many difficulties are removed.

It has been well said that we are never to relinquish the stature of the man in Christ Jesus because we are earthbound. The earthbound is the perishable. The practical bent of the English-speaking nations is a frailty as well as a strength. Those who say, "What is mind?" "No mind," "What is matter?" "Never matter," are pragmatists without religious potency. The common knowledge of life wanders in a realm of low visibility. Its misconceptions are also void of historic validity. Benedetto Croce observes that the very condition of history is that the deeds and events it recites shall have first lived in the soul. They cannot happen, nor can the historian portray them, unless they have been present and creative in the spiritual realm. Nor can the reader of history be made aware of their significance unless he emotionally visualizes them and the motives that animated them. Apply these statements to Christian history and experience, and it is palpable that the pulpit is shorn of its mission unless it is mystical, imaginative, spiritually recreative, and foresworn to feed its imaginations, not on fancies, but on facts. But what are the so-called facts? The answer is, those realities of self and of the other than self which exist always, everywhere, and independently. Scientists scoff at original sin only to gravely label it primitive instinct. The confessional has been expelled from Protestantism only to be highly commended by psychoanalysts. Autosuggestion is freely used by many who repudiate prayer and other acts of faith. If it is true that man is a spirit, the life of the spirit is his primal concern. Whatever explains the registrations of that life is supremely interesting. Wherever the explanation is made clearly becomes a sacred place. Economize as we may our holiest visions for practical ends, they are the core of genuine preaching. One advises simplicity, directness, absence of elaboration, and if employed discreetly a restraining sense of humor even in the gravest matters.

It is a rare art to be able to speak naturally about the highest spiritual adventures. This was Wesley's power, and he inherited it from St. Paul, who, in turn, echoed it from the voice of his Master. The raptures of the Blessed Angela of Foligno, the exhalations of ecstasy so often found in Latin mysticism, are not becoming to us. But a mystic can be sane, free from pathological symptoms, filled with the life of the Spirit. There are no ages of faith to be set off from periods of unfaith. God and the soul are above this arbitrary distinction. Those who desire a renewal of vitality and movement in themselves and their ministry can learn these all-important truths afresh by reading Dean Inge's Gifford Lectures.

S. PARKES CADMAN.

ON SENATOR JOHNSON AND WORLD FEUDS

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I want to assure you I value highly THE CHRISTIAN WORK and read with special interest editorials and other articles signed "F. L."

I was, however, taken back by some expressions in your edition of August 4 about Senator Johnson which, however, were greatly modified by your later expression, "What to us is an utterly heathen conclusion; we draw the Christian conclusion," and later, "We believe Senator Johnson is all wrong," and so on.

I also regret the expression, "We admire him much more than we do Hughes and Hoover, and even President Harding, in this regard." From which I conclude you admire the man who has a foreign policy, and a wrong one you admit, more than those who have shown initiative and desire to work out in these troublous times and divided sentiments at home and abroad a method of procedure along Christian lines, which you approve, but which have as yet not been adaptable as a working policy.

I have read, too, your "Observer" article about Senator Johnson's speech at the Waldorf-Astoria, in same issue, without your comment. All seem to me to be giving him undue notoriety and possibly favorable publicity.

I am a resident of this State for more than forty-nine years, and came to California when nearly twenty-three years of age. I used to admire Senator Johnson when Governor of the State, and recognize he did this State some valuable service, but have lost my confidence in him of late years, since he has become, as it seems to me, so completely the tool of the "Hearst" interest, which I regard as a menace to the United States.

I read with much interest in the August 11 issue your editorial on the death of President Harding. Am glad you saw much to comment on favorably on the man I had learned to love and regard as a great man—a Christian statesman who humbly acknowledged he did not know it all, but took into his cabinet great men—Hughes, Hoover, and so on.

I have a very strong feeling that our Secretary of State, Charles E. Hughes, is the biggest man, or near it, in the nation. A great Christian statesman. President Harding's admiration for him was evident. I somehow believe and am praying that Secretary Hughes, if given a chance, is going to work out a way whereby this greatest Christian nation will be brought into such relations to many, yes, all other nations; that war will be regarded as heathenish; that "Peace on earth, good-will among men," individuals and nations will be advanced, thus hastening the coming of the Kingdom.

I regard, as do you, the Washington "Conference for the Limitation of Armament" as the world's first and great movement in the right direction. This recalls a conversation had with an old friend of mine in the latter part of 1921 when the Conference was in session. My remark was that I was watching with great interest the proceedings of the Conference at Washington. His answer was, "Yes, I hope good will come of it, but I'm afraid of getting into some foreign alliance or mixup."

My reply, "You must read the (Los Angeles) 'Examiner.'" "Yes, and others." My comment as above, "The Hearst papers are a menace." Then I said, "You are a Kentuckian. Yes, and are proud of Kentucky—a great State it is; we are all proud of it. As you know, it is all divided up into counties—each county has a courthouse, a judge and officers, good code of laws, all machinery for settling differences, lands, property, and so on."

"Yes, the best."

"Some of the counties, as you know, run up into the mountains, over toward my native State, eastern Tennessee. You know how that for years some of the settlers in these mountains have not taken their differences to the courts, but have settled or tried to with pistols, rifles, shotguns, and such, killing off opposite sides. The Kentucky mountain 'feuds.'"

"Yes, I heard of them for years; not all over yet."

"And," I added, "you are not proud of them?"

"No, I'm ashamed that in this day and age of civilization such exist."

"Well," I said, "do you see any difference between that way of settling differences, the way those mountaineers have been settling their matters, and the way the nations have been trying to do the same—killing off opposite sides?"

His answer, "Well, it does look somewhat alike."

You will excuse this lengthy letter. I trust Senator Johnson will receive copies of August 4 and 11 and read several other very valuable articles—for instance, Dr. Faunce's baccalaureate sermon at Brown. Your paper is doing great service in helping people to see that the Christian way is the only way for both individuals and nations.

HOW TO GET MARRIED

Roman Catholic priests are not seldom very shrewd counselors. A good many of them understand human nature pretty well. Occasionally in the vestibules of Roman Catholic churches one may come across a pamphlet, by Rev. John A. Schmitt, entitled "How to Get Married." Its counsel as to the sort of young men and young women not to marry is worth reprinting.

Don't Marry the Young Man

- Who is careless or slovenly.
- Who is lazy.
- Who has no trade or profession.
- Who changes his work periodically and therefore has worked for many people.
- Who speaks against his former employers.
- Who is selfish and stubborn.
- Who thinks he "knows it all," and has a good deal to say.
- Who does not try to read or inform himself, but
- Who prefers to loaf around the street corners, the club, or the saloon.
- Who keeps late hours—and has no feeling or regard for his parents who are waiting for him.
- Who is "one of the boys" and must keep up with them.
- Who joins everything that comes along just to be in style—no matter where the money comes from.
- Who lives beyond his means and has debts.
- Who has not helped his parents.
- Who has not saved anything or but little.
- Who talks about paying his mother a few dollars for board and thinks his duty done.
- Who always dresses according to the latest style, though his parents go threadbare.
- Who wastes his money on you.
- Who knows so many other girls.
- Who tells how he did not want such a one.
- Who is fond of drink or gambling.
- Who is indelicate in his expressions or allusions.
- Who expects you to be alone with him and seems to be afraid of the other members of your family.
- Who is slow to leave your house and never keeps seasonable hours.
- Who wants to go to places with which you are not familiar and where you would not wish your parents to see you.
- Who often tells you how much he respects your virtue and how safe you are in his company.
- Who makes most rosy promises for the future.

THE MONDAY CLUB SERMONS

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. Who tells you that you will never have to work if you marry him.

Who has deceived you even in little things.

Who is not prompt or punctual in keeping his word.

Who does not manifest a special affection for his mother and sisters.

Who is not interested in his religion.

Whom you do not see often at the communion rail.

Who, when he goes to church, is not with his family in the pew—but stands near the door.

Who does not seem to know how to conduct himself at church.

Who, when you ask him to go to church with you, suggests another place.

Who laughs when you ask him to say the rosary or listen to some pious reading.

Whose friends and companions are not religious and exemplary.

Who seems to avoid your father and brothers.

Who does not wish you to make a perfect confidant of your mother.

Who expects you to tell lies to accommodate him.

Who will not give up certain habits you have warned him against.

Don't Marry the Girl

Who nags.

Who is lazy.

Who is a flirt.

Who cannot control her temper.

Who dislikes children and animals.

Who is not neat and tidy in her dress.

Who is deceitful and not true to her friends.

Who fusses and fumes about everything.

Whose highest aspiration has never soared above self.

Who is amiable to suitors and "horrid" to her family.

Whose chief interests in life are dress and amusements.

Who lacks thrift, and has no idea of the value of money.

Who cannot bear to have any one but herself praised or admired.

Who thinks more of making a fine appearance than a fine character.

Who is coarse, imperious and domineering in manner and conversation.

Who never thinks that her mother needs an outing, amusements, or a change.

Who humiliates servants by snapping at them or criticizing them before guests.

Who appropriates the best of everything for herself and is thoughtless of others.

Who attracts attention in public places by "loud" dress, loud talk and laughter.

Who dresses in the height of fashion when going out, but does not care how she looks at home.

If the other members of the family have to watch her mood in order to avoid an explosion or a scene.

Who tries to keep up false appearances by running in debt for her tailor-made clothing, millinery and flowers.

Who does not think it worth while to read for self-improvement, or current information, but spends her time reading trashy novels.

If she expects everybody else in the home to contribute to her pleasure, instead of trying to make them happy.

Who calls her home "so common," but does nothing to make it attractive or cozy, and stays there just as little as possible.

Who is indiscreet and says she does not care if people do talk scandal about her, so long as she is conscious that she is all right.

Who always comes to the breakfast table late and cross, in an old wrapper or dressing jacket, with her hair in curl-papers, and who grumbles and scolds at everything and everybody.

Who puts everything she can get on her back, so that she may make a good appearance, while her mother is obliged to patch and make over for herself old cloaks, gowns and bonnets.

Who is ashamed to take her mother calling with her, or to invite friends to her home, or to tell them where she lives.

Who refuses to work because she thinks it would lower her in the estimation of her friends; who thinks it beneath her to help support her family, and who is ashamed to let her friends know that she works for a living.

Who is ashamed of her "old-fashioned" parents and is always apologizing for their bad English, slips in etiquette, and their old foggy ideas, and tells them that they are not up-to-date; that times have changed since they were young; that people now are more liberal in their ideas; that girls are more independent.

Who imagines she will make a model wife and boasts of it, but is afraid you will not treat her properly and makes threats about what she will do.

Who expects to handle all the funds—and, if she has anything in her own name, is determined not to let you have a voice about it.

Who expects to keep money without your knowledge and brags of how independent she will be. She does not intend to be the sunshine and companion of your life, but expects to use you for what you are worth and give nothing in return.

Who is not fond of prayer and seldom receives the sacraments.

Who is too worldly to belong to the sodality of the Blessed Virgin.

Who goes only to an early mass and often late at that, and never attends Vespers.

Who likes to remain in the back of the church, unless she has a new garment to exhibit.

Who gets tired in church and complains of it. Who talks freely of the wedding dress and feast, the house and furniture she would like—but says nothing about what she intends to do to make you happy.

Who talks about how much hired help she will have—not thinking that she is going to do anything herself.

Who thinks that she has many rights and you will have to assume all the duties.

We Must Rebuild the Japanese Churches!

The earthquake in Japan not only caused the death of thousands, the impoverishment of hundreds of thousands, but it totally wrecked all the Churches of Tokyo and Yokohama.

The Japanese Christians, pastors and laymen, as well as our missionaries, have shown marvelous courage. They have been foremost in caring for the wounded and ministering to the suffering. Their courage is still undaunted and immediately

They Have Started a Campaign to Rebuild Their Churches

This radiogram has just come to our Mission Boards and tells its own story:

“Japanese Church Federation (and) the Federated Missions of Japan (have) formed international (and) interdenominational commission (for) survey (and) reconstruction. Seventy churches (have been) destroyed (and) 6000 Christian families (are) homeless.”

Converse.

(Secretary of Federation of Christian Missions of Japan,)

The cost of rebuilding the seventy churches destroyed cannot be less than $500,000.

Here is a remarkable opportunity for the Christians of America to render not only a beautiful service of good-will to their Japanese fellow-Christians, but also to make an investment that will be lasting and which will go on rendering a beneficent service through many years.

We wish it could be said that every one of the fifty thousand readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK—children as well as adults—had some part in this investment. It would make history. Likewise, this investment would do more to create lasting peace and good-will than all the navies in the world.

Have you not noticed that all of the yellow journals of both Japan and America have stopped talking war?

THE CHRISTIAN WORK wants to have a large share in rebuilding these churches. No doubt the Foreign Mission Boards will at once begin a campaign to raise funds to rebuild their churches. The independent native churches must also look to America.

Will not every reader of these words send a contribution at once to THE CHRISTIAN WORK? Do not pass this wonderful opportunity by—send what you can, large or small.

If you want your contribution to go through one of the Mission Boards for a Mission Church, indicate that fact in your letter. If you want it to go to the native churches—and much must be sent to them—indicate that also (all unindicated contributions will go to them).

We have asked Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, who was missionary in Japan for many years, and who is known by every native pastor in Japan, to forward checks for the native churches, to be used under the direction of a committee in Japan.

Send your contributions at once to THE CHRISTIAN WORK

THE OTHER CHILDREN

The Bell Syndicate is performing a very useful service in spreading Angelo Patri's messages far and wide in this country. As will be recalled, Mr. Patri is principal of one of the public schools of New York City. He is an outstanding example of the fact that the immigrant or his son may become as truly American in the very best sense as any descendant of the immigrants who came hither three hundred years ago. The following wise counsel recently appeared over his name:

Of course, it's too bad, but, like many other things in this world, it can't be helped. You can't bring up the children without reference to the other children. Just when you think you have grounded them in the faith the other children come along and spoil it all.

You teach Max that his family do not smoke cigarettes, because it is not good for them. You teach him that his growth might be checked, that his lungs might rebel, and his nerves suffer, should he smoke them.

He seems to have accepted it all calmly enough, until one day he announces that Harold smokes and that he says all that talk about injuring health with a few whiffs of cigarette smoke is all nonsense!

"He says look at his father! He smokes all he wants to, and he's the biggest man in the town! And isn't it true? And he says during the war we sent loads of cigarettes to soldiers to make them fight better, and we did, didn't we? So I'm for smoking!"

"Now, isn't it just too bad?" you say to yourself. "Why should that troublesome neighbor boy come along just when we had things fixed up so nicely?"

What's the use? Wouldn't he have come along in some form or other? Isn't he coming along all the time, wherever you go, whatever you try to do? You have always to reckon with the other children. They, with yours, make the world. Wouldn't it be silly to train up your children in disregard of the others?

Of course, it is not wise for growing boys to smoke, and that's fiat. But how are you going to teach them that? The best way to do it is to stick close to the facts. Some people can smoke cigarettes all day without suffering by the performance and some other folk can't.

Besides the effect of the smoking, there is a social side to that which has many dangers for the growing lad. Tell him about them and appeal to his reason. Piling up the agony won't get anywhere, because the children will laugh it away.

It is well on the whole to know as much about the other children as we can. They are the public opinion that has the last word on what we are teaching. Invite them to come in and make themselves heard. Teach them to speak right out and thrash out the thing that you differ upon.

Don't make the old-fashioned mistake that what children say does not matter. It matters tremendously to your children.

It is no longer possible to dominate the lives of our children. We train them when they are little, but when they are old enough to think they become part of the great democracy of childhood; and the other children count.

They count so much that when you are placing the children in school you look well to the kind of children that compose it. You know they will have a powerful influence on the child you place among them. Then why not acknowledge that, to begin with, and get the power of your side, if possible?

Above all, be honest with them. Let them know that they count, and so carry a great responsibility. That helps much.—The Bell Syndicate, Inc.

THE FLAG FOLLOWS THE CROSS

I have had twenty-one years' experience among natives. I have seen the semi-civilized and the uncivilized; I have lived with the Christian native, and I have lived, dined and slept with the cannibal. . . . But I have never yet met a single man or woman, or a single people, that your civilization, without Christianity, has civilized. . . . Gospel and commerce, but it must be the Gospel first. Wherever you find in the island of New Guinea a friendly people that will welcome you, there the missionaries of the Cross have been preaching Christ. Civilization! The rampart can only be stormed by those who carry the Cross.—James Chalmers, Missionary and Martyr.

THE DANGER OF HISTORY

Samuel Crowther recently had an interview with the ex-Sultan, now only the Calif, which he reports in Colliers. Mr. Crowther asked of Abdul Medjid what he thought of history. His answer ran as follows:

"Sometimes I do not know. It seems that we ought to learn from history—that it ought to teach us how to act for the future. But it does not seem to do that. Most history seems to be written to keep alive ancient hatreds, and we might all be happier if we had no history."

Abdul should talk over the question with our American critics of history, who want all the anti-British rancor preserved in our school books.

The Episcopal Church is helping to stimulate Bible reading by publishing a calendar of suggested passages. The calendar presents three courses: A, a variety of Old and New Testament readings; B, the life of Christ, followed by Old Testament character studies; C, for boys and girls, the life and teaching of Christ.

The calendar may be obtained for a nominal price from the Protestant Episcopal Church Bookstore, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

The Federated Women's Aid Society of Los Angeles Presbytery has issued a twenty-four page booklet on the possible work for women in the church. EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM OF THE CITIZENSHIP CONFERENCE

We devote a large part of the current issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK to a report of the Citizenship Conference held at Washington this month, printing Governor Pinchot's great address and the report of the Fact Finding Commission on Prohibition, its enforcement and its results. The Citizenship Conference recognized that if it ended its work with the mere passing of resolutions and the expression of a wish that the Volstead Law should be enforced it would not amount to anything serious. So the Conference not only made a provision for a succession of similar conferences throughout the country, but through its Committee on Educational Policy, it laid out a scheme for a steady program of education. The Committee, of which Samuel Zane Batten, the distinguished Baptist and sociologist was chairman, included Miss Cora F. Stoddard, who has led in work of scientific education in regard to the effect of alcohol; Homer Folks, the eminent social worker; Charles Scanlon, the head of the Temperance Department of the Presbyterian Church, and other men and women of similar caliber. The Committee urged believers in prohibition to see that the temperance instruction prescribed in the public schools should be maintained in accordance with the law. It suggested that churches and Sunday-schools should renew their effort to secure the signing of the pledge and especially see that instruction was given to the children on the evils of alcoholic drink. It suggested that the International Sunday-School Lesson Committee should work out a plan for temperance instruction in full harmony with modern methods of religious and social education. It recognized the need of making custom and fashion "prohibition-minded." "With the discouragement of the use of liquor should go enlargement of mental outlook and life interests, the cultivation of high types of recreation and fellowship to afford legitimate and helpful relaxation and outlet for natural activity impulses. This is an imperative task for home and school, the Church, the community, the library, the recreation center, and all social and educational organizations of youth and adults." The Committee suggested the need of conferring with moving picture producers in an endeavor to secure the elimination of all scoffing at prohibition as bad form and unpatriotic, and the creation of films or scenes depicting the benefits of total abstinence and prohibition, and of the importance of respecting all laws. The Committee well says that in order to secure respect for law we need to make family discipline a reality once more. We must have "a tough moral fibre in character." The Committee summed up the task in the words of Abraham Lincoln: "Let every American, every lover of liberty, every well-wisher to his posterity swear by the blood of the Revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country, and never to tolerate their violation by others. As the patriots of '76 rallied to the support of the Declaration of Independence, so to the support of the Constitution and laws let every American pledge his life, his property, and his sacred honor—let every man remember that to violate the law is to trample on the blood of his father, and to tear the charter of his own children's liberty."

THE GOVERNORS AND THE PRESIDENT ON PROHIBITION

It has been an unwritten law of the Conference of Governors that it should never commit itself to a resolution. But at its meeting at West Baden, Indiana, last week, the Conference broke the precedent of fourteen years and adopted a statement pledging the Governors to aid in the enforcement of the prohibition law and offering their co-operation with the President to that end. Governor Blaine of Wisconsin and Governor Parker of Louisiana especially objected to the Governors going on record in this way. On the day following, the Governors lunched with President Coolidge at Washington. In his formal address to them the President spoke of three matters in which the nation needs the co-operation of the States: in preventing the unlawful entry of immigrants—the President said that the Department of Labor reckoned that about one hundred thousand enter this country illegally; in the suppression of the use of narcotic drugs; and in the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. Speaking on the last topic, the President in passing gave an admirable answer to the "rummies," who insist that the Eighteenth Amendment does not represent the will of the people. "The American people," he said, "are not a nation of inebriates; they are not a people who can be charged with being hypocrites. They have no patience with anarchy. They are a sober, frank and candid people. They have respect and reverence for duly constituted authority. To them the law is a rule of action." His own pledge of law enforcement is perfectly satisfactory. "I propose to give that support and protection [to this great law-abiding element of the nation] to the limit provided by the Constitution and the law of the land, against every lawless element. The executives are required to enforce the law." Altogether the events of the last two weeks have shown that the American people has the same determination to secure prohibition that it had when it passed the amendment four years ago, and that it is setting its teeth in preparation for making prohibition the actual condition of affairs not only in the country and in the West and South, but in the city and in the wettest belts of the East.

CONDITIONS IN THE RUHR

Just what is, or has been, the state of affairs in the Ruhr? Has there been cruelty? Have black troops been guilty of outrages on the population? Have the Germans been treacherously killing French soldiers? Of course, a region cannot be occupied by foreign troops without some conflict. Outwardly, however, the French and Germans in the Ruhr have been treating each other quite correctly. The idea which some propagandists have attempted to spread, that colored troops have been guilty of outrageous acts, could not have originated in the Ruhr itself. The French say they have no colored troops in the country. The French use this term colored in a somewhat different way from what we do. They do not regard the people from North Africa, despite their dark complexion, as colored. They differentiate thus between them and the Senegalese. None of the latter troops are in Germany. One does see some of the dark North Africans. But a visitor in the Ruhr hears no complaints of outrages by the French troops. He does hear many minor complaints. French troops are quartered in homes. There are all sorts of disputes arising over adjustments there; but that fact is not to be wondered at. The strict military rules give rise, also, to some unhappy incidents. The French ordered all lights to be out at eight o'clock. We know of a case where a woman got up at ten o'clock at night to nurse her baby. She lit a candle. The French, of course, had no idea why the light appeared. A volley of shots went through the window. The woman was killed. Ten or twelve courts-martial are in constant session, or were, at least, before the end of passive resistance. The courts-martial deal with twelve to sixteen cases every day, and probably send fifty men daily to prison. The German hausfrau was always anxious when she bade her men folk good-bye in the morning lest they might not return at night. When men are imprisoned no word is sent to their families. Thence arises an immense amount of anxiety and fear. Transportation is, or at least was, almost at an end—no interurban cars running; no trains passing from the Ruhr to Germany—the only train crossing the Ruhr border goes to Paris. The German population have no access to telephone or telegraph. It is a difficult situation, but on the whole the French have made it no more difficult than seemed absolutely necessary. It should be remembered that, in regard to reparations, the Germans have spread a propaganda of "I can't." Perhaps if they had spread the contrary, "I will do all I can," there never would have arisen any Ruhr crisis.

WHAT FRANCE DEMANDS

In her relations with Germany, France is concerned for three things: for reparations, for the industrial future, and for the safety of her eastern border. Of the first we shall speak more in detail later. In regard to the second, as all the world knows, Germany destroyed the mines and factories of the invaded districts, intending to have a clear field for her own manufactures in world trade after the war. It will take years to put the French mines in shape. The arrangement in regard to the Saar Valley was one step toward giving France a fair show in spite of the destruction wrought by Germany upon her soil. The leaders of German industry to-day, it appears, would be quite willing to come to an agreement with the leaders of French industry by which both should have a fair chance. In regard to her eastern frontier—naturally one of her main concerns—France is bound that if ever another war comes it shall not be fought on French territory. To secure that end she is determined that the country on the left bank of the Rhine shall be completely demilitarized. Not unnaturally she would not trust merely to a German promise in this matter. An international commission strong enough to see that such an agreement on the part of Germany was carried out would meet the situation. Germany by now realizes that she must satisfy France in this respect. In other words, Germany and France could come to an agreement on two of the fundamental problems that stand between them, the industrial and the demilitarizing. They cannot come to an agreement on the reparations question because, as things are to-day, France must demand a greater sum than Germany is willing to undertake to pay. It is just on that last question that America is involved.

AMERICA, THE INEQUILIBRIATOR

What sum of money does France want from Germany? She wants enough in reparations to rebuild her devastated districts. It is perfectly true that she refused to approve the plan which the late Walter Rathenau, the greatest German of the post-war period, and Loucheur, the sound-headed French economist, were ready to agree upon for the use of German labor and German material in the rebuilding of the devastated towns. French labor declared that it wanted the opportunity to do the work there; French material dealers declared they wanted to supply the stone and mortar and iron. And French politicians said sharply they would not endure to have Germans on their soil, so that, very naturally, this sensible scheme went by the board. However much we may disagree with the French decision on that plan, it was made and appears irrevocable now. The French owe America and Great Britain forty-five billion gold francs. If they must pay that debt completely, while they receive only twenty-two billion five hundred million from Germany, it is obvious that they will have less than nothing to put to their reparations account; in other words, they themselves will be paying for the destruction which Germany worked on their devoted soil and a tremendous debt beside. Is it not reasonable that France should take exactly the position she does, that she must receive twenty-six billion gold marks for reparations in addition to what she may need to cover the amount which she must pay to Great Britain and the United States? So long as we insist on our pound of flesh France has no choice but to insist on her pound. It may be that by cutting down production and by screwing down the pace at which we work we can become a country that has no surplus, and so live in reasonable prosperity here and let Europe go hang. Certainly, that is not the Christian thing, and in the long run it is just as certainly not the good business thing. Neighborliness—as well as godliness—is not only profitable for the life which is to come, but for the life which now is. (Probably neighborliness and godliness are synonymous.) What is necessary is that the mass of the American people should see that our stiffneckedness in regard to the money owed us has a large share in keeping the world upset. As we have said, those who know the situation most intimately do not question that France and Germany could come to an agreement on the other two outstanding questions. So we hold in our hands the key to the peace of Europe. The arrangement for the funding of the British debt to America complicates matters more or less. Moreover, Congress has instructed our Debt Funding Commission not to scale the debts owed to us. But these matters can be adjusted. We must send our commissioners to Europe to talk things over face to face with the leaders there. They will learn that not only do we hold the key to present peace, but if we were willing to scale our debts we could secure from Europe almost any arrangement we desired for the decrease of their military establishments and for the establishment of habits of peace. Are we to throw away such an opportunity as the centuries may not soon offer to any one land again? Thanks to some of our business men, a campaign of education is beginning, to acquaint our people with the real state of affairs touching reparations and our very intimate relation to it. It is for every one of us to aid all that he can in that campaign of education.

IS GERMANY BREAKING UP?

The prognostications of those who have said that Germany was being driven to destruction by its own financial folly and by the situation in the Ruhr have received a considerable justification this past week. In many parts of Germany men and women have rioted for food. With prices at the fantastic figure that they are, it is most remarkable that German tradesmen should still be willing to take paper marks. The bad blood between monarchist Bavaria and radical Saxony has, if anything, grown worse during the week. The Berlin government has administered a rebuke to the Radical-Socialist-Communist government in Saxony—apparently to placate the conservative element in Bavaria. Meanwhile the Bavarian dictator has more than once disregarded orders from Berlin. At Aix-la-Chapelle on the Belgian border last Sunday two not very prominent Germans, Leo Deckers and Dr. Guthardt, proclaimed a Rhineland Republic. Within twenty-four hours Separatists in league with them had taken possession of the government in scattered towns in Rhenish Prussia or in the districts of Coblenz and Treves. The independent Rhineland advocates contemplate an independent state which would have a population of fifteen million people and would include a large proportion of the industrial districts of Germany. In many respects the French would be greatly pleased if there were an independent Rhineland, but they are somewhat fearful of its ability to live and defend itself. The French and Belgians apparently will not openly back the present movement, but it would appear that they will do nothing to make it fail. The Rhineland has a long history of independence of both Germany and France. It is the ancient kingdom of Lothair. But it is difficult to believe that the majority of the people in the district want to be separated from Germany now. Before the Rhineland declaration of independence the French had arranged to put what is virtually a new currency into circulation in the Ruhr, another means, perhaps, of breaking German unity. The new currency consists of "transport bonds," based upon service rendered by the railroads and receivable by them as payment for transportation. So far Poincaré has made no advance toward coming to terms with Germany since the Germans gave up passive resistance. Chancellor Stresemann last Friday declared that Germany will discontinue all reparation deliveries. The whole situation is impossibly confused.

PREPAREDNESS PROPAGANDA FROM THE CHIEF OF CHAPLAINS

The War Department, it seems to be clear, intends to use the Chaplain's Office as a steady source of propaganda in behalf of the National Defense Act. Two weeks ago we referred to an attack on "pacifism" which it had put out. On October 16 the department sent out an address by Colonel John T. Axton, Chief of Chaplains, to be delivered before the National Council of Congregational Churches at Springfield, Mass., October 22. On the last page of the address, under the heading, "The National Defense Act," we find the following paragraphs:

Churches might well put themselves on record relative to the National Defense Act. This is a legislative enactment of our Congress under which the War Department functions. Those of us who are in the military establishment are especially charged with carrying out the provisions of that law, just as certain other departments of the government are engaged upon the task of bringing about obedience to other mandates of our law-making body.

To some ultra-pacifists there seems to be a difference in their obligation to support law. With one voice they condemn all elements in society which try to break down the Volstead Act, but these same ultra-pacifists see no inconsistency in their antagonism toward and their effort to break down our national military policy, which is based entirely upon equally well considered law. We need a vigilant public opinion behind all laws if they are to be made effective.

This is not a militaristic nation. It never can be. The army itself hates war and now finds its greatest task to be to devise ways to prevent war. We know war's horrors far better than some who defame us. We agree with that eminent Englishman (Curzon) who said, "Any fool can make war," and we agree equally with that Boston editor ("The Transcript") who added, "Therefore it behooves wise men to prepare to defend themselves."

Apparently Secretary Weeks is trying to make the National Defense Act a fetish before which the Chaplain's Office must bow down. Last spring the conference on the chaplaincy at Washington turned itself practically into a glorification of the National Defense Act. Chief Chaplain Axton is an excellent man, but if he wants the continued interest and support of the churches in the chaplains' work he cannot afford to lend himself to this propaganda. The chaplains are teachers of Christianity, not channels of preparedness propaganda.

A JEW ON THE BREAKDOWN OF ZIONISM

Israel Zangwill, the distinguished British Jew, has been a Zionist since the first Zionist Congress, but he told the American Jewish Congress at New York last week that as he sees it political Zionism is dead. The English officials, he says, and the "weak" (Zangwill's adjective) Jewish Governor, Sir Herbert Samuels, have made it impossible for the Jew really to become the dominant people in Palestine. So careful are the local authorities not to stir up Arab opposition in Palestine that recently when the Arabs objected to the draining of swamps which had been waste land for centuries, the Palestine government forbade the Ica (Jewish Colonization Association) to go on with the work. In order to create a nation, Zangwill says, not only is right necessary, but might also. The Zionists, he feels, have not had the courage to assert might, so they have sacrificed Jewish autonomy without securing Arab recognition or friendship. So disappointing have been results in Palestine that the recent Zionist Conference at Carlsbad passed a vote of censure on the British conduct of the mandate. He made a good point against the Zionism of American Jews. In 1922 only sixty-six Jews left this country for Palestine. That fact would seem to justify the definition of a Zionist given by Ferdinand, the ex-King of Bulgaria—"a man who pays another man to live in Palestine." The American Jewish Congress deeply disagreed with Mr. Zangwill's views, asserting that Jews, far from giving up Palestine, were resolved "to go forward more vigorously, effectively and unitedly than ever before. The Jewish people will be just to the Arabs, by the side of whom the Jewish builders of Palestine are to live in understanding and amity." Nevertheless Zangwill's statement of conditions in Palestine is a recognition of a reality. One may not agree with his opinion that might is necessary in order to settle the question. But certainly, a new spirit is necessary in Palestine. By their own reckoning the Jews are only one-ninth of the population of Palestine to-day. It is impossible to give a favored position in a country to eleven per cent of its population without stirring up manifold jealousies and disorders. Any proposition in America to give a comparable position, for instance, to the Germans, supposing that those of German blood represented eleven per cent of our population, would insure an absolutely impossible situation. The suggestion that the Jews should dominate in Palestine strikes the Arabs, who have lived there for millenniums, as almost as unjust as the German suggestion strikes us Americans. If Palestine is to be opened peacefully to a considerable Jewish emigration, it is necessary somehow that new relations between the races there should be established.

There is a good deal of common sense among the English. "The Manchester Guardian Weekly" not long ago commented on the decision of our Federal Courts respecting the seizure of liquor-smuggling vessels of foreign registry outside the three-mile limit: "As soon as our government puts its foot down and stops these systematic efforts to defeat the laws of a friendly country the United States will be under no necessity to pursue smugglers on the high seas." Good for "The Manchester Guardian."

A little side light from the Pan-American Conference at Santiago: President Alessandri of Chile is a total abstainer and believes in prohibition. When he gave a dinner to the delegates of the United States at the Pan-American Conference he was courteous enough to the laws of this country to serve no strong drinks at the dinner. Later, Mr. Fletcher, the leader of the American delegation at the Conference, gave a dinner at which drinks were served. President Alessandri, a better American than our own representative, turned down his glass. It seems that our diplomatic representatives might at least be good enough sports to respect the customs of their own country.

The new president of Chicago University at the thirty-first commemorative chapel service on October 1, recounted how he had heard the first president of the university, William Rainey Harper, say that on the morning of October 1, 1892, he sat in his office in Cobb Hall and wondered whether there would be any students. As a matter of fact, 510 registered the first day, and 744 during the first year. In contrast, last year the university registered 12,745 students. Its faculty has grown from ninety-two in 1892 to 405 to-day. It expended a little over half a million dollars in 1894-5 and nearly three and a third millions in 1922-23. A rapid growing tree, but in this case no proof that it is not an oak.

The missions in Korea are determined to make their Sunday-schools the best possible. The Korean Sunday School Association has appointed Rev. John V. Lacy of the Methodist mission and Rev. M. B. Stokes of the Methodist Mission South, to give full time to the interdenominational Sunday School Association. The Presbyterians also have given the services of Rev. J. Gordon Holdcroft, D.D. Dr. Holdcroft will be general secretary of the Korean Sunday School Association. The Association also has a Korean worker, Rev. James K. Chung, a college graduate with an American theological training. Mr. Chung will take a year of special preparation in religious education and begin his work in Korea in 1924.

an occasional outbreak like that where, under the leadership of Dr. John Roach Straton, of New York, a group of Baptists got together and demanded the removal of the broad-minded Foreign Missions secretary of the Baptist Church, Dr. James H. Franklin. The disposition still persists, however, in many quarters to insist that preachers in the pulpits shall conform to certain doctrines or interpretations of the doctrines that are held by powerful groups within the Church, large or small, as the case may be, and shall consider certain dogmas and theories that have grown up within the Church as a part of the Gospel itself.

It is right here that the trouble lies. The Fundamentalist is insisting that certain things be preached which are no part of the original Gospel. The Modernist insists that the pulpit exists to preach the Gospel and not to act as judge of the historic accuracy of certain facts, and not to act as the protagonist of certain theories and doctrines which have grown up with the Church's history, which have always been variously interpreted, which are valuable and interesting, but which are not the Gospel. And the pulpit exists for the preaching of the Gospel. And the only test of a preacher is, does he believe the Gospel and can he preach it? The Church has a gospel. It came into being to preach a gospel—a new gospel—to carry good news to all the world. Jesus gave it its message as He created it. It naturally added what He was and did to His words, and that became the Gospel. It has since been enriched by Christian experience and the leadership of the Holy Spirit, but it still remains the Gospel, and the mission of the preacher still remains the commission Christ gave the first disciples—"Go ye into all the world preaching the Gospel to every creature." He did not tell them to go preach how man came into being, or any theory of inspiration or the authorship of the Pentateuch, or even how He was born. He told them to go to the world with the Gospel.

This was just what the early Church did when we examine its history. It had a commission and certain truth had been committed to its charge. The history of those early periods reveals that this is just what it did. It went into Asia Minor, Greece and Rome telling what Jesus Christ taught, and telling the story of His life and death and resurrection. It did not discuss the authorship of the Bible because there was no Bible in existence. It did not teach any theory of inspiration because its authority was not in scattered books which had not then even been collected, but was in Jesus Christ and the Church to which He had committed His gospel and His task. It did not discuss the origin of man because it did not know anything about it and was not interested in it. It was no part of the Gospel. Paul and John and Peter do not dwell upon the origin of man because they are concerned with telling him the truth that will save him regardless of where he came from. Paul at first preached that Christ might come again soon, but he gradually had less and less to say about it, seemingly uncertain as to it, and put all his emphasis on the Gospel as his colleagues were doing. They preach the death of Christ, but elaborate no theory of the atonement. They confined themselves to the Gospel, namely, that Christ died for the sins of the world. They elaborate no theory of resurrection. They simply preached that He conquered death, was alive for evermore, and that we, too, might rise out of death into life through Him. As to the virgin birth, none of these men preached it in their sermons—it hardly appears in the sermons of the early successors

The Fundamentalist Controversy

IT IS a significant fact that the theological questions in dispute between the Fundamentalists and Modernists still continue to hold the interest of the public. It means little that the great dailies give large space to reporting the sermons of Doctors Fosdick and Grant, because these sermons have news value just at present and there have been dramatic situations in the case of these preachers which the newspapers have of course seized upon. It is significant, however, when the secular magazines devote large space to the discussion. It takes for granted a wide public interest in theological questions. Thus a recent number of "The Forum" has two long articles, one by Mr. Bryan and the other by Dr. Hillis, presenting the two points of view. They take up a large part of the magazine. "The Century Magazine" for July and August has editorials—and very interesting ones—on the subjects of Mr. Bryan and Evolution and the Fundamentalist controversy. The "Yale Review" for October has a long and illuminating article by Professor Benjamin W. Bacon on "The Success and Failure of Liberalism," and "The World's Work" is running a series of articles by Rollin Lynde Hart on "The War in the Churches" (rather tending to magnify a situation that is not so tense to those on the inside as it seems to those on the outside). In the Church itself things are rather quiet just now, except for of the apostles. They may have believed it. No one knows that they did not; but they did not consider it a part of the Gospel, and their mission was to preach the Gospel. The divinity of Christ certainly did not rest upon it for these first preachers of the Gospel; that rested upon His character. They knew Jesus Christ was divine and the Son of God because they had lived with Him and knew Him. The day it dawned upon Peter was when suddenly he saw Christ just as He was and exclaimed, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God!" There is no mention that he was even thinking of the virgin birth.

The mistake the Fundamentalists are making is in trying to make the church and the pulpit depart from its original commission to preach the Gospel and apply it to every phase of life, and become the propagandist and custodian of things that are not the Gospel. For instance; large groups of the Fundamentalists have been trying to make the Church pledge itself not to believe or allow any of its preachers to hold the evolutionary conception of man. But what has the method by which God created man got to do, one way or another, with the gospel Jesus Christ gave the Church and the story of the saving power of belief in Jesus Christ, which is the Church's great evangel? What has the preacher got to do with the biological origin of man? His concern is with his spiritual origin, character and destiny. His physical origin is simply a matter of scientific evidence, and the average preacher is no more fitted to dogmatize about it than he is on some elaborate problem of chemistry or astronomy. It is for the scientist who has spent his life in studying biology to speak authoritatively. It is perfectly ludicrous to hear a preacher—or a layman, for that matter—who has not spent one honest year's study in science expatiate with all the authoritative manner of a Huxley, a Le Conte or a Pasteur on some theory of biology or medicine. Let him at least have the sense to do what Dr. Newman Smyth did, shut himself up in a biological laboratory for several years before he speaks. But it is not his province to speak authoritatively on evolution or special creations, or whether we all come from one ancestor or from several ancestors created by God in various parts of the earth. This is for the scientist. It is for the preacher to tell the Gospel to man from whatever source he came—tell him he has the capacity for divinity and how to get it through Jesus Christ.

And what has any theory of the Old Testament got to do with the Gospel? Christ established a Church, gave it a Gospel, sent it out into the world to preach it. He did not give it the Old Testament. There was no Old Testament. He never told them it was their authority. Indeed, He often told them that He superseded it. "Ye have heard it said, . . . but I say." As a matter of fact, the Church in time, realizing as it did the wonderful religious value of the religious books of Israel, gathered them together into a volume, but they never made it authoritative. The Gospel Christ had given them and the Evangel about Christ was their authority, together with the accumulating evidence of what Christ wrought in human souls. The Old Testament had no connection with the original preaching of the Church. It preached the Gospel. When, in later years, it was bound into the Canon the preachers began to use those parts that throw light on the Gospel, but never considered the books as authoritative. They never discussed any theory of inspiration. They were concerned with the Gospel. The preacher of to-day will use it for its supreme religious value; but any theory of inspiration about it is only a question to be debated. It has nothing to do with the Gospel which Christ gave the Church and which its preachers still preach on His authority.

Again, the pulpit is to preach the incarnation. It has been the Gospel of the Church from the beginning: God in Christ reconciling the world to Himself. Christ told one of the first preachers of the Church that he who had seen Him had seen the Father, and this was the Gospel of the early Church. But there is no record of Christ's saying that the manner of His birth or the method of the incarnation was any part of the Gospel, nor is there record that the apostles and the early Church included the virgin birth as a part of their Gospel. That God was in Christ was a gospel. It is a glorious piece of good news, perhaps the best the world ever had, for it links God with humanity forever. The virgin birth is the record of a fact to be proved by evidence. The divinity of Christ does not rest upon it, the incarnation is independent of it. They are gospels and would be just as true did the evidence for the virgin birth some time seem inconclusive. The pulpit is concerned with the Gospel.

The same thing is true of the theories of the atonement. The pulpit is concerned simply with the Gospel that Christ died for the sins of the world, not with theories of it which change with every age. The same thing is true of the resurrection. The Fundamentalists would confine the pulpit to one interpretation of it, although the scriptural accounts themselves are confusing. The Gospel is simply that Christ rose again from the dead, that all are made alive in Him. When we come to the second coming of Christ, that has no relation to the Gospel whatever, for it has no religious or ethical value. The thousands who believe He will come again in bodily form are no better nor no worse than the thousands who believe His coming is a continuous spiritual process. The Gospel is not times, manners of His coming or seasons, the Gospel is judgment when we who call ourselves His followers shall appear before Him, a judgment that is going on now before the living Christ.

Again, we must call attention to this dangerous Romanizing of the Church by the Fundamentalists. We must guard our Protestant liberty. It is not the mass—some Protestant churches have the mass; it is not the confessional; not even the Pope, that distinguishes Romanism from Protestantism in the final distinction. It is the priesthood of one man versus the priesthood of all believers; it is authority versus freedom. The moment the Church has the right to tell every minister and every layman just how he must interpret the doctrines and the Scriptures and tells him certain things which lie outside the realm of the Gospel which he must believe, that moment you have Romanism. The Fundamentalists are much nearer Romanism than Dr. Orchard and the High Church Anglicans with their altars, their masses and their incense.

Religion and Social Reform

SOME people to-day are very much afraid that religion is becoming merely a social program, an enthusiasm for certain changes in the organization of society. We cannot see much reason in the churches in England at any rate for that fear. If we did, we confess we should be among those warning against it. It would be a calamity to look upon religion as nothing more than a zeal for what is called social reform. One could imagine just land laws, just economic conditions all round, ample wages and good houses and competent education, and yet very little religion. Religion undoubtedly is a relation of the soul to God and to other souls, a consciousness of Divine life, a persuasion of the spiritual nature of the universe, and of the high destiny of man in a life transcending temporal relations. Christianity is a religion of redemption, moral and spiritual. Evelyn Underhill, in her new book on "The Life of the Spirit and the Life of To-day," says that "our spiritual experience to-day, such as it is, tends above all to express itself in social activities. Teacher after teacher comes forward to plume himself on the fact that Christianity is now taking a social form; that love of our neighbor is not so much the corollary as the equivalent of the love of God, and so forth." She inquires whether such a view is complete, whether we have not lost the "wonder and poetry of the forest in our diligent cultivation of the economically valuable trees; and shall we ever see life truly until we see it with a poet's eyes? There is so much meritorious working and willing; and so little time left for quiet love. A spiritual fussiness and a material fussiness too seems to be taking the place of that inward resort to the fountal sources of our being which is the true religious act, our chance of contact with the Spirit. This compensating beat of the fully lived human life, that whole side of existence resumed in the word 'contemplation,' has been left out." This is a very important matter. If that contemplative side, that betaking of ourselves to the fountal sources, is neglected, we may be sure that our social activities will run thin and superficial, and any reform work we do in the world will lack the substance that would make it effective and enduring. On the other hand, we must see to it that religion goes out as power to effect necessary reform. Religion is not social reform; but justice, brotherhood, and the interest of the spiritual life demand social reform, and therefore religion must supply dynamic power for it, or else it will be justifiably condemned. Religion is Divine life in man going through a development towards a consummation, a development in which man must be a conscious co-operator with God, and because millions of people in the world who belong to God are now living in circumstances in which it is practically impossible for them to realize this spiritual situation, their time and energy being consumed in grinding toil in a dismal swamp of despair or in demoralizing employment, and their spirits rankling with a sense of injustice, it is necessary that these circumstances should be changed. We fail to see how any of us can be really said to care for Christianity as a religion of redemption unless we are ardent and eager to make it possible for all people to realize it. If we are indifferent, what are we redeemed from? Religious realization and the worship of God compel us to be in no half-hearted sense a social reformer. We want to give all the people a chance to realize their spiritual selves. We are sometimes told that we are on a wrong track altogether when we conceive it possible ever to have a social paradise on the earth. We are told that the earth was never meant for that. This world is a school and successive generations of scholars pass through it; they graduate, and pass on, but the school remains. But, even so, surely there is every reason why we should attend to the conditions of the schoolroom. Is a slum neighborhood, for instance, a satisfactory classroom in this world-school? If the world is a school, should we not see it large enough, light enough, airy enough, and see that the scholars are properly fed and clothed, so that they may really get on with their lessons? What kind of a school are the overcrowded people in? What are they likely to learn in those congested areas where humanity is festering not only in poverty but in wickedness? If the world is a school, by all means let us do everything possible to make it an efficient school. It may be that a social paradise for humanity on the earth is a vain dream, but is it a vain dream that we can make conditions more just in themselves, and more helpful to the cultivation of the spiritual life, than they are to-day?

There is the further question of justice to be considered. Large numbers of people at present are not getting justice. Have religious people no responsibility for this? Can they be religious without such care? Is not the God they worship a God of justice, and can He therefore be properly worshiped unless they do their best to establish justice? Is not justice fundamental in character? Religion is more than anyone can describe, but it involves the realization of the unity of mankind in God, and the Divine ownership of the world and all the people in it. It must therefore entail the duty of establishing in the world the best and justest possible relations between all people, and justice and love must be wrought as life-qualities into character.

Lytton Strachey, in his "Landmarks of French Literature," writing of the age of Louis XIV, says: "Every great tradition has its own way of dying; and the classical tradition died of timidity. It grew afraid of the flesh and blood of life; it was too polite to face realities, too elevated to tread the common ground of facts and details; it would touch nothing but generalities, for they alone are safe, harmless and respectable; and if they are also empty, how can that be helped? Starving, it shrank into itself, muttering old incantations; and it continued to mutter them, automatically, some time after it had expired." In reading that we could not help feeling that there was a type of religion, and a type of Christianity, of which that might be said. It will never come nearer to life than generalities; it is afraid of the flesh and blood of life. Its moral note never strikes beyond a harmless general principle, never comes down on any concrete wrong. It is too polite to deal with the actual sins of society, except those of which the church hearers are not usually guilty. It has no bearing on the questions that men are concerned with every day of their life, or on the conditions that press them so very hard. It has no message for the age. Such a religion will have its own way of dying, and may take a long time, but die it must. There are churches to-day that do very little more than mutter incantations; for all the practical purposes of living they have already expired. Now while we must never reduce religion to mean merely an effort of changing circumstances and conditions, however necessary those changes may be, we must see to it that we have a religion that will nevertheless produce such changes. We must soak the roots of life in a genuine spirituality, deepen and intensify the consciousness of God, but we must also translate the meaning of all that into practical life. Unless our worship of God stirs up our conscience to act rightly as citizens, as workers, as business men, as captains of industry, and gives us an earnestness for justice and a carefulness to form the best ideas as to what is just, an unreality must ultimately eat into the very heart of our religion. If we sing that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, the world and they that dwell therein, we must recognize the importance of the land being so held that the people have decent living room; we must claim for all God's children just conditions of life all round, and thus an opportunity of rising to higher levels, to the full realization of what they are. The great thing is to know religion as the life of the Spirit in ourselves, but we do not know it with any fulness until we have recognized its ethical obligations. The more deeply we recognize God, the more deeply also we realize the world as belonging to Him. And the more we recognize the world as belonging to God, the more eager we shall be to serve it, and to make it the best world we can.

Christianity, Reparations, and the Parliament of Man

THE plain fact now seems to be that there is no real solution of the reparations issue until the United States is willing to consider adjustment in the interallied debts, which demands from America a spirit of sacrifice. No other conclusion is possible when one realizes that the indebtedness of the Allies to America to-day is almost as great as the total amount which, in the judgment of the best economists, Germany can reasonably be expected to pay. American people should cease from acrimonious criticism of either France or Germany and direct their attention to their own attitude. France insists that she must have from Germany at least enough to defray the cost of rebuilding the devastated regions and to repay her debts to the United States and England. The justice of that claim no one can deny. England declares that she must receive from either France or Germany enough to pay her debt to the United States, and that she will sacrifice the rest. What then? The solution lies largely in our hands as the richest creditor nation. What right have we to demand that France make concessions to Germany when we are ourselves unwilling to make concessions to France?

It is not a question as to whether we are to become involved in the European tangle or not; we are involved already. We cannot avoid the issue by hiding our face in the sand. If we take an inflexible attitude toward the debts, insisting Shylock-wise on our pound of flesh, we may indirectly be forcing the ruin of Germany. Which God forbid!

If the United States would say clearly and unequivocally to the nations of Europe, "If an agreement to abandon present military programs can be reached, we are ready, in the interest of peace and reconstruction, to sit down with you around the table and reopen the whole question of indebtedness as well as reparations," a new light would shine into the present darkness. Until we are ready to do that, what right has America to play the part of the Pharisee? She would do better not to be saying, "I thank Thee I am not as other nations are," but to examine her own attitude and say, "God be merciful to me, a sinner."

The more one studies the situation the more he is forced to the conclusion that a generous and sacrificial spirit on the part of America is an indispensable requisite for a real solution. Here, then, is a direct duty of the Church. It has always declared that a spirit of unselfishness, of readiness for sacrifice, lies at the heart of the Christian way of life. To whom may we look to cultivate that attitude in our international policy if not to the Church?

And more than this the Church must do. For the old vicious merry-go-round of preparation for war still goes on. The old sense of insecurity and fear remains. Every nation, beyond question, would like to be free from the nightmare, but none dares to disarm alone and all together seem impotent to reach any concerted program. So trust is in the mailed fist as before. The nations still follow the way of Napoleon and the Kaiser instead of the way of the Man of Galilee.

There is only one way out. The churches of every nation must teach its people that war is a crime, the utter denial of everything for which the churches stand. They must declare that murder is murder, even when ordered by the state; that the moral law is as binding on nations as on individuals; that in the relations of nations, as of individuals, reason and justice, determined by an impartial tribunal, must supplant the resort to naked force; that to the development of agencies of international co-operation must be given the energy that nations have hitherto given to preparation for war.

How any one can visit The Hague, where the Permanent Court of International Justice is now sitting, and Geneva, where the League of Nations is at work, and observe these two international agencies dispassionately, without feeling that here a new creative force is at work, it is difficult to imagine.

In the Permanent Court one sees an agency that may be of epochal significance. Here for the first time is an international tribunal meeting in regular sessions, gradually building up a body of recognized international law so that the same moral standards that apply to individuals may be made binding upon states. The Court, it is true, is as yet entrusted with jurisdiction by the great powers only when they voluntarily submit cases to it. Until the nations recognize its affirmative jurisdiction over every dispute it will not be able to play its full part in substituting reason for force as the arbitrament of international affairs. But the Court, as it is, is a far step ahead and it is sheer folly not to build upon the foundation already laid. Here is a great Christian ideal coming to practical expression. For America to refuse its support is to stand against the advance of humanity to a higher level of moral life. To think of the Court in terms of partisan politics would be to trifle like an insane man with the future of the world. More than anything else to-day the Court needs the full support of America, which, more than any other great power, is able to bring a measure of disinterested impartiality that would be of inestimable value. The churches in America have no clearer duty at the present hour than to use all their resources in creating public opinion in America in support of the World Court.

The League of Nations may be weak and halting—it can hardly be more than half a league so long as the strongest and richest nation sits apart—but certainly it is the most hopeful thing in Europe. When one sees the welter of suspicion and distrust and hatred that characterizes much of Europe to-day he has to admit that from one angle a strong case can be made for American isolation. Except for one fact, fundamental and far-reaching. And that fact is that in every one of these European countries, as in America, there is a group of earnest, forward-looking, idealistic and unselfish men who are working for a better day, struggling to build up international co-operation in the place of competitive armaments and strife. And these men—this is the significant thing—are the men who are the backbone of the League of Nations. It is not the imperialists and the militarists, but liberals, like Lord Robert Cecil, Dr. Nansen, Paul Hymans, General Smuts, who are throwing their support to the League. The question for America is whether we will reinforce these liberal and forward-looking groups in the European countries or whether, by remaining coldly aloof, we shall let the forces of the old order prevail.

Certainly the work of the League thus far should have dispelled the bogey of a "super-state." It has followed the method of conference, of discussion, of meeting together in an atmosphere of frankness and has trusted wholly to the reasonableness of the decisions thus reached to secure their adoption. What it has been able to accomplish in this quiet way is already an achievement of no inconsiderable significance. If anyone asks for a concrete example, let him go to Austria. Two years ago it was on the verge of dissolution. This summer we found it optimistic and hopeful. An international loan has been raised, the currency has been stabilized, the public debt is being reduced, a nation is saved—an accomplishment that would have been wholly impossible without some international agency like the League.

Or take the even more recent Italo-Greek crisis. We were in Athens only a few days before its outbreak and so know something of the tenseness of feeling in Greek political circles to-day. Throughout Europe it is generally believed that if there had not been an international body like the League to which Greece could appeal and which could focus public opinion the Italian ultimatum would have precipitated war before processes of conciliation and arbitration could have been set to work.

To espouse the League just as it is may not be the Church's task, but surely it is its clear responsibility to insist that an issue so freighted with destiny for mankind shall not be decided on the basis of its probable effect on party success at the polls. Committed by its Gospel to the ideal of international brotherhood, the Church can do no less than urge with all its power that our government has the moral duty either to associate itself with the League, with whatever reservations may be regarded by our people as necessary and wise, as the best attempt so far to give practical expression to the Christian ideal, or else present to the world a superior substitute.

THE OBSERVER

The Citizenship Conference at Washington

(This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view)

THE Citizenship Conference at Washington proved even more of a success than its most ardent supporters had dared to expect. Hundreds of delegates have come to Washington from every part of the nation and the addresses have moved not only the delegates, but the whole country. It was worth all the expense and labor entailed to get before the whole country two or three of the addresses made. And they have gone before the whole country, for no conference ever got more publicity than has this one. I noted that one New York paper printed practically the whole of Governor Pinchot's remarkable address, as well as a large part of the address of Commissioner Haynes. Through all the addresses three notes have been sounded—first of all, that if the churches could really get behind the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment it could be enforced; secondly, the present Administration is whole-heartedly behind the enforcement and will spare no pains to enforce the law; and, thirdly, there is as much room for patriotism in upholding the law in times of peace as in times of war. He who connives at the breaking of the law is as much a traitor to his country as he who betrays it to an enemy from outside. While the Conference was called to discuss the integrity of all law, it immediately became a conference to get behind the enforcement of the prohibition amendment, and practically every speaker devoted himself to this theme.

The three most outstanding incidents in the Conference were the presentation of the "Fact-Finding Survey" by the Rev. F. Ernest Johnson and Dr. Charles Stelzle; the address by Commissioner Haynes, and the address by Governor Pin-chot. The Survey was of greatest value because it presented the facts as they were, and not as either the optimist or pessimist, the friends of prohibition and its opponents, want them. If ever the need of just such a conference as this to stir up the law-abiding elements of the community was manifested it was in this Survey. I doubt if anyone at the Conference ever quite realized how powerful and inimical the foes of the law, especially the prohibition law, are in this country, and how the very foundations of all law are being threatened. The Survey, which will be printed in THE CHRISTIAN WORK in the near future, should be read by every law-abiding man in the United States. It shows that the vast quantities of liquors that were in bond have been largely consumed or destroyed, so that not much is coming from that source; but smuggling and illicit manufacture have increased by leaps and bounds until certain parts of the country are fairly deluged by liquor. Everyone knows that this "hooch" is terrible stuff. The sale of beer has fallen off very markedly, but many of the big breweries are holding on, temporarily putting out "near beer" and soft drinks, waiting to deluge the country the moment the act might be modified to permit the sale of real beer. (The Survey says that many of these breweries have large quantities of real beer in stock. It does not say how much of this leaks out into the big cities, but large quantities come from some source.) The report indicates that large parts of the money being spent in the propaganda for light wines and beer come from the owners of these breweries. The workingmen are not drinking as much as formerly and there is no doubt that their homes are happier and more prosperous, but that drinking has greatly increased among young men. The higher standard of living observed in some places is due in part to the widespread bootlegging going on. There is no doubt but that crime decreased on the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment, but the discouraging feature is that it is increasing again and going up to the old percentage day by day. "The former high level has not been reached, but the trend is unmistakably toward it." The conclusions to which Mr. Johnson and Dr. Stelzle arrive they state in the following words: "We have apparently demonstrated that prohibition can be made effective, but we are now demonstrating that in some sections of the country, at least, nullification is by no means a remote possibility."

Commissioner Haynes, apparently speaking with official sanction, declared in his address that President Coolidge's administration was determined to enforce the "dry law." "This administration is four-squared for effective enforcement," Mr. Haynes said. "We all know how valiantly President Harding supported and sponsored it. No less whole-hearted is President Coolidge's position on law enforcement. Attorney General Daugherty's position is always well known. The report of the Attorney General recently made to President Coolidge, covering the activities of the Department of Justice, shows that department is in dead earnest in the prosecution of violators of the prohibition laws." The Commissioner asserted that his forces had experienced the most difficulty in enforcing the dry law in the States of the eastern seaboard. (The Survey had also called attention to the fact that the States on the Atlantic seaboard were the chief violators of the act. This is probably due to the ease of smuggling. The States on the Canadian border are probably good seconds.) Mr. Haynes was optimistic on the whole, but he frankly said that he did not believe that the friends of enforcement had an adequate conception of the amazing onslaught which is now in progress and is under contemplation by the enemy. There was, in many sections, a tremendous public sentiment against prohibition, and that was as much an obstacle as the continued violation of the law. He called upon the churches to reverse this sentiment. It was the churches which secured the law; it could not be enforced without their aid. In many places the local public officials were with them and here enforcement was easy. In other places they were against them, and here it was almost impossible. But it was imperative that more and more local officials be depended upon to care for minor violations, as was contemplated under the concurrent power action of the amendment, and then the Federal forces will be more free with the larger conspiracy violations and border problems and to assail the illegal traffic at the source. The chief argument used by the opponents of prohibition is that it cannot be enforced, and they are publishing that abroad, both in America and Europe. The great thing was to nullify this argument and the churches must create the public sentiment necessary.

To say that Governor Pinchot created a sensation is a mild way of putting it. Fresh from courageous dealing with the liquor situation in Pennsylvania and the coal strike, he came as a sort of hero. He was most viciferously welcomed, but when he went on and on with one ringing declaration after another the audience simply had to leap to its feet and shout. The address was about the plainest speaking that has been heard in Washington for a generation. The Governor declared at the beginning that it was all foolishness to say that a great nation like the United States could not enforce a fundamental law if it wanted to. The reason the prohibition law was not enforced was politics. He proved this by his own State and did not hesitate to use names and give concrete example. The greatest trouble was Washington itself. High officials were taking graft and the officials of the nation flouted the law, laughed at it and broke it. Another reason why the law was not being enforced was that there was no centralization of authority and certain great interests did not want it. This centralization should begin at once and it should be in the hands of the President of the United States:

"These brewers, bootleggers and saloonkeepers have made a larger issue than that between wets and dries. They have thrown down the gauntlet to all law under the Government of the United States. They defy our Constitution and our laws as did their ancestors, the outlaws of the Whisky Rebellion of Washington's time. Washington, in that emergency, took personal charge of seeing that the law was respected as supreme and was prepared to use all the powers of the government, if necessary, to make it so. His example is a sound one to follow in the whisky rebellion of to-day.

"There is another reason why the President should take personal charge. Not only has the political hamstringing of the Federal enforcement service had its seat in Washington, but it is notorious that disobedience to the Eighteenth Amendment has been flagrant in the Capitol City. Stories are innumerable of the active practice and encouragement of law-breaking by officials high in the Government of the United States. We cannot expect other communities to respect and obey the law if the capital of the nation itself is a leader among law-breakers. Washington has set the bad example, and it is for Washington to repair the damage."

The Conference adopted as its final recommendations a statement to the nation calling attention to the perils facing it and calling upon both government and people to gird themselves at once to the strict enforcement of the law. The message appears in full upon page 495 of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, but here is a paragraph for every citizen of this country to ponder:

"We challenge those who are opposed to the Eighteenth Amendment to come out into the open and have the courage to repeal the amendment if they can, and the manhood to observe it until they can. Hip-pocket guardians of liberty and defenders of the Constitution are teaching the doctrine of qualified allegiance. The man who upholds the Constitution must uphold the whole of it.

"The time has arrived when the American people should see to it that only those men are elected to public office who, in the words of Lincoln, will neither violate in the slightest particular the laws of the land nor tolerate their violation by others. The State or Federal official who does not respect the sanctity of his oath to support the Federal Constitution should resign his office and give place to one who will neither violate his oath nor betray the confidence of the people. Too often members of Congress and of State Legislatures are violating the laws that they themselves have made. They should be retired to private life. Lawmakers should not be lawbreakers."

One thing, and that one of the most important, was continually pointed out, and Senator Borah emphasized it especially in his thrilling address—and that was that common disregard of the prohibition law was undermining respect for all law. That is one of the greatest perils now threatening the nation.

Out of more than twelve hundred candidates for admission to Princeton University this fall, 631 were admitted to the class of 1927, only three less than the number entering the class of 1926, the largest class in the history of the university. As to the religious preference the Episcopalians with 223 men outnumber the Presbyterians by thirty. Then other denominations each have a smaller following, while twenty-one men have no preference as to denomination.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Rediscovery of the Human Jesus

By Rev. William Pierson Merrill, D.D.

Minister of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York City

"Wherefore it behooved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren."—Hebrews 2:17.

THE greatest fact in the history of man—the most amazing in its implication, the most wide and powerful in its influence—is the fact of Christ, or what Christians call the Incarnation. That God, who reveals Himself or hides Himself, or shadows Himself, among the "sun, the moon, the stars, the seas, the hills, and the plains," once took the form of man, and then revealed Himself more powerfully and perfectly than in all the rest of the world's life, is an idea that might well have turned the world upside down and set men to dreaming strange dreams.

The early Christians looked at Jesus and said, "This man is our God, and the God of all men." It was in the strength of that faith that they went out to win the world for their Master. Through all the succeeding ages, whenever that central faith in the divinity of the man Christ Jesus has grown dim, the Church has grown cold and weak; whenever there has come a new glow of passionate love and loyalty to the Christ the Church has arisen in new strength. The great leaders of Christian history have been men who lost themselves in Christ: Luther, with his great motto, "We are nothing, Christ alone is all things"; Wesley, who brought a new life into a dead Church by setting the people to thinking and singing about Christ, and following Him rather than their traditional ways—these are but examples of what has occurred again and again. The Church and the world of our own time is waiting for a new flame of love and loyalty toward Jesus Christ, in whom God stands gloriously and clearly revealed.

It was not strange, indeed it was inevitable, that at the first Christian thinkers should give their attention almost exclusively to establishing the claim that this man Jesus is the Son of God. Think what it meant to support such an assertion about a man whom many living had seen and heard and touched. There were many who knew the details of His life and could tell the gracious and beautiful stories of His words and deeds. What was needed was strong and unrelenting insistence on the divine nature and authority of Christ. There was small danger that any would forget that he was a real man.

So it was that, with one accord, the early Christian thinkers set themselves to foster the faith in the divinity of the man Christ Jesus, taking His humanity for granted or leaving it one side as relatively negligible. Take up the letters of Paul, and you search in vain for any information about the details of how Jesus lived and taught. For all you will learn from Paul, Christ might about as well have come into the world and at once have been crucified, and then raised from the dead. The details of the human life were negligible. This does not mean that Paul was indifferent to the facts of the life of Jesus. We have only a few of his letters in which he deals with specific problems; doubtless in the churches to which he wrote there was much said and taught about the life of the Master; he assumed that, and wrote about the matters that might be neglected, emphasizing the great doctrines in which the relation of Christ to God were set forth.

But more and more the Church slighted the facts of the human life of Jesus and concentrated its thought on metaphysical speculations about His relation to God and doctrinal assertions about His mystical and theological significance. We owe much to the little group of Christians in Jerusalem and to the Spirit of God that guided them to preserve the precious stories of the life of the Lord, from His infancy to His death. The important work at the time was that which Paul so brilliantly led, of making clear the divinity of Jesus Christ, His place in the plan of God for the world, and in the thoughts of men about God. But no less vital for the long ages, some of us would say even more vital, than the work of theological construction and interpretation of which Paul is the most conspicuous exponent, is this loving labor of preserving for all time the scanty, simple, but marvelously satisfying records of the life that Jesus lived.

Into the stream of early Christian theology flowed many currents of speculation and thought, from Greek philosophers, Oriental mysticism and other sources. It was a time when the thoughts of men roamed free and wild over the plains of religious thought, and many elements combined to make up the teaching and faith of the church, some enriching it, others impoverishing it. But all along there went a steady tendency to carry to an extreme the attitude of Paul, to leave aside as of lesser value the human life of Jesus, and to concentrate thought and faith on the theological and metaphysical aspects of His relation to God, until too largely Christ became a far-off, mystical, or even magical figure, as remote from common and homely things as the God He came to bring near to men. There grew to be more and more a sense that the supremely important concern was to insist that Jesus was divine, to clothe Him in all the attributes of Deity, to minimize His human characteristics, and to prize all that in Him which could, by any possibility, be used to set Him apart from the rest of men.

Had the Church kept the thought of Jesus simple, warm, human, near at hand, instead of relegating Him so largely to a world of cold, metaphysical speculation, it is very likely that such vast numbers of Christians would not have taken up the worship of the Virgin and the Saints in their quest for some unseen help near at hand.

There came a release of the human mind at the Reformation period. As the modern era began to take shape, as critical and historical research advanced, and as men began to place more emphasis on the life we live now, and less on the heavenly life, it was inevitable that scholars should turn their attention to the central figure of the history of our area. Men began to think new and fresh thoughts about Christ, to ask questions about Him, to examine with new care the doc-ments in which our knowledge of Him is preserved. Much of the process of modern investigation and theorizing about Christ has been extreme, or wild, or with a very definite bias. Men have assorted and twisted the facts, making new and ingenious combinations of them, inventing fascinating theories, impelled by a frank or subtle desire to eliminate everything from the Christ-faith which has a supernatural flavor, and to reduce Him to a figure in history of no greater importance than many another. Patient ingenuity has gone into the effort to take all reality from the life of Jesus, to make Him a myth. For many years criticism has been vigorously at work on the faith of the Church about Jesus Christ. The Church has been greatly alarmed, nor can we wonder. It has rightly come to the defense of its precious faith in the divinity of our Lord, rightly so far as it has used the methods of reason and scholarship rather than the compulsion of authority or the threat of discipline. It is not strange that to many church leaders the modern critical investigation of the Gospels and its results should seem very dangerous and alarming. We have so long been accustomed to thinking of Christ as something different from man that it is hard to think of the increased emphasis on His humanity as anything but a serious loss.

We have as the result of the critical and historical study of the fact of Christ what really amounts to a rediscovery of the human Jesus. The difference is reflected in the conceptions of artists. Once the canvases depicting scenes from the life of Christ showed us a portentous figure, obviously different from all about Him, with a halo on His head, doing unnatural deeds and taking unnatural attitudes. Artists who have caught the modern point of view show us Jesus as a man among men, with no halo save that of His perfection of character, and clearly giving to those about Him not the slightest suggestion of unreality.

We have learned to think thus of Jesus as a human personality, a definite figure in history, who lived His own life as every son of man must, who moved through the scenes of His ministry in Judea and Galilee, not as an actor dressed for a part, but with simple wholeness.

Is this a loss? Doubtless there has been some loss involved in this change of thought and emphasis. To some it has meant a weakening of their sense of the importance and authority of Jesus. As we have said, not a little of the modern study of Christ has had as its motive a desire to weaken the sense of the uniqueness of our Lord and to disprove His divinity. There is still much that needs to be done by way of correcting over-emphasis on the commonplace and over-disparagement of the unusual elements in the life of Christ. Renan was right in saying that the task of the twentieth century would be to take out of the waste-basket a number of excellent ideas thrown there by the nineteenth century. So far as the progress of modern thought and investigation has tended to weaken men's faith in the divinity of our Lord it is an unfortunate and deplorable influence.

But never was a greater mistake made than when it is assumed that the rediscovery of the human Jesus, the new emphasis on His real humanity, tends to weaken faith in Him as the perfect revelation of God. Exactly the reverse is true; and we see but a little way into Christian thought and faith if we do not see that the more absolutely and fully and really human we find Jesus to have been, the deeper and higher and more wonderful becomes the revelation of God in Him, and His divine value to our souls and to the life of the world.

The truth is that, from the beginning Christian faith has stood for the revelation of God in a human life; if either of those elements be lacking, the faith is enfeebled. Think of Him as just a man, without any other relation to God than other men have, and you lose something vital out of your Christian faith. But it is just as sure that you lose a vital element in Christian faith if you think of Him as not really and fully a man. Christian faith has always been that Jesus was and is "very God and very man," and His value for us lies as much in His being man as in His being God.

It is all to the good, a mighty asset for faith and life, that we have so far recovered our sense of the importance and meaning of the human life of our Lord. The Apostles' Creed gives the larger part of its bulk to Jesus Christ. But it leaps right from His birth to His death without an allusion to the life He lived, or the words He spoke, or the ideals He left for His followers and the world. The Westminster Confession of Faith has a chapter on our Lord Jesus Christ which is almost wholly taken up with His pre-existent relations with the Father and His further relations after His resurrection, scant allusions being made to His life on earth. It is gain, not loss, that modern faith insists on the deep meaning and high value of what the creeds have omitted, the years that Jesus spent in Palestine, His deeds and words, and the whole of that wonderful life. It is not that we are exalting His humanity at the expense of His divinity. We are making His divinity more real and impressive.

Where some serious and conscientious man or woman doubts the divinity of Christ, there is a better course to take than any arguments or theological assertions. If only he can be persuaded to take up the Gospels and read them without preconceptions or bias, frankly discarding for the time all that he finds impossible or very difficult to accept as true record of fact, and simply reading it as the record of a real human life, he will be apt to come to the end of such a contact with the human Jesus nearer than ever before to a full and glad faith in His divinity. Everything that scholars have done to make the life and character of Jesus more fully human is a gain, not a loss, an asset, not a liability.

I see three positive gains in the modern emphasis on the human life of our Lord.

The first is the deepened sense of reality in our thought of Him. There have been times in human history when the borderland between fact and fancy was not clearly marked and men cared little for reality. But our time is characterized by an extreme passion for fact. And Jesus Christ takes hold of our souls with far greater power the more we see Him as a real man, living a real life, with an atmosphere about Him not of a fancy book, but of true history. Even if some must give up certain elements in the Gospel story, if they must withhold hearty assent to the literal truth of certain miraculous elements, or feel compelled to drop out from their conception of Christ and His life some ideas which the theology of the past has counted important, still there may be far more gain than loss, if they have come to a deeper sense of reality about Jesus, a conviction that He really lived and worked and spoke, a man and a part of the history of men.

The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews—a book which comes nearer than any other part of the New Testament to the point of view of to-day—saw the great value of this sense of the reality of the experiences of Jesus. "He was tempted in all points like as we are." "In all things it behooved Him to be made like unto His brethren." He saw and felt and declared that because Jesus was thus really and fully a man, not merely putting on humanity as a mask or a robe, He can be of the greater value to our lives in their struggles, can be the sort of leader, helper, friend, guide, we need in our daily life. If we have come to accept the mod-

The Enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment

By Governor Gifford Pinchot

[The following is the address given by Governor Pinchot at the Great Citizenship Conference held at Washington earlier this month. The address made a very great stir throughout the country. The background of the address and the circumstances of its delivery may be gleaned from the Observer's Letter printed on an earlier page in this issue.]

TWO facts stand out in the confused and troubled enforcement situation of to-day. One is the steadily increasing determination of decent people to have the law enforced. The other is the steadily increasing violation of the law by the criminal elements. The former was to be expected. The reason for the latter is not far too seek.

The Eighteenth Amendment has been betrayed in the house of its friends. Measured by the respect accorded to it, it has failed, and the reason is that no sincere, intelligent, and concerted nation-wide effort has ever been made to enforce it.

We all know the proof of that. It is found in the ease with which great quantities of liquor are being smuggled into this country; in the huge amounts of bogus whiskey manufactured from denatured alcohol; and in the continuing sale of high-power beer from the breweries in truck load and carload lots.

It is idle to suggest that the law cannot be enforced. That the Government of the United States, the most powerful nation on earth, with the people overwhelmingly behind it, is powerless before a few thousand, or a few hundred thousand of assorted law breakers is simply unthinkable. The fact is we have never really tried. The essential reason why bootlegging and defiance of law by the liquor people is increasing is because this particular nettle has never been grasped with a strong hand.

The thing that has protected the liquor criminal from the law is politics. Politics first, law enforcement a poor second has been the order. Bad whiskey, with beer to help, has supplied the sinews of war for bad politics, and politics has returned the favor.

Take Pennsylvania, for example. I assume that the story of Federal law enforcement in Pennsylvania is not essentially different from the same story in other States. Until the present State Administration came into power, the Commonwealth itself did little or nothing. Under the Federal Government our first and second Prohibition Directors in Pennsylvania were Democrats selected for political reasons.

To spread the mantle of charity over them, it may be said that they went out of office without having advanced the cause they were supposed to champion. The third director was the notorious McConnell, a politician known to be opposed to the Eighteenth Amendment when he was appointed. McConnell's appointment, which was a scandal in itself, was promptly followed by the release on alleged fraudulent permits of many hundreds of thousands of gallons of whiskey, and a little later by his own indictment and that of a number of his assistants for such release.

McConnell's performance was precisely what must have been looked for by anyone who knew him. It is difficult not to believe that what he did was expected and intended by the power to which his appointment was due. After McConnell, the next director made a record which offers no chance for praise. The next was of a wholly different character, but was removed when his work had scarcely begun.

The present director, Major William G. Murdock, is the first in the history of enforcement in Pennsylvania to whom the State may look for real results. Major Murdock and Mr. Sams, one of his colleagues in the enforcement work in Eastern Pennsylvania (I do not know the enforcement officer in Western Pennsylvania, of whom I hear excellent reports), have given a convincing evidence of their desire to use every power at their command in compelling respect for the Constitution and laws of the United States. Unfortunately, they are handicapped because the most elementary principles of good business management have been disregarded in the organization of the Government enforcement work. I refer, for example, to the unwise division of authority, to the fact that both of them are compelled to do their work through agents of whose history and connections they have no knowledge and in whose selection they have no voice, and under rules and regulations framed at Washington, which often fail wholly to meet local conditions.

Under this system, born and bred in politics, it is commonly believed, and I share that belief, that certain agents of the Federal Department not only wink at the violation of the law, but have served or are serving as collectors of the six or seven dollars a barrel graft money paid by brewers for immunity. This belief receives strong confirmation when a brewery is caught bribing state policemen (who were promptly both discharged from the force and prosecuted). Even stronger confirmation is found in the fact that high-power beer is manufactured and sold throughout the State by the illegal operation of breweries holding Federal licenses. Bartenders openly boast to saloon patrons of the real beer they sell, its good quality and high alcoholic content.

Lest what I have just said should be misunderstood, let me add that the State Police of Pennsylvania are doing an admirable piece of work. They have made the only effective fight for law enforcement ever made in the State. With less than 300 men they are required to cover nearly a thousand boroughs and cities, in addition to Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, countless villages and the open country, and to keep down not only violation of the liquor laws, but of all other laws at the same time. My hat is off to the State police.

The Federal Enforcement Service in Pennsylvania lost its soul through politics, and will never be worth its salt until it is taken wholly out of politics. That is the first step in my State, and I infer, in the others also. The second in my statement is to make the head of it, until the present situation is cleaned up, responsible directly to the President of the United States. Under the existing organization the line of authority leads from the President to the Secretary of the Treasury, from him to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and from the Commissioner to various subordinates. What is needed is an organization in which responsibility is definitely centered; one in which the buck cannot be passed; and over which the Chief Executive of the Nation can exercise immediate direction and control.

Such an arrangement should be only temporary. The President is heavily burdened already, and nothing should be added to his load without serious reason. But the fact is that the attack upon the Constitution and laws of our country now being directed against the Eighteenth Amendment and its supporting laws is one of the most serious in our history. Disregard for all law is more effectively spread by the failure of the Enforcement Service than in any other way. The bootleggers, the lawless saloonmen and the brewers are the head and front of the army of criminals in America. All these facts taken together furnish abundant reason for treating this matter as of sufficient importance to enlist the active direction of the President himself. He is the only man who can bring together in harmonious effective action all the necessary Government forces. He alone, in my opinion, can meet the present emergency.

These brewers, bootleggers and saloon keepers have made a larger issue than that between wets and dries. They have thrown down the gauntlet to all law under the Government of the United States. They defy our Constitution and our laws as did their ancestors, the outlaws of the Whiskey Rebellion of Washington's time. Washington in that emergency took personal charge of seeing that the law was respected as supreme and was prepared to use all the powers of the Government, if necessary, to make it so. His example is a sound one to follow in the whiskey rebellion of to-day.

There is another reason why the President should take personal charge. Not only has the political hamstringing of the Federal Enforcement Service had its seat in Washington, but it is notorious that disobedience to the Eighteenth Amendment has been flagrant in the Capital City. Stories are innumerable of the active practise and encouragement of law-breaking by officials high in the Government of the United States. We cannot expect other communities to respect and obey the law if the Capital of the Nation itself is a leader among the law-breakers. Washington has set the bad example, and it is for Washington to repair the damage.

I am not one to disavow the responsibility of each State for enforcing the law. Pennsylvania need not shrink from comparison with any other State in this respect. But I recognize, as every man must who has studied the situation, that the leading part in successful enforcement must be played by the Nation. The Eighteenth Amendment was initiated in Washington. The Volstead Law was passed by the National Congress. The leadership in this matter belongs of right to the National Government, and can only be exercised by it. It has, and it alone can employ, powers granted to none of the States—powers without whose use the law cannot be successfully enforced.

The principal violations of the liquor laws come through bootleggers who obtain liquors or alcohol in large quantities. They can secure such quantities only through permission of the Federal authorities. No liquor can lawfully be manufactured except by Federal permission. No alcohol can be produced without a Federal permit. All whiskey and alcohol in storage is solely in control of the United States. None can be released from bond, sold, transported or used in manufacture except by Federal permission. No brewery can operate without a permit from the United States. With the power to issue and the right to act under these permits no State can interfere. The liquor problem is first of all a National matter, and as such cannot be met and solved unless the Federal Government does its full part.

Do not misunderstand me. I recognize to the full the responsibility of each State and of every municipality for doing its full share to defeat and drive out the law-breakers. But I believe that a clear understanding and practical application of the relative powers and functions of State and Nation is an indispensable condition of success. Without doubt this whole matter will come up for full discussion at the coming conference of the Governors with the President of the United States.

It is foolish to expect the State and municipal police powers to cope with floods of illegal liquor let loose by the failure of Federal agents to dam the flood at its source. Federal permission is required to export the whiskey which is smuggled back into the country for sale. It is breweries operating under Federal permits that are flooding the country with high-power beer. The whole system of permits, as well as the regulations governing business under them, should be revised and brought down to date in the light of the last three years' experience.

The Nation's part in enforcement is not that of the local policeman. Home-brew and the blind tiger need concern it little. The State can and should look after such as these. But the Federal Government alone is in position to stop important violations at the source and effectively check the big violators who make the real trouble.

Pennsylvania is doing its level best with the means it has. What we have done is simple. We have merely used the powers we had in an honest and, I believe, an intelligent effort to enforce the law. We have not been content merely to go through the motions, nor have we been willing to stick to methods long since proved ineffective. We have undertaken not merely to give the appearance of an effort to close the saloons, but actually to close them, and for that purpose to use or devise the most effective means possible under the law as it stands. Results are what we want, and it is results we have set out to get—if not by one method, then by another.

The Legislature refused me a law to regulate breweries and another to regulate stills. But we propose to use what we have. The essential fact is that every power available to the Government of Pennsylvania will be used to put an end, so far as Pennsylvania is concerned, to the black disgrace which has overtaken the people of this nation in the present eruption of law-breaking, which I say advisedly could have been checked at the beginning, but which has, without good reason, been allowed to besmirch the good name of the United States.

Perhaps the strongest encouragement to law-breaking is the knowledge of the law-breaker that the authorities are half-hearted about enforcement. You will, I think, find no such belief about my Administration among the men who are breaking the liquor laws in Pennsylvania. Of one thing you may be sure—this is a fight to a finish. There will be no compromise with law-breakers in the State where our Constitution was born. The bootleggers will be beaten and law and order will win. Have no fear about that.

For years enforcement failed in Pennsylvania, first, because the liquor interests stood in the way, and, secondly, because the enemies of enforcement were using their heads while its friends were not. The latter is no longer true. I wish to pay my hearty tribute of gratitude and respect to the Federal Department of Justice for its efforts for law enforcement made in Pennsylvania, and for the admirable and untiring co-operation which the State Administration has received from that Federal Department.

For the first time in the history of law enforcement notices to close have been served on law-breaking saloons under the joint authority of the United States of America and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. In some Pennsylvania counties as many as ninety per cent. of the saloons so served have closed; in others few or none. When the Federal Courts, to whose attention the matter is being brought, and which have throughout our country's history proved the bulwark of the Constitution, have finally acted and made their power felt, the elimination of the saloon from Pennsylvania will have arrived. And what can be done in Pennsylvania can be done in any other State also.

For years the liquor power and the Republican Party were side partners in Pennsylvania. For years the liquor power and the Democratic party were side partners in New York. For years liquor has paid the bills for the dominant party in State after State throughout the Nation. Their connection is too recent to be forgotten. In county after county in Pennsylvania illegal liquor still keeps the gang alive. That is one more reason why we must insist on the complete separation of politics from the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

The issue is clear before us, and the outcome is assured. No band of criminals has or ever will defeat our Government and our people. We are going to win and win completely because they are wrong and we are right. They that fight with us are many times more than they that fight with our enemies.

The Message of the Citizenship Conference to the American People

[The following message was sent out to the American public by the great Citizenship Conference held at Washington this month under the auspices of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ. The Observer's letter describes the Conference in detail.]

THE Citizenship Conference, including one thousand men and women from all parts of the country, representing the churches, a great variety of social welfare organizations and our law-abiding citizens generally, signalizes a new movement to secure for the Eighteenth Amendment such standards of enforcement as alone are worthy of the American nation.

We must enter upon a broad new stage of progress in this great national undertaking. In every part of the country marked gains have been made in eliminating the evils of alcoholism. The saloon has been well-nigh destroyed, and with it the vast corrupting power of the liquor interests in politics. The practicability of the enforcement of prohibition already has been substantially proved. There are disturbing problems to be met in certain sections of the country, but such experience has been familiar in all the smaller units—towns, county and state—in which the liquor trade has been successively overcome.

The settled determination that the Eighteenth Amendment and existing supplementary legislation shall be carried fully into effect is held to-day by a larger majority of the voters of the nation. The fact that twenty-five million women have been added to the electorate since these enactments came in force removes all doubt on this vital point. The Nineteenth Amendment has come to the support of the Eighteenth.

The Conference asks the people of the country to concentrate their influence particularly upon two groups who together make up the principal body of offenders against the Eighteenth Amendment. Not a few leaders in society, and young people who follow their example, are presenting the most baneful example of contempt for the process by which law is made and executed that the history of the United States has ever recorded; against it stern community sentiment, along with the full power of the law, must everywhere be invoked. A certain element among aliens of different nationalities who defy our laws must be led to better counsels or be brought to face increasingly drastic penalties.

The state of mind and fact thus exhibited is a direct challenge to all loyal and law-abiding citizens to choose between anarchy and ordered government, between the selfish interest of a minority and the moral intelligence of the people of the United States expressed and embodied in their fundamental law.

We call on all our fellow citizens to renew their vows of obedience to the highest law of the land, and to pledge their support in private practice and public influence to those responsible for its enforcement.

Let us remobilize and solidify the moral sentiment and power of the nation into practical action, both political and educational, behind the government, realizing that the faith, zeal and skill which enacted the law are needed to enforce it.

The deliberations of this Conference will have a permanent place in the history of the struggle for national prohibition in this country. We have fired the opening gun in the second battle of the Marne. Its echoes will reverberate in every hamlet of our country and in the far reaches of our island possessions. Leaders of thought in many fields of endeavor have contributed to the rich store of fact and inspiration from which the conference sends this message to the American people.

1. We challenge those who are opposed to the Eighteenth Amendment to come out into the open and have the courage to repeal the amendment if they can and the manhood to observe it until they can. Hip-pocket guardians of liberty and defenders of the Constitution are teaching the doctrine of qualified allegiance. The man who upholds the Constitution must uphold the whole of it.

2. The Volstead Act must never be amended by its enemies. That way lies nullification. If it is ever to be amended the amending must be done by its friends, not its foes. It must be amended, not to prevent enforcement, but to perfect enforcement after a reasonable trial has demonstrated the way.

3. The time has arrived when the American people should see to it that only those men are elected to public office who, in the words of Lincoln, will neither violate in the slightest particular the laws of the land, nor tolerate their violation by others. The State or Federal official who does not respect the sanctity of his oath to support the Federal Constitution should resign his office and give place to one who will neither violate his oath nor betray the confidence of the people. Too often members of Congress and of State legislatures are violating the laws that they themselves have made. They should be retired to private life. Lawmakers should not be lawbreakers.

4. We emphasize the grave responsibility which rests upon the courts to compel obedience on the part of those who by open violation are bringing the administration of justice into disrepute. There is increasing evidence that after three years the judges are beginning to realize that the imposition of fines, which amount to nothing more than a small license tax on the vast profit of the illegal liquor traffic, is ineffectual to stop the criminal. We commend these judges who are promoting efficient enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment by imposing jail sentences, and who, in injunction proceedings, are depriving offenders of the use of their property for saloons and other unlawful purposes.

Official tests show that over ninety per cent. of the liquor seized in all sections of the country contains poison in greater or less degree, and this imminent menace to life and health must be given increasing consideration by the courts and juries in cases against illicit makers and sellers.

We urge upon the Federal and State judges the need of more stringent action on the part of the courts to prevent the law's delays, and of extreme penalties for persistent offenders to compel the lawbreaker to cease his lawlessness and arouse in the cynical and indifferent a new respect for law.

5. When the press of the country carried a report, although incorrect, that an incoming ocean liner had been blocked by the rum fleet in entering New York harbor, it shocked the moral sense and wounded the pride of the American people. They are impatient at the disgrace which attends the successful operations of the rum runners. They will not believe that the most powerful nation in the world is impotent to prevent the landing of contraband liquor on American soil.

In this juncture we look with confidence to the President of the United States and the Governors. We ask the President to place every available craft and every available agency which may lawfully be used for the purpose to police our shores. We assure him of our support in using every power at his command to compel respect for constituted authority. An expectant nation looks to him to assert and maintain the majesty of the law.

6. The Eighteenth Amendment places equal responsibility for law enforcement on state and nation. The states, with many times the number of officers that the Federal Government has at its command, should face the responsibility of doing their share in this vital law enforcement work. With only 1,522 federal agents and over 250,000 state and local agents it is manifest that the citizens of the states must hold to greater responsibility their own officers.

7. Realizing the powerful influence of the press, and its vast opportunity through its editors, artists and reporters to mould public opinion, we earnestly ask that it will not permit its news columns, its editorial pages, or its cartoons and illustrations to be used to promote disrespect for law or to hold up to ridicule and contempt our Constitution and our laws.

8. A democracy has been truly defined as "government by public opinion." On the people rests the ultimate responsibility for law enforcement. Public officials can go only so far as we will go with them.

Our final appeal is to the people of this country. Our homes, our schools, and our universities must instil a respect for law into the hearts and minds of the youth of to-day who are to be the citizens of to-morrow. Our churches must preach the gospel of loyalty. Every liberty-loving, law-abiding citizen must stand up and be counted. When the supremacy of law is challenged, silence is acquiescence. Propaganda must be answered by truth. Complacency must give place to a militant spirit which shall awaken the conscience of the country.

"This is my covenant, saith the Lord, that I will put my law in the hearts of the people and write it in their minds."

Inspired by this promise, we press on to achieve the realization of the aspiration of Lincoln that "reverence for law may become the political religion of the nation."

Samuel Crowther, in a recent interview which he had with the ex-Sultan of Turkey, who is still regarded as the Caliph of a large part of the Mohammedan world, and which he reports in "Colliers," without mincing matters, asked the ex-Sultan, "Have you heard about Islam desiring to conquer the world?" The Caliph's answer was categorical. "I have not heard about it, and if it were true I should have heard about it." However, Abdul Medjid's answer does not mean that there are not some Moslems who nourish the Pan-Islamic dream. But no doubt even the most rabid Pan-Islamites do not expect to conquer the world. They do, we may be sure, hope to unite the Moslem peoples to stand as a firm wall against western domination. To turn back to the ex-Sultan, however, Mr. Crowther's report of the rest of the Caliph's answer to his question is not without interest. "There is too much conquering in the world to-day," said the ex-Sultan. "Islam is not imperialistic. Once it was. Once all religions were. But to-day we only want to promote happiness. Islam is not exclusive; it knows there are other religions and that they have their merits just as Islam has its merits. I cannot see why religions cannot manage to live together in peace, each man taking that religion which seems to him best to promote his happiness." That, at least, is good for consumption in Europe and America.

STUDIES IN MARK'S GOSPEL

By REV. PROFESSOR A. T. ROBERTSON. George H. Doran Company. $1.

It is unnecessary to say anything about any book from the pen of Professor Robertson. Every student of the Bible in America and Great Britain has come to know him. He is a master of New Testament exegesis and this volume contains most illuminating interpretations of the Gospel as have all his previous volumes. The introductory chapters are very interesting, dealing with the making of Mark, the date of Mark's Gospel, Mark's Gospel and the Synoptic Problem and Peter's Influence on Mark's Gospel. One chapter which deals with the Christ of Mark's Gospel is very helpful as the author here contrasted the feeling of Mark for Christ with that in the other Gospels.

The Dripping Wheels of Tragedy*

By William Willard Howard

THE ghastly tragedy of the Russian refugees—the members of the nobility and intelligensia of monarchist Russia who fled from their ancestral lands and homes to escape death at the hands of revolutionists—goes forward along the fair highway of civilization with the 'implacable certainty of inevitable doom, its juggernaut wheels dripping with the red anguish of broken hearts and the black despair of hunger and suffering and slow death. The naked horror of it grows upon me with the passing days.

I went to the borders of Bolshevik Russia early in December, 1922, seeking cargoes for my ships. I found, instead, the deathbed of the brains, the education, the culture, the creative ability and the administrative experience of a nation of a hundred and fifty million inhabitants. I found men, women and children of my own walk in life existing in a condition of indescribable poverty and destitution in cellars, in attics and in other obscure places into which they had crawled for shelter from the snows and sub-Arctic cold of the Russian winter. I found them dying, one by one, of grief and privation, without murmur or complaint—the men and women who had given their all to the Allied cause and asked nothing in return.

Anne Louise Howard, who accompanied me to the borders of Russia for the purpose of seeing Bolsheviks at close range, was so profoundly affected by the shocking state of the Russian gentlewomen that she volunteered to remain in that far outpost of Eastern Europe and put into operation a relief work if I would assist with the details of organization and turn over to her the few thousand dollars that I had brought with me to make payments on cargo commitments.

We bought cloth and embroidery colors and thread and other sewing materials and gave them to destitute Russian gentlewomen, asking them to make for us hand-embroidered, hand-sewn Russian blouses such as they had made for their own wear or as gifts to friends in their own homes of opulence and ease in the days before chaos descended upon them and drove them forth to starve and die as refugees in alien lands. The plan was to sell the blouses in the United States and to send back the proceeds of sale to be used over again in the same way.

When I returned to New York in March, 1923, Anne Louise Howard was giving employment to two hundred destitute Russian gentlewomen, some of whom had been so weak from hunger that they had fallen in the street while on their way to ask for work. Throngs of equally needy women begged for a share in the work, but with our limited funds we could not help them.

After this relief work had been in operation eight months I returned to that far corner of Eastern Europe to carry to the lonely relief worker a word of cheer, to hand over a few more thousands for the working fund, and by personal inquiry and observation to form an estimate of practical results and benefits.

I reached that far-away place one evening late in August, 1923. On the following morning, after Anne Louise Howard's frugal breakfast of black bread and cocoa, I said:

"Let us go out and call on some of my Russian refugee friends of last winter. Let us begin by going down to the corner and buying a newspaper of General Simonieff."

During the frigid weather of the preceding February I had written a description of General Simonieff as he sat huddled in a faded gray army overcoat selling newspapers on a street corner—the man who had commanded the Tsar's army at Minsk, Tambov and Mitau.

Anne Louise Howard looked up in a slightly puzzled way.

"I thought that you knew," she said. "General Simonieff is dead—of heart disease."

"The last roll call," I said. "Well, let us go see his widow."

"She is not his widow. She is only a faithful old servant, who had lived in the General's family since birth. She and her invalid nephew worked and slaved to keep the General alive—a touching case of fidelity and kindly service."

"Well, then, let us call on Governor Alexis Blokhin and his wife."

I had written this about Governor Blokhin: "I have been received with gentle courtesy in a bare, cheerless, narrow room by a man and woman of the nobility of old Russia—the man a gentleman-in-waiting at the court of the Tsar, a governor of two provinces, the hereditary overlord of four villages and seven thousand fertile acres, the grand marshal of the nobility of his home district, an open-handed millionaire, a kindly and beloved master to his tenants—and now, penniless and hopeless, existing miserably, without sufficient food, in a room the rent of which is a gift of charity from other refugees."

Anne Louise Howard made a slight gesture of dissent.

"You will not see Governor Blokhin," she said. "He is dead—of heart disease."

"What a pity! And the Governor only fifty-six years old. Well, let us call on Madame Ivanovna. She was ill when I left here in March."

"She is dead—of heart disease."

"Captain Viglin?"

"He is dead—of grief, another form of heart disease."

"All dead of broken hearts!" I said. "And the artist who had not eaten food for four days?—the actor from the court theater at Petrograd who had been foodless for three days?—the naval officer who begged for work that he might give food to his wife and child, who had not eaten for two days?"

Anne Louise Howard shook her head slowly.

"But, surely," I protested, "some of my friends are alive?"

"The Baroness Berends-Situna is in the country ill—of heart disease. I hear that she is somewhat better. Vera Trenukhin, for whose relief a gentleman in Philadelphia sent a special fund, has been enabled to go to the country, where she is ill—of heart disease. The orphans who were turned out of their orphanage because the building was wanted for use as a Jewish school, have been gathered together and placed in a temporary shelter in the country. They have their one bowl of soup a day—thanks to kind friends in America. Something will have to be done about them before cold weather comes.”

EDITOR'S NOTE.—Mr. Howard has returned home to New York, bringing with him a further supply of hand-embroidered Russian Princess Blouses and, as an experiment, a supply of hand-embroidered one-piece gowns—some in native Russian linen; the others in Swiss voile. These garments will be sold for the benefit of the working fund. Anne Louise Howard will remain on the borders of Russia for the winter, at least, and probably for another year. In an early issue of "The Christian Work" Mr. Howard will give the results of his inquiry into the benefits of the relief work. Contributions to the working fund, in any amount, may be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care "The Christian Work," 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

“Well,” I said again, “suppose that we call on Madame Yitkova, the chief of one of your work committees.”

I looked down into the street. A poor old horse shambled along dragging a creaking old cart. On the cart was a plain, box-like coffin. Following the cart were a few men and women in frayed garments and patched shoes—the mourners of a pitiful little funeral.

“It is just another refugee funeral,” said Anne Louise Howard. “I rarely go out into the streets that I do not see one—perhaps two or three—of these poor little processions.”

Later I expressed to Madame Yitkova my sense of personal loss at the death of so many of my friends among the refugees.

“Yes,” said Madame Yitkova, “it doubtless is sad to you to learn of the death of those whom you knew, but so many, many have died whom you did not know.”

Thus the full force of the piteous tragedy came upon me. I had known certain refugees personally as friends during the preceding winter. A few months afterward they were dead of broken hearts. The significance of the tragic situation was this: If so many of the refugees whom I had known had died within a few months, to what horrifying totals must the deaths mount up among the entire body of refugees in Eastern Europe, Central Europe and the Balkan states? In such manner do the slow-moving wheels of Juggernaut bring nearer, day by day, the extinction of the brains, education and culture of a nation!

At the appointed time for my return home to New York I stood with Anne Louise Howard upon the railway platform waiting for the train that was to carry me to the distant seaport. As we looked out over the dim and shadowy roofs of the sleeping city our talk was not of the sea of aching misery around us; not of the sufferings of women and children; not of the deaths of refugees whom we had known; not even of the colossal problem of adequate relief. Our talk was of the peace, serenity and prosperity of that dear land across four thousand miles of tossing seas; of Anne Louise Howard’s beautiful home on the shore of Long Island Sound; of the silent, tenantless house; of the gray squirrels in the walnut trees; of the robins in the flower beds; of the sun on the waters of the harbor at the foot of the lawn; of the passing craft on the bay and sound; of the members of her city club; of her neighbors and friends. Our talk was of home.

So I came away to our God-favored land, leaving on the moonlit platform a brave and lonely figure surrounded by illimitable misery and facing a winter of sub-Arctic cold and swirling snows. As the train of ancient Russian cars gathered motion on its long run to the seacoast I wondered what it was that, for an instant, glistened on her cheeks like twin rivulets of diamonds.

The World Court as an Instrument of World Peace

By George W. Wickersham

Attorney General of the United States Under President Taft

[The churches are planning to observe the week of November 5-11 as World Court Week. The following article by ex-Attorney General Wickersham is therefore very opportune.]

FROM the early days of its existence as a nation the United States of America has advocated and applied the principle of submitting to impartial arbitration controversies with other nations which have failed of adjustment by the ordinary process of diplomatic negotiation.

The Supreme Court of the United States long ago declared that international law was a part of the common law of America. International law is made up of treaties, decisions rendered by international tribunals and principles accepted by civilized nations, expressed in declarations by foreign offices and diplomatic representations and in the writings of juris consults learned in the laws and customs of nations.

Law is useless unless there be courts to interpret and apply it. Casual boards of arbitration, created to determine particular controversies, have been found more or less unsatisfactory. Their decisions are apt to be the result of compromise. As long ago as The Hague Conference of 1897 the United States government advocated the creation of an international court, composed of judges appointed for life or for a long term of years, giving their entire time to the consideration of international controversies. The same consideration was urged upon the second Hague Conference in 1907. The obstacle to its acceptance lay in the fear of the small nations that the selection of judges would be controlled by the great powers and in the mutual distrust of the great powers.

One of the provisions in the Covenant of the League of Nations required the Council of the League to formulate and submit to the members of the League for adoption plans for the establishment of a Permanent Court of International Justice, which court should be competent to hear and determine any dispute of an international character which the parties thereto submit to it, and which also might give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it by the Council or the Assembly.

A body of jurists, including the Hon. Elihu Root, was summoned by the Council, who prepared a statute or plan for the organization of such a court. They found in the organization of the League of Nations two bodies—the Council, in which the big states were predominant, and the Assembly, in which the small states were predominant—and they provided for every nation submitting nominations from which the selection of judges should be made by election by each of these two bodies, proceeding separately, the successful candidates being chosen by an absolute majority in each body.

This machinery met and overcame the objections of both small and large nations. But the United States, which was the originator and for years the advocate of such a court, alone of all the great civilized powers thus far has refused to accept the fruition of its own advocacy.

The Court was not created by and is in no way dependent upon the League of Nations. The charter of its organization was submitted to the respective nations separately and has been now adopted by upwards of forty. The option is given to every nation when it accepts the Court to agree either (1) that it will submit to the Court any controversy which it may at any time be willing to submit to the judgment of an international tribunal, or (2) that it consents in advance to be sued in that court by any other nation party to the agreement upon any matter within the competence of the Court.

The Committee on International Law of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, of which Elihu Root is chairman, on February 28, 1923, reported that, "In the opinion of your committee, this Court in every material respect conforms to the project urged upon the Second Hague Conference in 1907 by the American delegation under the express instructions of the American government and powerfully maintained by Joseph H. Choate as the head of the delegation:

"It is based upon the example of the Supreme Court of the United States and is intended to apply to international controversies the same methods of hearing and decision which that court has applied to controversies between the states of the American Union."

In February last, President Harding transmitted to the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State recommending the adhesion of the United States to the Court on terms which, while avoiding the acceptance of membership in the League of Nations, would give the United States an equal voice with members of the League in the election of judges.

In recommending the approval of this measure by the Senate the President said: "It is not a new problem in international relationship. It is wholly a question of accepting an established institution of high character and making effective all the fine things which have been said by us in favor of such an agency of advanced civilization."

The matter is now pending before the United States Senate. Strange as it may seem, those Senators who opposed the entrance of the United States into the League of Nations oppose adherence to the Court with bitterness almost equal to that exhibited by them towards the League.

The simple question before the country is that put by President Harding—Shall we, or shall we not, make effective all the fine things we have said in favor of such an agency of advanced civilization? Shall we take our stand in favor of applying the rule of law to controversies among nations, or shall we revert to the old rule of the wolf pack, "He has the right who has the might, and let him get who can"?

Nobody pretends that an international court will prevent all wars, but just as the administration of law by courts tends to preserve the internal peace of a nation, so the administration of international law by this new tribunal will tend to prevent war among states by providing a means of peaceful and righteous settlement of disputes between nations which otherwise would furnish abundant causes of friction and ultimate conflict.

An Interpretation of the Labor Movement—VIII.

Rev. F. Ernest Johnson

Director, Research Department, The Federal Council of Churches

VIII. THE CHURCH AND THE LABOR MOVEMENT.

IT IS commonly said that the labor movement is essentially religious. That means, of course, that it is spiritual in its aim. Obviously, there are aspects of the labor movement that could not be characterized by any such terms. Continuous controversy between employers and workers tends to create and perpetuate a state of antagonism in which it is difficult to discover anything spiritual. On the other hand, even where the struggle is keenest, a careful observer might find a measure of aspiration and devotion which could scarcely be described by any other word. In a recent article in a labor magazine the writer thus describes the character of a friend: "I listened to him with respect, for his character had been chiselled out in clear, sharp lines on picket duty and in a thousand bitter fights with the employers." This is strange language to the average person who belongs to the "general public." But a reverence for loyalty and moral courage is revealed in these words as unmistakably as if they were used to describe the comradeship of two soldiers in the Argonne Forest. Pathetic as is the continued warfare in industry, it has its idealistic aspect just as truly as fighting for a flag. Indeed, one is at a loss to find any other comparison that will make clear the attitude of a labor union in a strike than that of a nation at war for ends that it believes worthy and righteous. America in the late war was led into the use of all the weapons of a warfare so horrible that many persons are asking whether war is ever justified as a means of gaining national ends. Yet in the midst of the struggle there was developed a measure of devotion and self-sacrifice which challenged the admiration of the world. Christian men and women are now seeking a way to preserve the spiritual values of patriotism and devotion to national aims and ideals, while at the same time endeavoring to put an end to the recurring brutal struggles between rival nations.

So is it with the warlike aspect of the labor movement. The strike can be done away with as war can be done away with, only by finding other means of giving expression to the elemental desires that drive men to desperate expedients.

Curiously enough, it seems to be the idealism of the labor movement that makes it somewhat hostile to the Church. Labor's tendency to be critical of the Church arises out of the very nature of the labor movement, on the one hand, and of the Church as an institution on the other. All institutions tend to be conservative. The word "institution," derived, as is well known, from the Latin word meaning "to stand"—the same root from which our word "static" comes—is a sufficient explanation of typical institutional policy. The Church has always been controlled by conservative sentiment and only very slowly do progressive ideas and movements within it make headway. The Church reflects the existing economic and industrial situation. It is, generally speaking, controlled by the "substantial" people. It is not true to say that the working people do not go to church, particularly if one has in mind the Catholic and Lutheran churches. Great communions like the Methodist and Baptist churches have large numbers of working-class people in their membership. But it is unfortunately true that many of the most thoughtful, and even the most idealistic and spiritually-minded people in the labor movement, are quite estranged from the Church. It is not merely that the churches do not do anything for them. It would perhaps be more accurate to say that they feel they cannot do anything with the Church. There is a lack of sympathy and understanding between the Church and working-class people as such. The Church's message is often quite consistent with the maintenance of conditions in the world exactly as they are and with the existence of grave cleavages between class and class.

The Church as an institution, and one of the most conservative institutions, finds it hard to modify its attitude in keeping with changes in the social structure. Labor feels that in time of industrial crisis the Church reacts timorously and usually in a way that is consistent with the most substantial property interests rather than with the greatest weight of human interest. Thus the Church tends, so labor believes, to conform to things as they are, while the very purpose of the labor movement is to change things—not necessarily in a radical sense, but nevertheless to change them.

The recent announcement from Russia that the new "Living Church" movement finds it necessary to conform to the existing economic order and therefore to be in harmony with the Soviet government, calls attention strikingly to the dependence of organized religion, the world over, upon its economic environment. Labor feels that the Church has too generally done what the new Russian Church is doing—that is, it has accepted the whole economic scheme of things with all its injustices just as the "Living Church" is now taking the Soviet government to its bosom. This feeling on the part of labor is sometimes aggravated by the adoption of aggressive business tactics on the part of the Church as an employer of labor. Few people realize to how great an extent the churches in their publishing enterprises play the part of employer and have to decide, as industrial corporations do, questions of labor policy. There are churches that do things in dealing with labor which would be called highly autocratic if done by an industrial employer. At a recent meeting of a great religious body a telegram was received from a bookbinders union, asking that influence be used to secure a living wage to workers employed in making Bibles and hymnbooks.

It would seem to be the duty and privilege of the Church, in relation to the labor movement, to discover the spiritual values which it expresses and the social ends which it serves and to magnify those ends and serve those values, while at the same time seeking substitutes for the crude weapons which thus far are the chief resources of a group which is struggling with what it believes to be its enemies. The churches as national bodies, and to some extent as local congregations, have in recent years been making an approach to the rendering of this service. The Federal Council of Churches in the year 1908 created a Commission on the Church and Social Service, whose especial aim was declared to be "to secure a better understanding and a more natural relationship between workingmen and the churches."

The Social Ideals of the Churches, formulated during the last fifteen years, recognize specifically the most fundamental aims of the labor movement as having a spiritual significance. They call for recognition of the "right of employees and employers alike to organize," for protection of the workers from the hazards of industrial labor, for one day of rest in seven, for "a living wage as a minimum in every industry and for the highest wage that each industry can afford." These ideals have latterly been interpreted by the Federal Council of Churches as specifically endorsing collective bargaining and a democratic control of industry.

Even more definite and more extensive have been the pronouncements of the Roman Church regarding the aims of the labor movement. "The Catholic Church," says Father John A. Ryan, "has always regarded organization, whether of employees or of employers, as the normal condition." The great Encyclical of Leo XIII "On the Condition of Labor" says concerning labor organizations: "It is gratifying to know that there are actually in existence not a few societies of this nature, consisting either of workmen alone or of workmen and employers together; but it were greatly to be desired that they should multiply and become more effective." The Catholic Bishops' Program of Social Reconstruction, issued in 1919, said of the right of labor to organize for collective bargaining: "It is to be hoped that this right will never again be called in question by any considerable number of employers."

These declarations have not gone unnoticed by the labor movement. It must be said, however, that they have impressed the workers much less than have certain concrete activities on the part of the churches in the interest of industrial justice. It would be difficult to overestimate the influence on the labor movement generally of the Interchurch Report on the Steel Strike. This undertaking in the name of the churches to find and report the facts of a great industrial struggle in very considerable degree modified the coldness of the labor movement toward the Church. The several attempts that have been made to discredit the Steel Report—attempts that have been characterized by amazing misrepresentations—seem to have made no impression on the mind of labor. The Steel Report stands with them as a monument to the Church's integrity of purpose.

The timely pronouncements of several great church bodies on the "open shop" movement, in its aggressive anti-union aspect, likewise impressed labor organizations. They attach much greater importance to a word spoken with reference to a specific controversy than to any number of generalities. No one can measure the harm done to the cause of religion in the mind of labor by the coupling of pious pronouncements with the justification of unjust practices. The praise of the Bible which accompanied the announcement that the twelve-hour day in the steel industry must continue will not make labor reverence the one more nor hate the other less.

But any church or any pulpit that seeks a friendly understanding with labor must be ready for rebuffs and disillusionments. Again and again a labor organization "reverts to type" in a crisis. That is to say, the long period of dependence upon force—a force which characterizes not only action but fundamental attitude as well—continues to exact its toll, and faced by a crisis, labor falls back upon its traditional weapons and finds no basis of fellowship with the Church. After all, this is but the working-class version of the doctrine that "business is business," which precludes the application of spiritual principles to situations that involve a serious clash of interest. It must also be said that the attitude of labor toward organized religion has yet to be tested under discipline. The Church, awakened in recent years to the requirements of social justice, has spoken frequently in the interest of labor because it has so frequently been labor's rights that have been disregarded. With the increase in power and privilege that labor is securing it may be almost taken for granted that the Church will more frequently feel called upon to speak to labor in admonitory terms. It does not appear that one class in industry is less likely than the other to abuse great power, once it has been gained. It goes without saying that labor's attitude toward religion and the Church must be determined with reference to its behavior under moral discipline as well as under a ministry of vindication and defense.

The Saar Valley

By Henry A. Atkinson

[NOTE: Dr. Atkinson has just returned after spending four months in Europe, where he attended various conferences and was busy in promoting the work of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches and the Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work.]

IMAGINE a drawing room, where the host is being strangled by his neighbor, while a third party stands by, an uninvited and unwanted spectator, only too anxious to help both, yet because of the quarrel unable to help either. Such are the positions and feelings of the German, the Frenchman and the American traveler in the Saar. From the compartment window of the train one fact stands out in contrast to those things which one feels pervade the district but cannot see, that is, that Nature, in spite of the man-made machinations, German or French, be they sabotage or reprisals, continues to paint the countryside with a richness of color, varying from the tree-clad hills to the low-lying strips of apple-laden orchards and ripened corn. Dotted amid the woods stand the red-roofed villages, the houses of each grouped round a Gothic spire, towering high from the streets below—a fact which suggests that there yet may come possible peace from present strife in the region through which our train is passing. The temper of the inhabitants is outwardly passive, but inwardly turbulent. Some are busy tending their rich crops, while the majority are working in the mines getting out coal, for Nature has filled this valley even more abundantly beneath the surface than above, making the Saar one of the most wealthy coal-bearing districts in all Europe. The frequent spoiling of what promises to be an uninterrupted horizon of beauty by a belching chimney brings home the fact that the mines are being fully worked, and that the industrial magnate for his powers will find ever-widening scope and the artist none.

This Saar Valley forms an island, roughly triangular (touching Lorraine on one side and surrounded on the other sides by areas occupied by French troops), under international control in the middle of territory under French control. The river bed runs at right angles to the Rhine for seventy miles from Saargemund to its junction with the Moselle at Konz.

The journey on the main line from Paris to Wiesbaden takes one through Saarbruck, a large railway center and the capital and chief town in the district with a population of over one hundred thousand. Three levels of railway track are visible from the station. The region round Saarbruck reminds an American of Pittsburg, though the hills are not so high and on the whole there is less smoke. The pit-shafts and chimneys loom up in quick succession as the train speeds along the valley. In pre-war days the coal-pits, five-sixths of which are state-owned, produced eleven million tons annually, while to-day with the help of the latest improvements in machinery the natural wealth of the pits might be brought into the world-market more cheaply and rapidly and in a much larger volume.

The method of government for this region also forms, as it were, an island of internationalism amid the sea of national control prevailing in the surrounding countries. For under the terms of the Versailles Treaty the Saar is governed by a commission of five members—a native of the district, a Belgian, a Dane, a Canadian, and the chairman, M. Raoult, of France. The Canadian member has just resigned from the commission. Their control is to last for fifteen years, while the resources of the Saar go to France. At the end of the period a plebiscite of the inhabitants will be taken to decide whether they prefer to remain inside or outside of Germany. Naturally the inhabitants regard the new type of government as no unmixed blessing. There is much agitation against the abuse of power on the part of the French, who are accused, not without reason, of pulling the strings of authority with a view to undermining German loyalty. For instance, French capital is entering the mines and their owners are being crowded out to make way for others more in sympathy with French policy, which, by means of "peaceful penetration," is turning the Saar into an area more French than German. But this transformation is only true, at any rate at present, of the mines, factories and workshops; few are working elsewhere in the district where the population remains predominantly German. Bitter protest was recently made against an order which prohibited, under severe penalty, any criticism of the acts or purposes of the commission and which made it a crime to speak ill of any of its members. This order establishing lese majesty had to be rescinded, however. Some time ago I met a Socialist representative citizen of the Saar at Geneva who gave me an armful of literature such as is being circulated among the Germans to counteract French propaganda, the spreading of which is one of the cheapest processes of "peaceful penetration."

The Council of the League of Nations took up this question at its June meeting and investigated the charges, examining all sides of the question. Finally they summoned the five commissioners to appear before them. Certain recommendations resulted, together with a promise that the international control would be impartially administered. In this connection it is ever for critics of the League to realize the peculiar difficulty of the Saar Commission's task, which is not only to govern, but also to insure the rights of foreign power in the area and regard past and present errors with the sympathy the complexity of the work deserves. The League Council has frankly admitted the mistakes of the Saar Commission and shown the greatest care in investigating the charges brought against it by the Saar inhabitants, realizing that only with a governing commission backed by the consent of the government can the welfare of the people be promoted and the demands of the French satisfied.

To return to this bone of contention itself, as our train passed through the Saar what was most noticeable was the French flag, which flies from the peak of the mine tipples and the factories. It seems that, just as the American flag followed trade to the Philippines, the French flag follows the economic lead (one cannot say trade, as reparations kill the idea of exchange) in the Saar. The flying of the flag, perhaps, strengthens the hands of those who assert that France really desires ownership, not goods. The Saar problem emphasizes a fact now stamped well home in the public mind, that no political control without economic domination can "deliver the goods" and in the long run the economic will rule the political. At bottom, the Saar complications, the Ruhr impasse, the problem of reparations, the payment of Allied debts and the complete resumption of international trade turn on one axis, which is mutual confidence—and must be dealt with as a single whole. Otherwise the experts in each can but watch their favorite pawn move in the same "vicious circle" round the chess board of international hate, just as in spite of conference after conference they have had to do during the last five years. In particular, the French have what the press term a strangle-hold on Germany. Without in any way siding with Germany, but rather seeking a cleaner peace than obviously the Versailles Treaty gave, the traveler must remind the French that nations, like men, are living organisms, so that strangle-holds on either will have similar results. If the strangling grip reaches a certain tautness the victim will become so weak that he will lose consciousness and consequently leave the responsibility for life or death to the victor. The rate of increase of Germany's weakness, due to this hold on her vital industries, became so rapid as to be beyond the control of government or people and she has surrendered, but it now remains to be seen whether or not it is too late and whether the French will prove themselves as a nation to be big enough in every way to be trusted with victory.

THE HAWKEYE, by Herbert Quick. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.00. A review by Dr. Edmund deS. Brunner.

No American author excels Herbert Quick in the ability to interpret social history in the form of fiction. The author's previous book, "Vandemark's Folly," was an epic of the Iowa of the pioneer. In this sequel, "The Hawkeye," Quick carries his interpretation into the early years of the household farming from the Civil War to the centennial year. In these years Monterey County, and especially its county seat, develop from the moneyless isolated stage to that of wealth and satisfied complacency. Interest at twenty-four per cent., scourges of grasshoppers, the mistakes of one-crop farming, the first agrarian revolt, and best of all, the manipulations of county government are illustrated over this period in the terms of the book's very human characters. Just as interesting and accurate are the descriptions of family life on the farm, and his portrayal of the gulf which separates town from country. The book is not quite as good as "Vandemark's Folly." There are times when the story, instead of carrying the interpretation of social history, leaves it altogether behind. But the story itself is good and the book is well worth reading, especially since it is only in the author's previous book that the superior to "The Hawkeye" can be found.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Rural Church Progress in the Valley of Virginia

By Rev. Harry McLaughlin, D.D.

[Much as there is of discouragement in the rural field, it is the conviction of the editor that the country church in America is on the up-grade. Interesting, therefore, is the following narrative, inspiring even in its matter of fact sentences. It has been sent us by the author, the Rev. Dr. Henry McLaughlin, and in longer form has appeared in a denominational paper, "The Field Illustrated," and in "The Staunton (Va.) News Leader."—THE EDITOR.]

FOR over twelve years I have been pastor of a church in the open country. Have identified my life with the life of my people, and have breathed with them the air of the open fields. As I know intimately the conditions in the Valley of Virginia, it is of these I write. I find that within forty miles of Staunton, Virginia, there are seventeen churches in the open country, with a membership ranging from 250 to 640. This is of one denomination. There are churches of like kind in other denominations within the same radius. Each of these seventeen churches has a minister home on a plot of ground ranging from one to fifty acres. Each has a resident pastor for all of his time, a graduate of some reputable college and of a theological seminary requiring three years of resident work. They are red-blooded men who take a deep interest in community welfare and community organizations. All of these churches have been having their normal loss by death, have been constantly sending a stream of life into the city congregations, and have received but few members by certificate. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the seventeen churches have made a net average increase during ten years, from April 1, 1911, to April 1, 1921, of eighty-five members per church. The real growth and development of these churches is not shown by the increase in membership, but their increase in large efficiency in service to the world at large. The amount contributed for benevolences, that is, for causes other than local expenses, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1921, was 531 per cent. more than the amount contributed for the same period of time a decade ago. The lowest increase in benevolences in any one of the seventeen churches was 152 per cent. and the highest 1,375 per cent. The increase in pastor's salary for a period of five years was an average of $723 per church. This does not look much as though the churches in the open country are dying out, at any rate, in the Valley of Virginia. I have selected the Mount Carmel church to bring out some matters of detail, especially to emphasize the character of the ministry in the open country in this section of the world. I might have selected any one of the seventeen and the facts would not have been greatly different. Mount Carmel, located on Lee Highway about midway between Staunton and Lexington, was organized in 1838 with thirty-eight members. One of those who moved his membership from the mother church to become a charter member of the new organization was Cyrus H. McCormick, the inventor of the reaper. The old shop in which the first reaper was made can be seen now as the day he left it.

The growth of Mount Carmel church was gradual, until in 1876 we find it with 173 members. At this time it called a young minister, a farm-raised man, fond of the country, by the name of Rev. A. H. Hamilton. He was in love with country folks and country life, a fine horseman, a man of good common sense and blessed with a sense of humor.

For thirty-eight years, in sleet, in rain, in snow, with no vacation, the Rev. A. H. Hamilton, D.D., wore out his splendid life visiting, preaching and ministering to the people he loved with all the passion of his great heart. He saw the church grow from a membership of 173 to 460. The present membership is 632. He saw the contributions to benevolences grow in the thirty-eight years from $120 to $1,579. The contributions for the year ended March 31, 1921, were $10,718. He saw the Sunday school grow from a membership of fifty to 630. The enrollment of this school last year was 1,016. During the thirty-eight years of Dr. Hamilton's pastorate all evangelistic meetings were conducted by himself or a visiting pastor. No outside evangelist was ever invited. After Dr. Hamilton's retirement the Rev. J. E. Purcell, a man of great ability as an organized and a born leader of men was called. With the splendid foundation laid through the years the church went forward in every department of its work, increasing rapidly in membership and gifts. Among other things accomplished, an exceptionally fine church house was erected. Mr. Purcell was succeeded by the Rev. J. L. Fairly, who combines in an admirable way the good points of the two predecessors. The church is deeply spiritual, with an exceedingly earnest and efficient set of officers.

Each of the churches is in a way a community center, with its cemetery, a Christian Endeavor Society, which has a series of socials during the year for the young people, and most of these churches have from one to five missions in the surrounding territory, at which a Sunday-school is conducted by the members of the central church. One of the secrets of the growth of these churches is that they all have a resident pastor, a man of culture and education, who, together with his family, identifies himself with the life of the community, entering with an understanding and sympathy into the sorrows and joys, the failures and success of his people.

CHRISTIAN CIVILIZATION— IS IT CHRISTIAN?

After Nineteen Hundred Years Has Christianity Seriously Modified the Pagan Character of Human Society?

THIS question was put to a group of the most influential social students in the American Church, all of them leaders and close advisors of the various social service movements in all the denominations and the Federal Council of Churches.

Among them are:

Bishop McConnell, F. Ernest Johnson, Charles A. Ellwood, Alva W. Taylor, Samuel Z. Batten, Harry F. Ward, Ross L. Finney, Albion W. Small, Arthur E. Holt, Herbert H. Shenton, Edward Alsworth Ross.

They divided the problem up into many pieces, each taking one piece to investigate.

Their answer is an amazing revelation!

In a series of articles they declare with surprising unanimity that the industry, the economics, the politics, our nationalist conceptions and practices and the international relations of our so-called Christian civilization are based upon and shot through and through with utterly pagan implications.

Our workaday life and our public life have not yet seriously felt the influence of the mind of Jesus. On the contrary, a society dominated by Christian men is found to be governed by rules which are non-Christian, anti-Christian, flagrantly pagan.

If these pagan rules and principles remain unrevolutionized, says Professor Albion W. Small, "the goodly fellowship of the Apostles could not operate our present industrial system and make its workings just."

These churchmen agree that it is vain to ask men to be Christians in industry or politics and at the same time accept pagan ideals, motives and methods as their rules of action.

No such concerted analysis of the moral character of our social order has ever before been attempted in the light of the mind of Christ. The position of leadership held by the writers—officials in the social service organizations and close counselors of officials—makes their articles an authentic expression of the slowly forming

Social Conscience of the Modern Church

These articles will appear in successive issues of The Christian Century, beginning shortly.

Thoughtful leaders, lay and clerical, inside and outside the churches, will wish to follow this epoch-marking discussion.

ern emphasis on the humanity of Jesus, happy are we; for we have found a friend near at hand.

The second gain is a better knowledge of God. The more real and full becomes our sense of the humanity of Jesus, the more glorious and helpful becomes the meaning of His incarnation. Why, the very object of the incarnation is to reveal God in terms of human life, to declare and emphasize to us that God is more like man than like anything else in the world; and therefore to weaken the full humanness of Jesus is to weaken the revelation of God in Him. What a strange and pathetic performance it has been, this effort of Christian thinkers through all the ages to set Jesus apart from real human life. Men thought of God as far off, mysterious, apart from man's common concerns. Jesus came to make men see how near God is, to set Him before them in terms of homely, daily human living. And at once His followers began to take Jesus and set Him afar off, make Him mysterious, till they were in danger of losing Him in the mists of theological speculation, as they had already lost God. To weaken the humanity of Jesus is to lose the value of the revelation of God in Him. It is just as important that He be a man as that He be divine; for it is only through being a man that He has value and meaning as a revelation of God.

Here is an equation: X equals a plus b plus c , where x is an unknown quantity, to become known by putting it in terms of a and b and c , things we know. How foolish the student would be who should take that equation and try to put a and b and c , the things he knows, in terms of x , the unknown; who should say, "I believe that x has such and such meanings and mysterious qualities; and if it equals a and b and c , then a and b and c must share that unknown nature of x ." Foolish fellow! The very object and value of the equation is to help you know the meaning of x . Interpret the unknown in terms of the known.

God is the unknown, the great x of human thought. Jesus comes, with knowable, human qualities, made up of the very a b c of human character, love, sacrifice, righteousness. X equals a plus b plus c ; God the unknown is just like human purity, love and joy as we see them in Jesus. That is the equation of the Incarnation, the central truth of the Christian faith. What a pathetically foolish course it is to be content to take that equation as meaning that Jesus must be invested with all the mysterious and unknowable nature of God, becoming another mysterious x , and to overlook the real value of it, which lies in its assurance that God is like that known, real, human character of Jesus.

There is one book in the New Testament which declares its purpose to be to lead men to believe in the divinity of Christ. But it does it through emphasizing the humanness of our Lord. In a majestic preface it sets forth the great idea of the Word of God, the Logos, existing from all eternity; and then it goes on to show that this unseen and mystical nature of God became known to men in the life of Jesus; and the powerful thinker who wrote the Fourth Gospel shows to a theological age the God it seeks by writing of the human life of Jesus. Friends, it is gain, not loss, if we have come to a simpler, surer, more real sense of the human Jesus; for it means that we are so much the nearer to a true knowledge of God.

There is a third gain, also, of very great value. Added emphasis on the humanity of Jesus means a program and a leader for our daily life, and for the world's progress.

If Christ came into history as an outsider, a visitor from another world, with a glamor of the unearthly about Him. He and His religion might mean much for the eternal destiny of individuals, but He would mean little for the life of the world. And it is significant that those times in Christian history in which the sense of His humanity has been weak, have been also times when Christians felt little responsibility for the world and its life. It is of the greatest significance that the modern passion for social service, the determination to apply Christ's ideals to the whole life of the world, the taking of His Gospel as a program for human society, has come right along with the rediscovery of the human Jesus. This is again to counterbalance any amount of loss, that we see our Lord now as one who came into human history to play a real part in it, and whose supreme interest as our Leader is now to send us and lead us into the entire life of the world, that that life may be set in His way, and saved by His spirit.

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

One book in recent times has outsold all others. Twenty-two million copies have been sold of Charles M. Sheldon's "In His Steps," which asks, "What would Jesus do?" and takes the example of the real, human life of Jesus as the ideal for our real, modern life. The influence of that book is an indication of what Christians have to gain by emphasizing the human reality of the life of our Lord. Let us thank God if we have got somewhat away from the error of our fathers in thinking to exalt Christ our Lord by setting Him apart from the common lot of man; if we see Him more simply, wholesomely, humanly, a man living among men, in all points like unto His brethren, tempted like as we are, as truly one with us as one with God; for the more we come to know "the man, Christ Jesus," the more we see God in Him, and the more we find in Him the way, the truth, and the life for ourselves and for the whole life of the world.

A PROPOSITION THAT PROVOKES THOUGHT

We seem to be shut up to one way of outlawing war. This is not to vote that other peoples' wars are henceforth wicked but that all and every war is wicked, and to agree, since this work of killing our fellow men collectively is wicked, that we will do it no more, in short, that whether or not England or France or Japan or Germany stand ready to "sacrifice" their armies and navies for the common good, and so to remove fear of themselves from the minds of their neighbors, we in America at any rate will do what we desire the others to do, and will henceforth remove the load of fear which we at present cause to all the others. From now on they shall be assured that we shall never arm our young men, or construct warships and airplanes, or make poison gases, with which to destroy human beings. There shall be one nation at least which shall be "safe for democracy." Who will hurt us, when we renounce altogether the means of hurting others? Or, how can you have a League of Nations till at least one nation has enough respect for our common humanity to stop threatening its neighbors with war, and enough courage to dare to do right?

In short we shall have "good society" among the nations, as we have it among our townspeople, as soon as, and no faster than, we drop our scowls and suspicions, and turn our best selves to each other, and prescribe the fewest possible rules, and make the least pretense to bind or compel anyone's membership. CHARGES AGAINST PROHIBITION

The following letter appeared recently in “The New York Evening Post,” and is a good reminder to us of what things were in the past as well as of one or two other elements in the situation:

Sir: Our good friends the wets have been in the habit of charging the dries with being extravagant, fanatical, and even hysterical. Of late, as I peruse the public prints, I can but note that these wets of the judicial mind are out-doing the dries in this particular. For instance, we hear them frequently assert that an orgy of drunkenness is on, the like of which was never known in this country before; and men are being poisoned in large numbers by the terrible stuff that is being sold. To buy this stuff is a violation of the law, and an encouragement of bootleggers. Men don’t have to use it.

Our friends seem to be a bit short on memory. Have they forgotten the old days, when there were in full operation, day and night, almost a quarter of a million of saloons; and the deaths from the use of intoxicants ran up above a half-million each year? There is this difference. Then little effort was made by city officials to enforce the license laws, these saloons did about as they pleased, and we were so used to it that little was said about it. There was a conspiracy of silence on. The saloon was all-powerful in politics, and even the public press said little about these violations of the law. To-day we are under a prohibition law and the liquor traffic is in the limelight. Every violation, arrest and trial is noted in the daily papers; and each individual death from the use of drink is checked up.

Again it is asserted that these fanatical dries fixed upon one-half of one per cent. as the maximum content of liquor to be sold; and that they assert that anything stronger than that is intoxicating. Wrong in both instances. First, the dries did not fix this scale. It was done by the brewers some years ago to protect their own business. The dries took it for granted that these long-headed business men knew what they were about and accepted that ratio. Second, the dries never claimed that everything beyond one-half of one per cent. was intoxicating. They were not trying to find out what was intoxicating, but what was not intoxicating.

This reminds me of a very old story: An Irish gentleman wanted to hire a coachman. He was a cautious man and did not want to take any chances. He advertised and the applicants in goodly number presented themselves. He admitted them one at a time. He asked the first one how near he could drive to the edge of a cliff without tumbling over. The applicant replied that if the road was firm he thought he could go within three inches of the edge with perfect safety. The second one stated that he could go within two inches of the edge without going over. The third man replied promptly: “Begorra, I’d drive as far from the edge as I could.” He was promptly employed. The idea of the enforcement act is not to see how near to the edge

A Chinese legend tells of a beggar who starved to death, sitting on bags of gold. How to arouse men to the wealth of the spirit, to richer and more satisfying lives, is a perennial problem, perhaps never more pressing than now. It is handled with rare insight and understanding in the books listed below.

SERMONS TO CHILDREN

Angelo Patri says so many things worth while that we are constantly tempted to quote him. He is principal of Public School 45 in the Bronx, New York City. Here is what he wrote on the subject of “Sermons to Children” the other day:

Ministers ought to be trained to preach sermons to children. I don’t believe they have been or more of them would preach better ones to children than they do.

The minister ought to preach to the children so that they learn that he speaks for the church and speaks with the voice of authority. The children cannot get his authority at all because he speaks in a tongue they do not understand.

It isn’t any good to make children fill spares in pews, while the man in the pulpit talks to the most intellectual of his audience. My experience tells me that is what he does. Being a highly trained intellect in himself, he is likely to assume the same of his listeners and soar away.

Many of the adults are bored stiff, and the children feel as though they were bombarded with hard words. They feel aggrieved that they are being held prisoners, tied to the stake, as it

We Must Rebuild the Japanese Churches!

The earthquake in Japan not only caused the death of thousands, the impoverishment of hundreds of thousands, but it totally wrecked all the Churches of Tokyo and Yokohama.

The Japanese Christians, pastors and laymen, as well as our missionaries, have shown marvelous courage. They have been foremost in caring for the wounded and ministering to the suffering. Their courage is still undaunted and immediately

They Have Started a Campaign to Rebuild Their Churches

This radiogram has just come to our Mission Boards and tells its own story:

“Japanese Church Federation (and) the Federated Missions of Japan (have) formed international (and) interdenominational commission (for) survey (and) reconstruction. Seventy churches (have been) destroyed (and) 6000 Christian families (are) homeless.”

Converse.

(Secretary of Federation of Christian Missions of Japan,)

The cost of rebuilding the seventy churches destroyed cannot be less than $500,000.

Here is a remarkable opportunity for the Christians of America to render not only a beautiful service of good-will to their Japanese fellow-Christians, but also to make an investment that will be lasting and which will go on rendering a beneficent service through many years.

We wish it could be said that every one of the fifty thousand readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK—children as well as adults—had some part in this investment. It would make history. Likewise, this investment would do more to create lasting peace and good-will than all the navies in the world.

Have you not noticed that all of the yellow journals of both Japan and America have stopped talking war?

THE CHRISTIAN WORK wants to have a large share in rebuilding these churches. No doubt the Foreign Mission Boards will at once begin a campaign to raise funds to rebuild their churches. The independent native churches must also look to America.

Will not every reader of these words send a contribution at once to THE CHRISTIAN WORK? Do not pass this wonderful opportunity by—send what you can, large or small.

If you want your contribution to go through one of the Mission Boards for a Mission Church, indicate that fact in your letter. If you want it to go to the native churches—and much must be sent to them—indicate that also (all unindicated contributions will go to them).

We have asked Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, who was missionary in Japan for many years, and who is known by every native pastor in Japan, to forward checks for the native churches, to be used under the direction of a committee in Japan.

Send your contributions at once to THE CHRISTIAN WORK

We hope to be able to announce within a month that every reader of THE CHRISTIAN WORK sent something!

were, while these missiles are hurled at their helpless heads.

Yet the children should have their weekly sermon. I remember one that a wise old man preached to his children. He said: "I want all you youngsters in church next Sunday morning at half-past nine. I've a story to tell you."

We were there. First, because he had authority, and our parents had a little, too. We looked up expectantly at him and he smiled down at us. Together we said the simple office of the day, and then he said:

"It's a fairy tale I'm telling you, and I want you to listen to it so you can tell it to your fathers and mothers. They'll like it as much as you."

"There was once a little red dwarf that lived in a cave on the side of a hill. 'Twas a beautiful cave in the side of the hill, where the greatest of all giants lived. The giant, you understand, lived at the top of the hill, and the dwarf close to the bottom. And the giant was afraid of the dwarf, be it known!"

"The things that dwarf could do!"

"He was bright red, himself, but he never came outside the doors of his cave. Not he."

"He sent out his soldiers to do whatever he willed. My, they were the boys! They could burn down a town while you blessed yourself, they were so quick and so wicked when they were set to it. The dwarf, you see, could be very wicked when he chose, and very, very good when he chose, too."

"But good and bad, he kept the giant at the top of the hill in a terrible bother. He had to keep at it day and night to get ahead of the little dwarf."

"For the worst thing about it all was that the dwarf's army was invisible. Not a hair of them could you ever see, and my! the mischief or the good works they could do! Just as the giant willed."

Have I said enough to tell you that the good man was teaching us the use and the power of our tongues? I went home that day and stuck out my tongue and looked hard at it. For the first time in my life I knew I had it and I was afraid of what I might do with it. Not a bad sermon, was it? I still hear it.—The Bell Syndicate, Inc.

THE I. W. W. ON BOOTLEGGING

The Industrial Workers of the World in the course of their strike on the Pacific coast, the chief of whose objectives is the release of political prisoners, is undertaking to prevent violence by prohibiting traffic in intoxicants. A recent number of "The Industrial Worker" (Seattle) contains the following proclamation:

"WARNING TO BOOTLEGGERS!

"To the Bootleggers:

"To all places of business in Seattle selling intoxicating liquors, smilo, grapo, etc.:

"The members of the I. W. W. working in the lumber camps and mills of this district are on strike for the release of class-war and political prisoners.

"Will you help us keep order in Seattle during this strike? You know a drunken person cannot control himself, and while full of booze may commit some act of violence. This we do not want.

"Will you co-operate? Kindly refuse to sell any booze while this strike is on. If this is not done at once, other means will be used. All gambling must also stop."

ONE MAN'S RELIGION

By Robert Quillen

"While I have set myself the task of grouping certain thoughts having to do with religion, I realize that all of these are in a very intimate sense the product of my own experiences, and that, though I have made honest endeavor to stand at a little distance and view my subject impersonally, the net result is a work more resembling autobiography than a treatise on philosophy." CONSERVATISM, RADICALISM AND SCIENTIFIC METHOD

By A. B. Wolfe

Professor of Economics and Sociology, University of Ohio

Mr. Wolfe says: "Conservatism as a social attitude has its merits and defects—let me show them to you conservatives. Radicalism as a social attitude has its merits and defects—let me show them to you radicals." Then he says in conclusion: "Now let me show you a social attitude superior to both your present conservative and radical disposition, on which you can agree and unite without either of you having to 'give in' to the other—a social laboratory disposition toward social change and progress, like the working chemist's laboratory disposition toward change and progress in chemistry." It is safe to say that with the assistance of this Dictionary the overburdened parish minister can journey up and down the territory covered by the majority of the new religious books that he will buy with the mental equivalent of the speed and assurance with which an automobile goes right through the night, no matter how pitch dark, when it is equipped with a good searchlight.

"It is worth its price both for reference and for reading continuously."—The Continent (Presbyterian).

"What more elevating and broadening exercise could a teacher or speaker on spiritual themes desire than the habitual study of such a book? It will be of the greatest spiritual service to people of all religions and of no religion. It meets a well-nigh universal need."—Christian Advocate (New York).

the official resolution of the organization repudiating violence. In it the executive officers of the organization declare "that said organization does not now, and never has believed in or advocated either destruction or violence as a means of accomplishing industrial reform; first, because no principle was ever settled by such methods; second, because industrial history has taught us that when strikers resort to violence and unlawful methods, all the resources of the government are immediately arrayed against them and they lose their cause; third, because such methods destroy the constructive impulse which it is the purpose of this organization to foster and develop in order that the workers may fit themselves to assume their place in the new society."

"By judicious selection and a translation as simple as it is beautiful in diction, the authors of this book have prepared a fascinating narrative. FILIPINO COURAGE

In almost every land boys and girls may find it hard to become earnest Christians on account of family feeling. Mrs. J. A. Graham tells of one of the Silliman Institute Filipinos who plans to become a minister. Last year when he made a flying visit to his home he did not find conditions very hard for him. But this year it was another story. "All the enemies of the Gospel tried to influence his father against allowing him to be a preacher. He stormed and raged, but the boy stood firm. His mother and little sister had received the Lord in their hearts, and they wanted to be baptized. The father never thought they would stand out against his wishes, but when Dr. Graham and the young evangelist went up to his far-away town last week, these two gladly received baptism. The father's anger knew no bounds. He never could have imagined that his meek little wife would dare disobey him. That night he beat her, and she had to flee from the house to wander around the corn fields all the next day. By that afternoon she went home and found the young preacher had been left there to protect her, although the doctor had had to come back to Tagbilaran. The father began another tirade, and James said to him: 'You can kill me if you want to; but you could never change my faith in Christ.' The father weakened. 'Let us have peace,' he said." Such is the story as Mrs. Graham writes it.

The World of To-day

A WORLD CONFERENCE IN PROSPECT

Last December the American Secretary of State suggested that the way to settle the reparations problem was through an impartial investigation of Germany's capacity to pay, conducted by financial experts. The proposal at the time seemed to fall without much response abroad. The French government allowed it to be understood that it would not consider any measure which was outside of the Versailles Treaty and the authority of the Reparations Commission. For the last ten months Germany, of course, has been drifting into such a muddle that France herself can see small prospect of any reparation soon. Early this month President Coolidge said that the American Government still held to its proposal of last December. Twenty-four hours after that statement was reported in the British press, Lord Curzon, the British Foreign Secretary, sent to our Government a letter accepting the proposition of last December and saying that if the European Powers would join in such an inquiry, they hoped that America would co-operate. "America," Lord Curzon remarked, "is directly and vitally concerned with the solution of the European problem, if for no other reason, because in it is involved the question of the inter-allied debt." The British Foreign Secretary further asked the question whether America would be willing to share in the inquiry if some of the European Allies kept out of it. That was an obvious slap at France. Three days later our Government, through Secretary Hughes, answered that it was willing "to take part in an economic conference in which all the European Allies, chiefly concerned in German reparations, participate for the purpose of considering the questions of the capacity of Germany to make reparation payments and an appropriate financial plan for securing such payments." Secretary Hughes went on to say that our Government felt strongly that Germany should not be relieved of her responsibilities and that the conference should be advisory, not binding the governments. He rejected Lord Curzon's remark about the connection of the inter-allied debt with the whole problem, reiterating the official American position, but he made this hopeful statement:

While the American people do not favor cancellation of debts of the Allies to the United States or of the transfer to the people of the United States of the burden of Germany's obligations, directly or indirectly, the Government of the United States has no desire to be oppressive or to refuse to make reasonable settlements as to time and terms of payment, in full consideration of the circumstances of the Allied debtors. It may be added that the establishment of sound economic conditions in Europe, the serious reduction of military outlays and the demonstration of a disposition of European peoples to work together to achieve the aims of peace and justice will not fail to have their proper influence upon American thought and purpose in connection with such adjustments.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

The American Government reserved its decision in regard to taking part in any conference in which any of the great European Allies did not share. The European Powers concerned have let it be known that they accept the proposition for the conference. France, through Premier Poincaré, insists that the conference shall not take up the amount of reparations and that inquiry shall be conducted under the authority of the Reparations Commission. The assurance of an international conference is a tremendously hopeful development. The best element in the situation is Secretary Hughes' statement that America will not, in taking up the question of debts, be unmindful of European conditions. He left an open door of hope that the United States might really take its share in helping to settle the European enigma. One of the first things that should be done by Congress when it assembles in December is to repeal its action forbidding our Debt Commission to consider any scaling down of the debts owed by the Allies to us. When that is done, we can make sacrifices ourselves as we did at the Washington Conference, and so make it far easier for the other nations, especially France, to give up something.

THE GERMAN TURMOIL

In the Rhineland the French have thrown off all pretense of neutrality in their relations with the Separatists. They have let the latter march through the cities and take public buildings after the curfew law had driven everyone else indoors. As soon as the Separatists were installed in the city halls, no matter how little reality their power had, the French have announced that they would deal with them as the government "de facto." The British have taken a very different tack and no Separatist government has been set up in the district which they occupy. But the Separatist movement has so little foundation in popular sentiment that apparently the French themselves are almost ready to throw it over. Unoccupied Germany is having its own troubles. The Berlin government has ordered the Saxony cabinet to resign, on the ground that it has been disloyal, and has asked Bavaria to return the national troops which it had, in effect, kidnapped. Both Saxony and Bavaria seem inclined to disregard the central government. In the meanwhile food riots have taken place in many parts of the country. But Germany is gaining courage both by reason of the prospect of the economic conference and by talk of a foreign loan, which will give her an opportunity to get wheat. The whole future of Europe for the time being, of course, hinges on the proposed conference.

THE NOBEL PRIZE IN MEDICINE

The better class of doctors throughout the world will approve the award of the Nobel Prize for Medicine for 1923 to Dr. F. G. Banting and Dr. J. J. R. McLeod, both of Toronto University, for their discovery of insulin. The amount of the award this year is about thirty-nine thousand dollars, of which each receives one-half. Dr. Banting has long specialized in internal medicine, particularly experimenting to discover some remedy which would artificially take the place of the pancreatic fluid, noticeably deficient or entirely absent in cases of diabetes. When it is lacking the body cannot assimilate the sugar absolutely necessary for health. He discovered a remedy in a serum composed essentially of the pancreas of a certain animal, mixed with other ingredients. He called the result insulin. With careful attention to the amount of fats, starches and proteid in the food, he found that by the injection, hypodermically, of Insulin he could relieve many of the symptoms incident to the disease and the old way of treating it; there is a gain in weight and a return to the normal habits of life; within certain limits these patients may eat what they want to and may once more assimilate food with sugar. In no sense is insulin a cure for diabetes, though treatment prolongs life, but the benefit persists only so long as it is continued. Although Dr. Banting made this discovery several years ago, he continued his experiments for a long time, in collaboration with Dr. MacLeod, verifying and amplifying his results. He finally announced the discovery early in 1922. Probably no specific since the discovery of the vaccine against smallpox has been so universally received with approval by the medical profession throughout the world. To guard against charlatans and unskilled physicians obtaining possession of the formula, Dr. Banting entrusted the method of its preparation to the Medical Research Commission of England, an official medical body, and to the University of Toronto. The latter is erecting a building for its manufacture. The only American physician to receive the Nobel Prize in Medicine is Dr. Alexis Carrel, to whom it was awarded in 1912.

THE "WIZARD" OF SCHENECTADY

Thirty-four years ago there arrived in the steerage at New York a penniless, short-sighted, twenty-four-year-old hunchback with a swollen cheek. He was sent to the "detention pen." Only the pleadings of the young American student who had shared his own money with the immigrant in order that he might be able to come induced the officials to let him in. The immigrant was Charles Proteus Steinmetz, born in Breslau, Germany. He was not a graduate of Breslau University only because the faculty so strongly disapproved of his Socialist views that they did not give him his degree. In order to escape arrest after the suppression of the student paper for which he was one of the chief writers, he had fled to Austria and thence to Zurich. Admitted to America, young Steinmetz found work at two dollars a day with the Rudolph Eickemeyer electrical motor manufacturing company at Yonkers, New York. When the General Electric Company bought the Eickemeyer plant in 1892, the able young German experimenter went to the new company's plant at Lynn and thence a year later to Schenectady, where he spent the rest of his life. The General Electric Company provided him a laboratory for experiments and all the funds he needed for his work. Steinmetz made the most abstruse scientific investigations, knowing well that in due time they would in all probability be of industrial value. He was a real genius in electrical theory, a master of engineering mathematics, and an inventor. His experiments with the transient phenomena of electricity called forth particular public interest. The whole country was interested a year ago last March, when he set off a bolt of artificial lightning of one hundred thousand volts and one million horsepower. The artificial lightning shattered heavy blocks of wood. He was a philosopher and a prophet of science. He reckoned that a hundred years from now the steam engine would be as archaic as is the stage coach to-day; all our trains would be drawn by electric power, to the saving of two-thirds of the coal now used by the railroads. Palls of smoke, he prophesied, would no longer hang over our cities and people would be healthier and wiser. Heat, power and light, he said, will all be furnished by electricity and men will produce enough for the general use in four hours of work. The rest of their time they can use for the work which they themselves choose and therefore are likely to enjoy better than that which is imposed upon them. But he was not only a scientist. He was also a citizen. For eleven years he had been President of the Board of Education of Schenectady and for seven years President of the Common Council of the city. Last year he was candidate for State Engineer on the Socialist ticket, running well ahead of his party. He was also interested in the philosophy of life. He felt that there was no necessary conflict between science and religion—that the objections to religion “were not proved.” His Socialism became much modified with the passage of years. In his later years he no longer looked forward to the Marxian state, but he believed that we were on the way to developing a system wherein capital and labor should be partners in the ownership and management of industry. In his “America and the New Epoch,” he laid down his ideals of co-operative democratic organization in these words:

There must be as a first requirement for such [an organization] one racial, industrial and political unity. There must be no racial antagonism. Antagonism and fight between political organizations, national, State and municipal, and industrial organizations must cease and intelligent understanding between the public and the industrial corporations must be established. Most of all, however, the foremost causes of indifference and antagonism of the masses of producers against the producing organizations must be eliminated by an efficient establishment of the right of everybody to live in his accustomed social standard, and the duty to work when capable—it means the recognition of the fundamental principle of civilized society, of the first commandment of the Bible, “Where is thy brother?” and the outlawing forever of Cain’s answer, “Am I my brother’s keeper?”

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION OF THE NEAR EAST RELIEF

This morning the fifteen thousand children in the greatest orphanage in the world—the Near East Relief hostel at Alexandropol—had a breakfast that will only be paid for in December. That is not because people have lost interest in the Near East Relief. They gave over nine million dollars last year, one and a half million more than they did the year before. That increase was the answer of the Christian people of America to the destruction of Smyrna and the expulsion of the Christians from Anatolia. The Near East Relief received more money this July than it did in July, 1922; it received more in August this year than it did a year ago. But the expenditures of the Near East Relief have been three million dollars more in the past twelve months than its regular program of feeding and care of orphans would have required. The Smyrna disaster, the transportation of twenty-eight thousand children out of Anatolia in winter in order to save their lives, the feeding of fifty thousand refugees from Samsun and the Black Sea coast, most of whom would have died without the bread brought by the Near East Relief—to the meeting of these three emergencies the three million dollars has gone. The expenses of the Near East Relief are highest just at present, for it is necessary now to lay in provisions and clothes to tide over the cold, snowy months of January and February, when especially in the Caucasus transportation may be absolutely impossible. So expenses average twenty thousand dollars a day just now, while the receipts are only half that amount. The greatest contributions to the organization come during December, the month when the world turns especially to goodwill because of the birth of the Prince of Good-Will. In that month the Near East Relief has never received less than one million dollars. But the money received in December will not buy supplies in November. So to-day the Near East Relief is very hard pressed. Cleveland H. Dodge has tided it over to the present. But last week in one day there came in from Captain Yarrow drafts for forty-two thousand dollars, spent for feeding the children in the Erivan district, where he is in command. After that forty-two thousand dollars had been paid only fifty thousand dollars in reserve was available. If the organization cannot keep on paying out for winter supplies now the children will be starving three months hence. That is not exaggerating. Near East Relief funds have never yet been sufficient to keep all the hungry children in the Near East fed. If it is simply to care for its present charges, the Near East Relief will probably be some four hundred and thirty-seven thousand dollars behind on December first. Whence is coming the money to tide over the next thirty days until receipts overtake expenses? Are there not some of us who can send to-day the funds which perhaps we had thought we should give a few months hence?

GOLDEN RULE SUNDAY

If one of us had been killed, let us say in Harpoot, in 1915, and his wife carried off and his brood of children left orphans, what would he have asked Mr. Kurkjian or Mr. Anadourian or Mr. Minassian to do for his little ones? We should have wanted them to do something—something definite. To be sure, Americans have done definite things for the orphan children of the Orient. But in order to make it clearer to ourselves, the Near East Relief is proposing a Golden Rule Sunday on December second. It suggests that on that day we should eat one meal which is the same fare that the orphans in the Near East will be eating, and that we should use the sums which we save from our ordinary food as a gift to the Near East Relief. The orphans’ meal will be a plain but healthful meal. We shall not starve on that fare. If five or ten million of us—or why not fifty million?—deny ourselves just for that one day we shall make the difference between want and enough to many a child. We shall enter into a real fellowship with our brothers and sisters over the way, and we shall partake of a communion that, we hope, may girdle the earth. The menu for the orphans’ meal may be obtained from the Near East Relief office, 151 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

THE NEW SPIRIT IN THE STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT

The Student Volunteer Movement will hold its ninth quadrennial convention at Indianapolis from December 28 to January 1. The first convention met in Cleveland in 1891 and helped to create a new era in the interest of young college people in the mission task. Since then the conventions have gone on in a good deal the same fashion as that in which they began. They have exerted wider and wider influence—the first represented fifty-one institutions, the last nearly a thousand—but they have considered about the same topics quadrennium after quadrennium and dealt with them in about the same way. The convention at Des Moines in 1920, however, saw a new development. Some of the students who attended it came with the expectation that the meeting would address itself to the great problems involved in the creation of a new world, those problems which the World War made men realize as they had not in 1914. Students of this mind, as every one will recall, were extremely disappointed in the Des Moines Conference, and held a meeting apart from the set convention. It was a new departure in young people's religious meetings. The young people actually were taking not a nominal hand in the direction, but preparing to rebel unless they were given a real hand in it. Most of the young people who held the rebel meeting had a different idea of Christian missions from the one entertained by those in control of the meeting. They held that missions had to do with a Christianizing of the social order as well as with the individual. Their thought and action is bearing much fruit in the plans for the forthcoming convention. The Committee on Arrangements for the Indianapolis meeting includes students as well as faculty members and representatives of the Christian Associations and of the Mission Boards. The purposes of the convention as they are announced by the Student Volunteer officials have a new note in them. The first set down is: "To emphasize the solidarity of mankind and the interdependence of all nations and races." They speak of the power of Christ demonstrated not only by transformation wrought in individual lives, but in the structure of society, "wherever his principles have been courageously acted upon." The meeting is "to set forth the indispensable contribution which each race can make to our understanding of God and to the working out of his will among men, and to expose the un-Christian character of the racial arrogance and intolerance prevalent among us." The leaders refer to a loyalty to Christ and His Church "which should transcend any national loyalties at variance with it." They propose "to consider certain un-Christian aspects of modern life which run through all nations." They recognize that the United States and Canada are only partially Christian "inasmuch as large areas of their life and their international relationships are not yet fundamentally affected by the principles of Christ." And so on. It seems the rebels have largely won. The whole spirit of the announcement suggests both that the day of democracy in our Christian organizations is marching on, and that we are recognizing the practical creation of God's kingdom on earth as the object of Christianity.

THE ENGLISHMAN'S RELIGION

Canon Carnegie, who was recently welcomed on this side of the Atlantic, gave a most suggestive address the other day on the religion of the average Englishman. Canon Carnegie is rector of St. Margaret's, which nestles under Westminster Abbey, and is also chaplain of the House of Commons. In this present House especially he comes in contact with men who represent all phases of English life, from the typical land owner who dominated the House in days gone by, to the labor leader, and even the artisan. He finds no men in the House who are opposed to religion. When, recently, he asked a group of the most radical members, who hail from Glasgow, what they were religiously, the answer was

"Presbyterians" (!) He was assured by a man who knew at first hand the roughest sort of Britisher, that even in the lowest London public houses no man could attempt a genuinely blasphemous attack on real religion without receiving the rebuke of the very ne'er-do-wells. But by his experience in Birmingham, Canon Carnegie was convinced that the majority of the people of that city, and he believes of England in general, do not attend church services. If Englishmen are not indifferent to religion, but are indifferent to the Church, what then is their religion? His observation has brought Canon Carnegie to the conclusion that the Englishman's religion has in it two elements: a great reverence for conscience and a keen honor for the doing of one's duty. That is, as far as he can make out, the bed-rock of English character. What sort of Christianity corresponds to these conceptions and would give religious interpretation to them? "As I read the Gospel," he said, "I see in Christ's life a dominating consciousness of the Power above him; I see it in His praise of the centurion; I see it when He said, 'I must be about My Father's business'; 'not My will but Thine be done.' In that characteristic of Christ is a meeting ground with Christianity for men who recognize the supreme demand of conscience. If we accepted that as a vital principle of our faith, I wonder whether we should not reach the men outside. And the life of Jesus certainly is witness to His duty-doing. Because He stuck to what He saw as His duty He hung on the cross." The Canon believes that any man who starts with such a conception of Christianity will go on to the heights and depths of faith which lie implicit for many in our religion.

The Northern Baptist Convention is conducting a series of conferences to put before their constituency the missionary needs of the people. They are taking special pains in the meetings to give the spiritual aspects of the situation a larger place than they have had in the past three or four years, at any rate. Each of the five teams which is going out consists of a secretary of some national board, a pastor, a missionary, a layman and a woman. The Baptists are planning to raise twelve million dollars for their missionary and benevolent work this year. But the leaders recognize that they can only get that sum by getting the eyes of the people off of the dollars and on to the needs of men and the example of Christ. Of course conferences are valuable. The danger of them is that we shall be stirred up and then do nothing about it. Church people especially need to recall the counsel of wise William James that we should never allow ourselves to have an emotion which does not work out into some practical act, no matter how small.

A great deal of interest was excited by the Citizenship Conference at Washington last month. Fred B. Smith, the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Conference, has already learned of groups of about "fifty-seven different brands" who are now attempting to attach to themselves the name of "Citizenship Conference." Some of these groups have political ambitions; some apparently are quite innocent of any particular motive. The continuation committees of the Citizenship Conference are planning to hold a series of twenty or more conventions on the whole question of law enforcement, with particular reference to the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act. The conventions will meet at natural centers throughout the country.

A Message from the Commission on International Justice and Good-Will of the Federal Council of Churches

DURING the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament three calls to one hundred and fifty thousand churches in America were issued by the Federal Council. The churches were invited to help create an atmosphere of intelligent hope, reasonable expectation and an insistent demand that the Conference might result in the positive reduction of competitive naval programs. The response was notable.

Out of 13,878,671 names signed to letters and petitions sent to President Harding and Mr. Hughes preceding and during the early weeks of the Conference, it was officially reported that over twelve and a half million of the writers stated that they were praying to God for His blessing on and guidance of the Conference. Evidently the Christians of the country were the citizens supremely interested in the Conference.

The success of the Conference was real and great. A war with Japan, then widely thought to be impending, was avoided. Peace in the Pacific for at least ten years was assured. A new and more just policy in dealing with China was adopted by the nations.

The competitive building of capital ships for the navies was stopped for the present. Many ships are now being scrapped and enormous savings are being made possible.

But, best of all, the spirit of mutual confidence and goodwill between the Powers bordering on the Pacific was definitely promoted. The churches had an honorable and significant part in securing these notable results.

A new problem now confronts the nation and a new opportunity for service now comes to the churches. The task before us is to enable our millions of citizens:

First, to secure an intelligent understanding of the nature and work of the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Second, to attain a clear appreciation of what it would mean for America and for the world for the United States either to accept or reject President Harding's proposal.

Third, to determine, each for himself, what loyal and intelligent citizens of a great democracy may and should do to help their country perform its moral obligations.

Acceptance of a World Peace Program looking towards a warless world can never be imposed by a government upon its people, but it can be imposed by a people on itself. This, however, depends on the moral and intellectual training of the people.

This in turn largely depends on the churches—on clergymen, deacons, elders, Sunday school superintendents and teachers, and on hundreds of thousands of devout and consecrated men and women in the Christian homes throughout the cities, towns and villages of our land.

The Christians of Christendom, who number many hundreds of millions (some forty-five million in the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches of the United States), can establish world institutions for justice and peace if they will go about it intelligently, determinedly and with consecration.

The evil "war-spirit" of the nations can be cast out only by prayer and by sincere and devoted service for the upbuilding of the Kingdom of God in its widest applications to the relations of classes, nations and races. Only the spirit of love and good-will between the nations can overcome their present hatreds and hostilities.

The churches hold in their hands the secret for the solution of the world's sorrow and suffering. It is for them to open the doors and lead the nations into the way of life, the road to a warless world.

Fundamentalism and Definitions

SOME of those who support the more confined view in the discussion which has arisen over fundamentalism, Fosdick, et cetera, have sent out to the Presbyterian ministers of this country a broadside entitled "The Great Defection," by Dr. Charles Edward Macartney and reprinted from "The Presbyterian." Dr. Macartney, harking back to the late Francis L. Patton, quotes an address which he made in 1903 in the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., wherein the late President of Princeton Seminary asserted that, in its last analysis, there is in "the new Christianity" a complete surrender of supernaturalism. "And the surrender of supernaturalism," he went on, "is the surrender of obligatory morals, and the surrender of obligatory morals is the surrender of morality itself, save as it is enforced by the sanctions of affection, by the jealous care a man has for his own interests, by fear of social ostracism, by the sheriff, and the shotgun."

When one reads such a sentence from Dr. Patton, indeed as one reads what the Fundamentalists are saying all about us, he realizes that they and the so-called free thinkers or the "atheists" are thinking on a common plane. The "atheists" likewise imagine that the conceptions which come to us through natural science and historical criticism and psychology conflict with the old Hebrew sense that God rules the world. But to the "modern" Christian the whole development of morality springs from God just as much as does the whole development of life. We live in God's world; it is built not only in the outer visible structure as God planned it, but in its inmost essence, in those forces which are most difficult for the mind to comprehend, those forces which, in the world of man's touch on man, are as mighty but as intangible as electricity or the ultra-violet waves in the physical world. Everything is "supernatural," if one will use the word. All nature, all morality, all the "laws" of one and the other spring from God, God who made things as they are.

Is not the essence of the difficulty between Fundamentalists and Modernists that their modes of thought run in different planes, their ideas in some cases are incommensurate? The men whose thinking is shaped in older moulds do not feel as though their idea of God put Him far away, but the newer generation feels that it does. The difference of thinking between the two schools is that between categories based on appearance and categories based on the inner substance. The older thought generation holds the form to be the essential thing; the newer generation is concerned with the force within, however the form may vary.

Dr. Patton's definition of Christianity, quoted with approval by Dr. Macartney in this article, is: "A supernatural revelation of a way of salvation from sin through the incarnation and blood-shedding of the Son of God." How blind that definition is to-day to the average man who graduates from college with a scientific degree, indeed to ninety-nine people out of a hundred. To be sure, the fact that it is to-day incomprehensible to most intelligent men proves nothing. The language may not be that of the ordinary thinking man, but it might be one way of expressing the real fact as truly as would some more easily comprehended form of words. But does that definition comply with Jesus's own idea of religion? Again and again we must bid those who want to know what Christianity is, to turn back to the Gospels, above all, to those Gospels which give us the picture of Jesus most directly, with the least transmission of His personality through other minds. What was Jesus Christ's definition of the essence of life for man (what would Jesus's definition of the essence of life for man be if not Christianity)? It is so familiar that it does not need to be quoted. In it is the idea at the base of all the permanent building of society. It is as simple as seems the light, familiar as is the air or the earth, mighty as life, and like life, appearing in innumerable forms as it works out in practice. The essence for life consists of two fundamentals, the absorbing love of God and the absorbing love of man. The way of life is the seeking of the Kingdom of God and His righteousness.

We all know that the particular cast of Paul's interpretation of Christianity came from the circumstances of his own life, from the atmosphere of the thinking of the Jew and Greek—and Roman—in the first century of our era. He knew surely that in the way of Christ was the hope of the world; there was the seed of the new life, the real resurrection. When he rose to his highest, as in the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians, he fairly sang the message of Jesus Christ. That chapter is as true to the mind of God, we may venture to say, as is the fifth chapter of Matthew. But men do not think any longer in some of the terms in which Paul thought—terms of a flat earth, of buying off a slave from punishment, of an angry master at the head of a house. Men think to-day in terms of a universe wherein a round earth spins, a very little thing; in terms of outreaching love of the greater and more understanding for the weaker and the less, the love of a father for a son; in terms of a Power that lives behind, in, and through all manifestations and all history and all the tracks by which man's world—and, we believe, the whole creation—goes on toward the fuller coming of the Kingdom of God.

The Fundamentalist is trying to use more of the terms of thought of Greco-Hebrew and medieval philosophy than the "Modernist" is willing or able to. (The Fundamentalist himself finds some of his thought counters very awkward to deal with. They appear to commit him to propositions the very suggestion of which make it hard for him to keep his patience.) But may not the modern man expect this of his Fundamentalist brother, that the latter will be ready to accept the Christianity of Jesus, Christianity as it is expressed in the best authenticated words of Jesus? May he not insist that the Fundamentalist be content with the religion for man that Jesus Christ was content with? Once the Fundamentalist says "amen" to that we shall be at an end of the "war in the churches." The whole Church, not merely the modernist fraction of it, will find itself putting before the new generation, before the laboring man, before the student, before the "people of the world," a religion whose form of expression can be "understood" of the people and the truth of whose message their inward souls acknowledge whether or not they have the courage to take it for their own lives. How different that will be from the aim suggested below by Dr. Macartney, in the words which we italicize. The whole is a quotation from Dr. Patton with which Dr. Macartney closes his article. "My friends," said Dr. Patton, "we have either to go on this journey of negation and doubt to the very bottomless pit of despair or we have, to retrace our steps, and go back and back, until we rehabilitate Paul and give him his ancient place, and back and back until we come to atoning blood." Of course, these words can be so interpreted as to put life in them. But is it not clearer to say that what we want is the real Christianity of Jesus? And how different will be the effect of saying it!

The Church and the Industrial Situation

WE HAVE received a good many communications regarding Mr. Johnson's articles on the industrial situation. The articles have seemingly aroused a great deal of interest. Some of the observations upon these articles have been most commendatory and favorable; the majority of them raise questions, while some of the letters vehemently condemn the articles and their point of view, expressed or implied, and ask, What business has the Church to espouse the cause of labor any more than of capital, and why should the Church align itself with any group, workingmen or employers? "The Church is the Church of the people and should know no classes in its service and should no more have a Labor Sunday than an Employer Sunday, and should no more have delegates in a trade union meeting than in the directors' meeting of a corporation." Thus reads one letter.

It raises the whole question of the relation of the Church to the labor movement. There is no doubt that there has been considerable disposition on the part of the Church to overlook the shortcomings of labor in its zeal to remedy certain evil situations in industry and to secure just treatment, proper conditions and hours and living wages. No one can deny that there has been ample call for the Church to insist on a Christian industrial order, and if, at times, it has been over-zealous in its contact with the unions, it is natural, for often it found itself working with the union for the same ends. So long as certain abuses persist, so long must the Church work to remove them. She will protest against a twelve-hour day, and probably her battle is won here, as she has forced the steel operators to abandon these unrighteous hours. She will protest against child labor. She will insist on healthful conditions of work. She will insist on living wages and a fair return for the investment of body and brain, the capital labor puts into industry. Perhaps she will insist on labor having more share in the control of industry, democratizing it more and more, but on this there is not unanimous agreement in the Church, and just at present, although "labor's share in the control of industry" is in the social creeds of some of the churches, it is a very vague and hazy sentence. It has not proved an invariable success where tried. There are, however, three or four general principles that may be laid down as underlying the Church's attitude toward the laboring man and the labor movement.

In the first place, it should always be remembered that the Church does not exist for a class and should not ally itself with any particular group in the community. The man who asks why there should be a Labor Sunday any more than a Capital Sunday is exhibiting a natural instinct which many have felt. There might well be a Labor Sunday, but then let us have an Employers' Sunday also, for the employers' problems are just as great as those of the laboring man, and just at present much more vexatious and harassing. If our churches and ministers' associations send delegates to sit at the trades unions as fraternal delegates, well and good, but they should then have delegates sitting with the Chamber of Commerce in every community where they sit with the unions. There is no more reason for the Church being officially in one than in the other. The Church is not the Church of the rich or poor, the employer or employee, the brain-worker or hand-worker, but of the people, and should make no distinctions in its sympathies. The Roman Catholic Church has solved this problem better than have we Protestants. There rich and poor, employer and employed, kneel side by side and the moment they enter the door of the church they are all equal.

In the second place, the Church must not make the mistake, because of its deep interest in the welfare of the laboring man, of closing its eyes to the faults of the labor unions. There is a little disposition to condemn the employers generally and to praise the unions generally. As a matter of fact, there probably is just as much good in both groups and just as much evil. The motives of capitalism are often selfish, so also are the motives of the trades unions. If one attends the meetings of the corporation he is very apt to find the discussion centering upon getting everything possible out of both the workers and the public. He is apt to find just the same motive in the trades unions. If the corporation is trying to force the workers to work the longest hours for the lowest pay, the trades unions are trying to get the shortest hours and the biggest pay. One is not much more apt to hear the question of right or justice or service to the public at either gathering. Self-interest, getting the most for nothing, is just as much the motive of one group as another. It should be condemned in both groups. It is unfair to condemn the corporation for keeping a twelve-hour day at high pressure and low pay and not condemn the labor union for trying to get a six-hour day with as little work as possible at a wage utterly above the worth of the service rendered. It is unfair to condemn the coal operators for keeping up the price of coal and not to condemn the bricklayers in New York for "holding up" the city for a wage far higher than any bricklaying was ever worth. It is unfair for the Church to condemn the employers for trying to break the unions and not to condemn the unions for breaking contracts, as in the case of the pressmen in the recent strike in New York, where losses amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars fell upon innocent advertisers and merchants.

Finally, the Church must be cautious about rushing in and taking sides on questions where only experts can form right judgments. It is very seldom that in great issues between capital and labor that the right is all on one side. The recent coal strike gave much point to this truth. There are also frequent instances of where, when labor is not getting the high wages it deserves, if the increase demanded is granted, a public which is not, on the whole, as well off as the strikers, have to pay the increase. As was pointed out in the strike of the milk drivers two years ago in New York, the increase they demanded would have to be taken from the thousands on the East Side who were not getting two-thirds of the wages of the drivers. It is often a very complicated question and the Church should know all the facts before speaking. So, too, the Church must not condemn the intimidations practiced by corporations and condone those practiced by the union. So, too, it is not by any means a finally determined fact that the closed shop is always just and right, and here the Church should be wary. The closed shop is a weapon the unions have been prone to use very unjustly. So one might go on, but it can all be said again in one word: The Church is not the Church of the corporation or of the labor union; not of the employer or the employed; not of capital or labor; but of all. When it sees injustices practiced by either group it will condemn; when it sees wrongs being perpetrated, it will right them; where it finds oppression, it will speak boldly; where it sees selfishness—and we fear there is lots of it both in corporations and labor unions, about equally divided—it will boldly say that in a Christian society all men and all groups live not primarily for what they can get out of the public, but for what they can render to it in the way of service; and the chief thought of both employer and employee at this time should be not shorter hours, not less work, not exorbitant profits or exorbitant wages, but the most work, the best work, the hardest work, production on the biggest scale possible for a world trying for all these things.

The Better Possession

DURING one of the intense persecutions by which an early Roman emperor harried the Christians of the first century, some unknown writer (Harnack thinks it was a woman) wrote an extraordinary little book to hearten those who were undergoing the trial of their faith. We mean, of course, the Epistle to the Hebrews. It is marked by rare genius and by undoubted inspiration. It is full of vital messages and it contains passages of great power. Just before the most loved section of the little book—the account of the faith-heroes—the author, in a passage open to a variety of translations, refers to the fact that those to whom he is writing have suffered, and have suffered joyfully, the spoiling of their possessions, “knowing,” he says, “that you have your own selves for a better possession”—you yourselves are a better possession than any of those goods which you have lost for your faith.

We wonder if the readers fully realized the truth, or if we should to-day realize it had we suffered a similar stripping. We are very slow to take account of that type of stock. We are very keen about our own assets, but we often fail to prize this supreme ownership, the possession of ourselves. There is a story, both sad and amusing, of an insane man who was seen wildly rushing about the house, from room to room, looking in cupboards and clothes-presses, crawling under beds, obviously searching for something. When questioned as to what he was so frantically looking for he replied, “I am trying to find myself!” It is not as mad as it seems. We are not sure but that we who are not trying to find ourselves are after all more crazy still.

Old Burton, who wrote “The Anatomy of Melancholy,” well said:

Not scholars only, but all classes and conditions of men are guilty of this strange insanity. If the Duke of Westminster should offer to transfer to us his estates, we would rush with all conceivable speed to acquire our new potential possessions. We would go as with wings of an airplane to get the transaction accomplished before anything could occur to keep us from entering into our fortune. But here we are already within reach of a vastly better possession of which we are strangely negligent. If it came to a choice between himself and his outward possessions, this duke who owns so much would not hesitate a minute which to prefer. If in a crisis of illness he could save himself by surrender of his goods, they would instantly go. “Give me health and a day,” Emerson said, “and I will make the pomp of emperors ridiculous.”

What we would do in a crisis we often fail to do when no crisis confronts us, and it is a fact that too often we miss and even squander that better possession, ourselves. The best way to win it and enjoy it is to cultivate those inner experiences and endowments which make us independent of external fortune. All Christ's beatitudes attach to some inherent quality of life itself. The meek, the merciful, the pure, are “happy,” not because the external world conforms to their wishes, but because they have resources of life within themselves and have entered upon a way of life which continually opens out into more life and richer life. They have found a kind of Canaan that “comes” in continuous instalments.

One of the simplest ways to heighten the total value of life is to form a habit of appreciating the world we have here and now. It presents occasional inconveniences, no doubt, but think of the amazing donations which came to us: the tilting of the earth's axis twenty-three and a half degrees to the ecliptic by which contrivance we have our seasons; the fact that the proportion of earth and water is just right to give us a fine balance of rain and sunshine; the extraordinary way in which the entire universe submits to our mathematics so that every movement of matter and every vibration of ether conforms to laws which we formulate; the accumulation and storage of fuel and motor power, with the prospect of even greater resources of energy to be had from the unoccupied space surrounding the earth. Then, again, it cannot be a matter of unconcern that there is such a wealth of beauty lavished upon us everywhere, waiting for us to enjoy it. There is here a strange fit between the outer and the inner. The more one draws upon the beauty of the world and enjoys it, so much the more does he increase his capacity to discover and enjoy beauty. Coal and oil may become exhausted, but beauty is inexhaustible. The only trouble is that we are so limited in our range of appreciation of it. We turn to cheaper values and miss so much of this free gift of loveliness.

Greater still should be our resources of love and friendship. Nothing could be stranger or more wonderful than that in a world where struggle for existence is the law this other trait should have emerged. It is easy to explain selfishness; love is the mystery. Love forgets itself; it scorns double-entry bookkeeping; it gives, it bestows, it shares, it sacrifices without asking whether anything is coming back. And it turns out to be a fact that nothing else so enhances and increases the value of this “better possession which is ourselves.”

Even more wonderful, if that is possible, is the way we are formed and contrived to have intercourse with the Eternal. With all our material furnishings we strangely open out into the infinite and partake of a spiritual nature. God has set eternity in our hearts. We cannot win this better possession nor hold it permanently unless we exercise these spiritual capacities, which expand our being and add the richest qualities of life. “Thou hast made us for thyself,” Augustine acknowledged in his great prayer at the opening of the “Confessions,” and “we are restless until we find thee as our true rest.” It is as true now as in the fourth century. Barns and houses, lands and stocks, mortgages and bonds, do not constitute life unless one learns how to win and possess his soul and to keep that best of all possessions—himself.

In America there is one doctor for every 577 persons. In mission lands there is but one for every 2,500,000.

Dr. Hutton in a recent sermon gave this suggestive translation of one phrase of the Te Deum: “And open the kingdom of heaven to all faithful souls.” What a ray of light that lets in. And what is a believer except a faithful soul?

THE OBSERVER

The Congregationalists in Springfield

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

THE National Council of the Congregational Churches has been meeting in Springfield, Massachusetts, for the last ten days. Perhaps it was because Springfield is in the heart of New England and rich in Congregational heritage that the Council was more largely attended than usual and the meetings were of unusual interest. The Congregationalists are a fine lot. From the days of Plymouth Rock to to-day they have possessed New England. Their descendants settled certain parts of the Middle West and in these regions they are strong. Congregationalism has always believed in loving the Lord with all one's mind as well as with all one's soul and has paid much attention to cultivating the intellectual life. New England is full of colleges founded by Congregationalists—Bowdoin, Dartmouth, Harvard, Amherst, Williams and Yale. Many of our great philosophers, essayists and theologians, have come from their ranks. What a list of names Congregationalism in New England can boast of: Edwards, Hopkins, Parks, Bushnell, Bacon, the Smyths, Harris, Porter, Munger, Gordon—the list could be extended over the page if one were to go out of New England. It has always produced great preachers. Besides those just mentioned among the scholars, there are Finney, Beecher, Abbott, Gunsaulus, Moody, Mackenzie, Storrs, Meredith, a long list, and we are not referring to those still with us, who rank as the greatest preachers in the land.

The meetings at Springfield have been distinguished by great directness. There was a certain glory in the meetings of twenty years ago when one sat under the magic spell of the great orators. Every day had one or two great orations and we basked in their brilliance. There is not quite so much of this as of yore although there are, of course, great speeches made to-day. There is much more time given to discussions and the addresses are almost entirely in the nature of applying the Gospel to the great national and world problems. Missions had the prominent position they have always held, and the meetings of the various mission boards are now held in conjunction with the Council meetings. Indeed, they are a part of the larger gathering. Much attention was devoted to the part the United States should play in solving the international problems vexing the world. The enforcement of the prohibition law was urged at many meetings. The Christianizing of the industrial order was emphasized in many sessions. The problem of Christian Unity was thoroughly discussed and there was unusual interest in it because of the recent open correspondence between Dr. Newman Smyth and Bishop Brewster, of Connecticut, and the advances of the Presbyterians to the Congregationalists. The relations to the Federal Council of Churches were thoroughly threshed out, with the result that they are closer than ever now. The Council paid very high tribute to the work of the Federal Council. The Council has always taken high and firm stand on the ground of race-equality and reaffirmed its convictions on this point. Evidently the questions of Fundamentalism and Evolution do not greatly trouble the Congregationalists, for they were hardly once referred to. The Council had too great tasks of Christianizing the world to spend its time discussing the biological ancestry of man or theological questions where great liberty of interpretation should be allowed to those who earnestly believe the Gospel. Some of the addresses were of singular loftiness and breadth of vision and all concerned with demanding that all spheres of human relationships should be brought under the Christian principle. The Council sermon by Dr. S. Parkes Cadman was one of the most prophetic and statesmanlike utterances the Council has ever heard. (It will soon appear in THE CHRISTIAN WORK I hope.)

The two things that especially interested me were the discussions on Christian Unity and those on world relationships. The Commission on Christian Unity plainly expressed its discouragement at the failure to get far with the Episcopalians. The Concordat had aroused great hopes, but the feeling had plainly come over the Council that further negotiations with the Episcopalians were hopeless while they insisted on ordination into a particular sect instead of the Catholic Church as an essential. The Congregationalists do not ordain a minister to the Congregational Church or churches, but to the universal Church. The Episcopalians still insist on ordination into their own communion. A Congregational minister cannot see why he should be re-ordained into any sect, Episcopal, Methodist, Lutheran or Roman, when he has been ordained into the Universal Church of Christ, the one holy, Catholic Church. Indeed, he does not look favorably on being ordained into any one communion, even his own. He often has hands of several communions laid upon his head. The Concordat was laid upon the table, and there seems nothing more to do so far as the American Episcopalians are concerned until they recognize the orders of the Congregationalists as valid. On the other hand, the overtures of the Presbyterians were received with great enthusiasm and heartily welcomed and the proper authorities instructed to proceed to negotiate with the Committee of the General Assembly looking toward speedy consummation of the plans. It was noticeable that there was much more interest among the delegates in union with the Presbyterians than with the Episcopalians. There seemed to be a very widespread sympathy with Dr. William E. Barton when he said he considered it an insult to have his ordination questioned by one relatively small communion, when it was recognized by the other forty million Protestants of the Nation.

The other things that greatly interested me was the recurring demand that the United States abandon her policy of isolation and associate herself with the other nations of the world in the solution of the baffling problems facing civilization, especially that of establishing good-will and peace. Practically every speaker urged it. What was most significant of all was that the Council passed not only a resolution calling upon our country to become a signatory to the World Court, but to either join the League of Nations or find some better way of association. The perplexing thing is that one National Christian body after another passes such a resolution, but nothing seems to be done. It looks as though the Churches of the nation wanted America to become an integral part of the world family; yet Presidents and Senates insist that the American people have no such desires.

President Coolidge was made an honorary president of the Council, whereupon he immediately joined the Congregational Church in Washington, to qualify for this new office, so to speak

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Survival of Faith

By Rev. Richard Roberts, M.A., D.D.

Minister of the American Presbyterian Church, Montreal

"When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?"—Luke 18:8.

IMAGINE that most of us have stood and pondered over this verse. Was it a passing mood of pessimism? Was it a momentary failure of nerve? Or was it perhaps pure weariness of mind and body, the sort of condition in which we all sink into doubt and misgiving about the future? Or was it a deliberate expression of an abiding and reasoned conviction? At first sight, it seems somewhat strange that Jesus, whose faith in God was so sure and serene, should have had any doubts. But, plainly, it is one thing to have faith in God and quite another to have faith in man. And, explain this how you will, it does reflect a scepticism about human nature. Obviously, Jesus did not believe in progress—in the inevitability of human perfection. This passage itself is enough to prove that Jesus did not think that the world would necessarily grow better and finer. And the sooner we rid ourselves of the nineteenth century myth of progress the better for us and for the world. "Always toward perfection is the mighty movement," cried Herbert Spencer in a dithyrambic moment, and because the prediction was made in the name of Science we swallowed it whole, not knowing that science no less than religion could have its superstitions. The doctrine of evolution was extended into the theory that there was an irresistible force behind us driving us onward to some indefinable splendor of perfection; and the entirely sound doctrine of human perfectibility was transfigured into the wholly false doctrine of the certainty of human perfection. And in those days there were some sanctions for the illusion. Great strides were actually being made in knowledge and invention; it did seem as though the growth of modern science, with its continuous conquest of the world of nature, indicated a mighty forward movement of so great promise as to persuade us that its momentum was inexhaustible—we lacked realism of insight; for while all this alleged progress was going on before our eyes we were so dazzled by it that we forgot to take account of things that were going on out of sight. And it took the terrible apocalypse of war to show us that all this time we were living in a fool's paradise. For, with all its external progress, the world was growing rottener at heart; with all its mechanical and physical triumphs, it was in a condition of spiritual and moral decadence. Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, speaking of the present state of the world, says in a recently published book: "This is not a collapse of the European Faith caused by the war; it is collapse revealed by the war." For us of this generation, to whom the confusion and sorrow of nearly ten years have shown beyond forgetting the perverseness and stupidity of human nature, and who will carry the scars of its Nemesis upon our souls to the grave, it should not be difficult to enter into the thought of Jesus when He asked His ominous question, "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith upon the earth?"

Hith the word "progress" went another which we did not sufficiently examine—the word "civilization." There is, to be sure, nothing wrong with the word; the mischief is in the sort of content we have given it. A recent writer draws a distinction between civilization and culture. Culture, he says, "is the complex of all the inner and spiritual values of mankind (religion, art, philosophy)," and "civilization is the sum of all the external values (industry, technics, trade, politics, and so forth)." He goes on to point out that culture and civilization do not necessarily go together, and gives instances of races which have had a high culture with a meager civilization, and of others which have had a great civilization with a relatively low culture. And his conclusion is that "the hidden drama of history is an everlasting struggle between the external and the inner values of mankind, a struggle between matter and spirit, between culture and civilization." In this struggle the odds are in favor of the outer as against the inner, in favor of civilization as against culture. This, I think, is only a modern way of saying what was in the mind of Jesus; and it is borne out by what students of the history of civilization tell us. Newman, you will remember, held that a civilization began in an age of faith, thence passed into an age of analysis and scepticism, and finally reached an age of materialism. The force of the inner cultural impulse is worn down by the attrition of reason and sense. Faith is hard put to it to survive. And that is not difficult to explain. We are creatures of sense living in a world of things. The objects of faith are remote, impalpable and imponderable, while the objects of sense are immediate and easily got at. Faith implies a continuous effort of thought and will to transcend the immediate; and there is in mankind a natural inertia which resists this effort and takes easily and comfortably to the line of least resistance. So little by little the impulse of faith loses its momentum and we drift to the flesh-pots.

Now this was the very danger that Jesus had in His mind in the parable of the importunate widow, to which this question is a postscript. If the stubbornness of the judge with the hard faith and the hard heart could be broken down by the pertinacity of a poor widow, do you think that God will not vindicate His own faithful children? You can, He insists, count upon God to justify those who put their trust in Him, to vindicate those who live in the Spirit and wait for His Kingdom. If human nature at its worst (and the picture of the impious and inhuman judge is meant to suggest that) can be prevailed upon to redress a grievance by the sheer importunity of an injured and friendless widow, then it stands to reason that God will not allow those who look to Him to be confounded. There is a word in the parable which seems to involve an inconsistency. "I tell you He will avenge them speedily." "Speedily," you will observe. Now in the parable the point is plainly that the dilatoriness of the judge is overcome by the perseverance of the widow; and that is intended to cover the fact that God also takes His time about vindicating the faith of the elect. That is indeed one of the commonplaces of the religious experience, that God has not always come to the rescue of His own speedily. He seems to take His time about it; and that is why the effort of faith becomes so heavy to maintain. That was the ground of the Jewish pessimism in Babylon; it is the central point of the Book of Job. And all through the ages persons and peoples in long-continued distress have echoed and re-echoed the Psalmist's cry, "How long? O Lord, how long?" So that it is not true to experience to say that God is sure to vindicate His elect "speedily." Either the word has crept in by some inadvertence or we are to take it as signifying that, though the vindication may be delayed, yet when it does come it will be swift and summary. And the problem of the elect is how they are to last it out until the vindication comes.

But before I come to that I want to say a word about the realism of Jesus. He had no illusions about human nature. He knew what was in man and needed that no man should tell Him. He told men that there was a good time coming; the kingdom of heaven, He said, is at hand. But it was with none of that shallow optimism which sings that "there's a good time coming" anyhow, and bids us wait until the clouds roll by. The clouds that overhang human life will not roll by unless we start them rolling; and the kingdom of heaven comes only to those who repent. You can take God's friendliness, His willingness and readiness for granted; you can count upon that with the most complete confidence. But what Jesus evidently could not count upon was human nature. Not, indeed, that He ever went to the other extreme of stupid, sentimental pessimism, which regards human nature as essentially bad and holds that you cannot change it. Human nature can change; it is changing all the time; and if it is not changing for the better it is changing for the worse. Of nothing in the world can you say with more assurance that it changes than you can say it of human nature. And it is either improving or deteriorating; the one thing it cannot do is to remain static. But it is not at all sure that the final change in mankind will be for the better. It can be and it may be; but whether it will no one can tell. And Jesus did not try to tell. He came to redeem mankind; but would mankind allow itself to be redeemed? He came to bring in the Kingdom of God; but would mankind admit the Kingdom into their hearts? And to that question He offered no answer. He believed in the perfectibility of man; but He did not, for He could not, affirm the certainty of human perfection. This is a region in which you cannot count on evolution or progress; for man is the arbiter of his own fate. God made him free and put the choice in his own hands. Here there is neither certainty nor inevitability; and Jesus did not suffer Himself to be deceived. He said that there was a doubt; but He also believed that there was a hope. And that is the only position which a man who faces all the facts of life can take up. And to-day as we see how little men have assimilated the wisdom that the war made plain as daylight, and how the peoples are still building the house of life on the old rotten foundations, are we unreasonable if we believe with Jesus that the destiny of mankind is still in doubt?

In the end, however, we shall have to answer for ourselves, not for mankind. It is indeed true that the circle of our responsibility has a wider radius than we suppose; we are our brothers' keepers to a much greater extent than we commonly recognize. But even then our central and critical responsibility lies in what we do with ourselves, whether we keep faith with the Son of man; and the answer is within our own choice. We can keep the faith if we will. But, all the same, it is not an easy matter. For faith has to make an endless fight for its life against sense and reason. It has to maintain itself in the face of the confusion and sorrow and distress of life. And if it is left to shift for itself, the pressure of the immediate and outward facts of life will, soon or late, surely put it out of business. Faith can only survive by continual reaffirmation; if we are to save it alive, we shall have to go out of our way, to take time and trouble to declare ourselves for it. We dare not let it go unwatched and untended. Sense and reason will crowd it out if they can; and when that threatens to happen, and sense and reason are outstepping their province, then we must needs affirm our faith in their teeth, but always taking care that faith for its own sake neither denies nor flouts them nor drives them out of their legitimate places. The facts of life may sometimes threaten to overwhelm our faith; and then faith must nail its colors to the mast in the face of them. And not only in such emergencies as these—when faith is hard beset—but at all times must we take pains to affirm our faith. For even deadlier than the crises and the contradictions of life is the slow, imperceptible attrition of the daily round. Jack London, in one of his stories, tells of some people in the Arctic Circle who could not see the sun because of the bulge of the earth; and against the bulge of the world, which is always too much with us, we must continually constrain faith to bear its testimony to the unseen Sun of our souls. So we must provide for it in the plan of our lives. The reinforcement and nurture of faith cannot be left to odd moments and to our loose ends of time. In the sort of life we moderns live faith will be surely crowded out if we do not make for it a place and keep that place inviolate. The idea of the "retreat" springs out of a perfectly sound understanding of the psychology of the inner life; the soul must have its retreats if faith is to live. You remember the seed that fell among thorns; it sprouted, but in that hedge-row there was a struggle for existence, and the sensitive, slender shoot had no chance. And that is a parable of the crowded life we lead. The Word of God is sown in us, and it sprouts in a frail and tender plant of faith. And tough shrubs of secular interest crowd in upon it and choke it so that it withers and dies. So some ground must be cleared and reserved for it. Faith is always under sentence of death in the soul which has no trysting-place with the Unseen.

And this trysting-place must be sacred and inviolate—the soul's private domain that is not to be invaded or appropriated by any other concern whatsoever. An hour, or half an hour, or even a quarter, staked out in some part of the day and kept religiously to its purpose, when the soul can gather itself together and return to the base of its life, and that becomes as strong a habit as your lunch hour—that is what I mean by clearing the ground for faith. And remember that perseverance, steadfastness, is of the very essence of the matter. We must regard it for what it is—grave, momentous business not to be lightly intruded upon; and we must not suppose any secular call to be of so great urgency as to entitle us to neglect it. More, I think, depends—not alone for ourselves, but for the world—than we can think, on our acquiring this habit of the daily retreat of the soul; for our own quickened faith will be a contagious thing, quickening the faith of others. I do not forget that our Sunday worship is also a retreat of the soul; and we come to the Sacrament as to a trysting-place with the Unseen; and all this should go to the renewal of faith “until He come.” But beneath and before all our common trysting-places we must, first of all, re-create the soul’s own sanctuary, its own daily resort into the secret place of the Most High. But, having arrived there, what will it do? There is indeed plenty to do, as we shall find when we become familiar with the ground. But chiefly this, I imagine; we shall recollect—gather together in our thought those grounds of faith that the day’s work may overlay and drive out of our remembrance. We shall think of Jesus—that one clear, unsetting star above the confusion of life; we shall think of the cross, of its judgment upon our worldly standards and our secular blindness, and its unveiling of the divine compassion upon our human failures. We shall think of saints and prophets who esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. We shall think of the great travail of God in creation and in the evolution of life, and of the splendor of that purpose for which He created the soul of man—that purpose which is obstructed by the per-versity of man. We shall lift up our eyes on high and dwell in thought upon the vast spaces of a divine providence that sustains this scheme of things, silent and unsleeping. We shall turn the pages of Holy Writ and find, here and there, a word that opens a window upon immeasurable reaches of life, stretching out far beyond the horizons of sight and sense. And out of its recollection the soul will stand up and declare its faith:

I believe in the love of God through Jesus Christ;
 I believe in the Cross of Calvary as the ground plan of the universe;
 I believe in the transcendental meaning and hope of life;
 I believe that the true goods of life lie in the unseen, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, and where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt nor thieves break through and steal;
 I believe that the real values of life are the good, the true and the beautiful;
 I believe in the salvability and the immortality of every man; and in the infinite value of every living soul;
 I believe in the practicability of the Kingdom of God, and in my freedom to choose it and to work for it;
 I believe in the sacramental quality of my day’s work, and that I may see and serve God in it;
 I believe in a grace that can overcome my selfishness and my pride, that will enable me to overcome temptation, and upon which I need never call in vain;
 I believe in love as the final law of life;
 And in this faith, by the help of God, I mean to live this day and all my days.

And, men and women, believe me, it is altogether impossible for you or for me to measure what difference such a daily act of faith may make to our days and to those with whom we have to do. And best of all is this, that whether the master of the house comes at even or at midnight or at cockcrow or in the morning, he shall find us unsleeping, with the banner of our faith flying bravely in the breeze. And whether we shall be of this company of unsundered faith or not, it is for us ourselves to say.

The World Court and the World Peace

By Professor Manley O. Hudson

[In preparation for the observance of the week ending with Armistice Sunday as World Court Week we last week published a discussion of the Court’s function by ex-Attorney General Wickersham. We herewith print two further articles on the Court, written from different angles. Professor Hudson, who is now a member of the faculty of the Harvard Law School, was a member of various peace commissions at the Paris Peace Conference, member of the legal section of the Provisional Secretariat of the League of Nations, and he was legal adviser to the International Labor Conference at Washington in 1919 and at Genoa in 1920. It would be hard to find any man in America better fitted to discuss the World Court. Dr. Ainslie, author of the second article, in addition to being pastor of the Christian Temple of Baltimore, is editor of the “Christian Union Quarterly,” a trustee of the Carnegie Church Peace Union and a member of the Executive Committee of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches.]

IT IS quite unnecessary to exaggerate the importance of the International Court in establishing and maintaining the peace of the world. If it serves no more than the convenience of the nations in handling their every-day affairs it amply justifies its existence and it amply justifies the support of the United States.

Our national courts perform many functions. Among others, they serve the convenience of those who are engaged, in the conduct of public or private affairs. Similarly, the International Court as an authoritative interpreter of the world’s treaties, of which every country now has a great many, will serve the convenience of the nations in the conduct of the world’s affairs. Twelve treaties were recently entered into at the Central American Conference, six treaties were made at the Washington Conference on Armaments, some ten were signed at Lausanne. All of this body of treaty law calls for some court to interpret and apply it.

But it is not simply as an instrument for the better ordering of our international polity that the new court exists. It also has a very definite function in connection with maintaining the peace.

It is quite true that most of the disputes which arise and which will be submitted to the Court are likely to be disputes of a highly technical character and not calculated to lead to war. To date the new Court has been called upon to give eight opinions. Not one of these involved a question likely to lead to war. All of them involved the interpretation of treaties and the settlement of questions about which technical difficulties had arisen.

But the existence of the Court is an important factor for the foreign offices of the world to take into account in connection with their major political disputes. Those disputes may not turn on differences relating to legal questions. They may have to be settled by a process of conference and conciliation, for which the Court is not adapted.

But even the most political of disputes is likely to involve some question of a legal character, and when the parties are sincerely desirous of maintaining the peace they are glad to have at hand an instrument for the settlement of these legal questions. Disputants are frequently glad to have an avenue for gaining time and cooling off public opinion in this way. The existence of the Court and public confidence in its impartiality will mean that such legal questions will be referred to it for adjudication.

It is clear, therefore, that the Court is indispensable to the process of maintaining peace, though at times its contribution may be indirect. The role of the Court is not wholly unlike the role of our national courts with reference to industrial disputes, which must sometimes be settled by other agencies.

This can be illustrated by the controversy over the Ruhr. That controversy is essentially political, and the determining factors have little to do with anything so barren as the interpretation of language in a legal document. But a legal question is also involved, and the discussion of it has only increased the bitterness aroused by the whole controversy. If that question should be referred to the Court it might serve to clear up one of the points of difference.

Another illustration is the Corfu incident. This is primarily political also. But it involved a number of legal questions which have been discussed at every stage of the controversy, and with reference to which a great deal of animosity has been developed. Perhaps some of these questions will yet go before the Permanent Court of International Justice.

The determination of a disputed question of fact, as well as the proper interpretation of a treaty upon which a situation depends, may make it possible for peace to prevail where there would otherwise be war. It is this which makes the Permanent Court of International Justice an important part of the world's machinery for keeping the peace. The Court will not be competent to handle the larger issues which divide peoples. Other machinery now exists for these, and ought to have American support. But the Court will always be competent to handle the legal questions growing out of those issues in such a way as to add to the store of good-will and friendly feeling essential to preventing war.

Too much should not be expected of an international court. It is composed of lawyers who can do a first-rate lawyer's job. It is not composed of politicians or diplomats, whose work is also essential.

Justice according to law can only be adequate when the law itself is adequate, or when people are willing that new law should be found by disinterested men. Other agencies of compromise or conciliation for adjustment are essential. But an international court is an indispensable foundation of any plan for a governed world.

The Permanency of the World Court

By Rev. Peter Ainslie, D.D.

Pastor of the Christian Temple, Baltimore

THE World Court has been on the way since the establishment of Christianity. Its first evangelists were the early Christians. Many of these paid for their evangelization by martyrdom. On the Christian party getting the majority in the Senate in the year 416 and passing the absurd law that no one could enlist in the Roman army but Christians all idea of adjusting international disputes by reason rather than by physical force was completely obscured for a thousand years.

Hugo Grotius was the earliest evangelist for this cause in modern times. His masterpiece on "The Rights of War and Peace" appeared in 1625. Other advocates followed. America was a pioneer in this cause from the very birth of the Republic. The Jay Treaty, 1794-95, marks the beginning of official arbitration among nations, although the Treaty of Paris (1783) between the United States and England opened the way. Out of the war of 1812 the Treaty of Ghent provided for the continuation of this policy, which resulted in adjusting many difficult international disputes. Perhaps the most outstanding monument to international arbitration is the three thousand mile boundary line between the United States and Canada without a fortress on either side. In the years that followed England had seventy cases adjusted by arbitration, the United States had fifty-six, France twenty-six, Chile twenty six and other nations a lesser number.

Among the great names in the United States that stood actively for this policy were David Dudley Field, author of "Outlines of an International Code"; Blaine, Hay, Root, Roosevelt, Bryan, and others. Hay's venture of returning the Boxer indemnity to China was a decided advance for better international understanding which has been followed since by other nations.

The Court of Arbitration, which grew out of The Hague Tribunal, called at the instance of Nicholas II of Russia in 1899, made a new epoch in adjusting international disputes. Holland gave the land for the site of the Peace Palace and

Andrew Carnegie gave the money for the erection of the building, while all the nations of the world gave the furnishings. From the time of hearing the first case, which came from Mexico in 1902, to the outbreak of the World War in 1914, as many as 627 cases were heard by the Court and decisions given, from which, in no instance, was an appeal ever taken.

After these years of preparation the setting up of the Court of International Justice for business in 1922 was as logical as the sum of an ordinary problem in mathematics. It simply could not have been held back other than by some unknown process, to have turned back the thought of the world in international affairs. It was an evolutionary necessity. If the World War hastened its fulfillment, it certainly did not create it. Two thousand years' history was back of it, and especially a hundred years of immediate preparation.

It is as silly to attempt to undervalue the Court of International Justice as it was for those obscure and forgotten American statesmen to fight the Supreme Court of the United States in the early years of its history. American partisanship may make America appear paradoxical in the eyes of an intelligent world, but as great as America is, America is not great enough to abolish the Court of International Justice; nor will we think for a moment that the intelligence of America will favor substituting the battlefield for the court in matters of international dispute. It would be the greatest instance in human history, of assault on law and order, for which there is neither reason nor right.

Historically and logically, the strongest voices in the world for the Court of International Justice—and a multitude of them—ought to come from America, but instead they are from England, Asia and South America. The issue is very clear. Shall we make elaborate preparation for another great war, which military men tell us will be vastly more destructive of life and property than the recent World War? Or shall we make extensive preparation for taking our cases of international dispute to the Court of International Justice, where reason rises superior to brute force? It looks as though civilization ought to have advanced far enough to make impossible this issue to be even debatable.

There is a national conscience for adjusting personal disputes in national courts of justice in all nations. In cases of two men or two corporations having a dispute, no one but an outlaw thinks of taking the law in his hands; but instead the whole community is of one mind that the case in dispute should be settled by the courts. There was a time when our forbears thought otherwise and resorted to savagery. But humanity has now grown to recognize law and order in the affairs of national life, and so we have courts for adjusting our disputes.

Has the time not come when our civilization is strong enough to put into international conscience what it has put into national conscience? It is a public conscience that upholds our national courts; it must be an international conscience that upholds the Court of International Justice. When we take the step we shall have gone a long way toward abolishing the method of savagery in adjusting international disputes and toward adopting the method of civilization in their adjustment by reason and justice.

International disputes are inevitable in a world where there are differences in race, nationality and temperament. The only proper adjustment of a dispute—whether it be personal, national or international—is by reason, never by physical force. The Court of International Justice is here with a judiciary the equal of any judiciary in the world.

Since June, 1922, many cases have gone before it for trial. Several have been typical war cases. The Court's decisions have been accepted by the nations involved. There are nations, however, that have refused to send their cases to the Court of International Justice, as in some instances individuals in America have refused to send their cases to the national courts, but have taken the law in their own hands, adopting the outlaw policy. But such a course does not do away with the national courts. They continue to function.

It is so in the instance of the Court of International Justice. It is as truly functioning in the field of international disputes as the Supreme Court of the United States is functioning in the field of national affairs. Our immediate task is to create an international conscience for the support of the Court of International Justice as we have created a national conscience for the support of the Supreme Court of the United States. The issue involves a step in civilization which the centuries have been preparing for us. Are we willing to take the step?

Prohibition Facts

By Rev. F. Ernest Johnson

Director, Research Bureau of the Research Department, the Federal Council of Churches

The following is the report on prohibition facts presented by Mr. Johnson at the great Citizenship Conference in Washington this month. The report is the result of the work of a "Fact-Finding Commission" consisting of men trained in social research appointed by the Federal Council's Research Bureau.

THE first thing to be said about the enforcement of the prohibition law is that it is not a new problem. Prior to the adoption of prohibition the Commissioner of Internal Revenue included in his annual report a statement regarding the extent of illicit distilling as evidenced by the number of seizures of stills. The following is from the 1912 report:

Illicit distilling and "bootlegging" continue without sign of abatement. During the past fiscal year practically the same number of illicit plants were seized and destroyed as during the previous fiscal year. Two thousand four hundred and sixty-five were seized and captured during the year just closed, as against 2,488 the previous year.

If the license system was exceedingly hard to enforce, it was to be expected that the prohibition of the liquor traffic would tremendously intensify this problem.

The necessity for the present survey of conditions with respect to the enforcement of prohibition was occasioned by the fact that while several agencies are, and have been, commendably employed in the effort to influence public opinion favorably to prohibition and thus to assist in the enforcement of the law, it appears that no independent research has been undertaken on an adequate scale. It is hardly fair that propaganda agencies engaged in fighting the liquor traffic should be called upon to do the research work, which requires a certain amount of detachment from propaganda effort. Much valuable material has been gathered, however, and used by the fact-finding commission, appointed in connection with the Citizenship Conference.

Our first task was to put statisticians at work analyzing the available data, which included material in the hands of such agencies as the Scientific Temperance Federation, the Anti-Saloon League, the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals, the Federal Bureau of Internal Revenue, and the Prohibition Unit, the Bureau of Census, the Department of Commerce, and so forth. Our inquiry also included agencies working against prohibition. We undertook first to determine, so far as possible, the extent of the actual violations of the law. The findings of this subject may be grouped under three heads.

I. SMUGGLING

The only measure of smuggling, which is of course but a partial one, is found in the importations of liquor to territory contiguous to the United States, manifestly for smuggling purposes, together with the increase in manufacture of liquors in such territory which might likewise be presumed to have an outlet over the American border. We discovered that the importations of spiritous liquors from Great Britain and Ireland into the Bahama Islands had increased from almost nothing in 1918 to 160,000 proof gallons in 1921. After our data were compiled the British Premier made the statement that the figures for 1922 were twice those of 1921. The absolute significance of these figures is, to be sure, not very large, but they indicate the great extent of smuggling activities on a comparatively small base. We also secured figures on the importation from Spain to Cuba of low grade brandies, which indicated a similar increase. The total imports of distilled spirits from Great Britain into territory contiguous to the United States (Canada, Newfoundland and coast of Labrador, Bermuda, Bahamas, British West Indies, Cuba and Mexico) increased from about 180,000 gallons in 1918 to over 2,000,000 gallons in 1920. Prior to 1918 the trend had been steadily downward for several years. In 1921 these imports fell off again to 1,600,000 gallons; but even so, the total was in excess of the imports for any year since 1913 with the exception of 1920. An apparently significant fact was brought out in our inquiry with respect to Canada, namely, the inability or unwillingness of the Canadian government officials to give us figures on production of liquors in that country over a period of years. This is obviously an important element in the situation. In reply to our request for these figures we were given the data on the manufacture of grape juice. Thus far we have not secured the relevant facts. We have the official export figures, but the people whose doings we are looking into do not report to the customs office.

We are led to believe, however, that the aggregate of smuggled liquors is smaller by comparison with the amount of liquor consumed in the United States prior to prohibition than has been commonly supposed. An estimate of the Brewers' Association, which probably may be taken as an outside figure, puts the amount of liquor now smuggled into the country at not more than ten per cent. of the consumption of liquors prior to the prohibition period.

II. WITHDRAWALS OF BONDED LIQUOR FROM WAREHOUSES

Our study of the statistics on this subject gave gratifying corroboration to the statement submitted to the Citizenship Conference by Commissioner Haynes. The amount of liquors annually withdrawn has decreased from the "peak" figure of 160,000,000 gallons in 1917 to about 11,000,000 gallons in 1923. This is due undoubtedly to two causes: the activities of the Enforcement Unit and the steady depletion of the stocks of liquors in these warehouses which may be assumed to operate, by increasing the price so as to limit automatically the withdrawal of liquors for illicit purposes. The record shows that the amount of liquors remaining in such warehouses decreased from over 285,000,000 gallons in 1914 to less than 45,000,000 gallons in 1923.

III. THE DOMESTIC MANUFACTURE OF ILLICIT LIQUORS

It is under this head that the chief menace is encountered. It should be said first, however, that there is no doubt that the production and consumption of beer has fallen off tremendously. Few people realize that beer constituted about ninety per cent. by volume of the amount of liquor consumed in the country in pre-prohibition days. Even the Brewers' Association figures that eighty per cent. of the beer production has been done away with. The actual amount now produced is probably well within the twenty per cent. estimate which they have made. There are many indications that the working population, which accounted for a very large part of the beer consumption, is drinking very much less, although as yet we have no measure of the reduction. The present law permits the manufacture of beer on a large scale as a part of the process of making "near beer." A desperate effort has been made by some of the brewers to build up a trade in these beer substitutes. It appears that one-third of them are still operating on this basis. It may be assumed that among these are the largest, most powerful breweries, and this means that very extensive vested interests are still arrayed against prohibition and are maintaining their status in the hope, and apparently in the expectation, that the law will be modified so as to allow the manufacture of beer, which they insist is a non-intoxicating beverage. "Brewed exactly as before" has been a familiar advertisement, used to keep familiar brands before the public eye. It tells the literal truth. The beer is made exactly as before, but under the restriction that the excessive alcoholic content must be distilled off before the beer leaves the premises. This opens the way, very obviously, to violations of the law. It is probable, however, that such violations have not been so extensive as might be supposed, because of the fact that a large brewing concern is relatively easy to watch, and because it is to the interest of the brewers in their campaign for a modification of the Volstead Act not to run too visibly foul of the law or to put themselves under the ban of public sentiment as flagrant lawbreakers.

The extent of the illicit manufacture of wines is one important element in the inquiry with which we have thus far made little headway. It is perfectly evident that an enormous traffic in grapes has developed, but in the absence of census figures since 1920 it is difficult to make adequate estimates. Since that date only carload shipments are given. This subject requires further intensive study. It should be pointed out, however, that the home manufacture of wine is no new phenomenon. There are certain groups among our urban population with whom home manufacture of wine is a fixed custom which can be broken only with great difficulty.

The traffic in "hootch" or "moonshine" whisky is probably the most serious of all the violations of the law. It is possible to secure this bootleg liquor quite generally in cities and particularly along the Atlantic seaboard. While little credence can be given to unsubstantiated tales of the prevalence of bootlegging, it is sufficiently clear that in some cities it has reached the proportions of an "industry." In Boston, for example, a number of experienced social workers reported that since the prohibition law was passed there has been a distinct improvement in the standard of living of many families in their communities traceable directly to the profits of bootlegging.

Very little has been done so far to determine among what social groups and to what extent drinking has increased. It seems safe to say, however, that many young people are drinking who did not drink before, and that in certain social circles women are drinking much more than formerly. At the same time, there is some statistical evidence (which needs to be further supplemented) showing that within communities where drinking is very prevalent the family men account for less of it than "detached" men. In this connection the records of the Massachusetts Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children are interesting. The 1922 report of the Society contains the following passage:

For many years our reports have deplored the destructive influence of intemperance upon family life. It still exists, but, thanks to national prohibition, to a far less degree. In 1916, a prosperous pre-war year, intemperance was second on our list and appeared in 47.7 per cent. of our cases. In 1921 it had decreased to 16.8 per cent., or a little less than one-third. In 1922 it has increased to 20.2 per cent., but still has an incidence of less than one-half of that before national prohibition.

The most disquieting feature of our investigation was the discovery of what we call the "typical curve" showing the consequences of prohibition in terms of the number of deaths from alcoholism and cirrhosis of the liver, in cases of alcoholic psychoses and in other indices. Generally speaking, the trend prior to prohibition was gradually down, but with the enactment of prohibition there was a sharp drop. In each case, however, the curve reached its lowest point in 1920, the first full year of national prohibition, and since that time there has been a marked rise in these several indices of the extent of liquor drinking. It is also in point that such figures as have been compiled by the Anti-Saloon League, the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals, and by Judge Gemmil, of Chicago, on arrests for drunkenness in cities, when compared year by year, show the same general curve between 1919 and 1923. To be sure, the rise in arrests for intoxication may always be taken to indicate two wholly different facts: an actual increase of cases of intoxication upon the one hand and an increased activity in apprehending such cases on the other. There is no reason, however, to think that throughout the country there has been any general tightening up on the part of local officials with respect to apprehension of intoxicated persons, and therefore the marked rise in the number of arrests for intoxication can only be taken to indicate an actual increase in heavy drinking since 1920. In no case, however, do these curves show that we have approximated the condition which prevailed prior to the enactment of the prohibition laws.

Further confirmation of the "typical curve" appears in figures compiled by the Family Welfare Society of Boston. The total number of cases assisted in which intemperance was a factor stood at 984 in 1916-17; fell to seventy-one in 1919-20; held practically steady for a year, and rose to 278 in 1922-23.

In other words, the indications from such data as we have been able to study are that we made a fairly good demonstration in 1920 of the enforcibility of the prohibition law, but that at the present time we are unmistakably approaching, in certain areas, a nullification of the Eighteenth Amendment.

The "Fact-Finding Commission" plans to continue its activities through the Research Department of the Federal Council of Churches and is planning for (1) some specific industrial studies; (2) an inquiry into conditions in secondary schools in certain States where the co-operation of the State Department of Education has been secured; (3) an inquiry into the extent of drinking in the colleges and the attitude of students toward the law; (4) a study of the social consequences of prohibition in cities, with the aid of social workers throughout the country (this study is now under way and is proceeding well). In this connection the recent statement made to us by Mr. Payson Smith, Commissioner of Education in Massachusetts, was somewhat startling. He stated that in the colleges with which he was in closest touch he believed there was an overwhelming sentiment among the student body against the prohibition law, and that the colleges are filled with propaganda designed to create this attitude.

Our survey has made it evident that the problem of making prohibition effective is much more than an enforcement problem. The law is being violated not merely by criminally-minded people, but by a very large portion of the most conservative and otherwise respectable of our people. These violators of the law include judges of the higher state courts, prominent lawyers without number, and persons in excellent standing in social and church circles. This respectable patronage of the traffic makes it possible for bootleggers to ply their trade almost openly and in many cases without any apparent consciousness that they are engaged in a reprehensible business. Although much is said about the observance of the law for its own sake, it is undoubtedly true that large numbers of our people, and perhaps lawyers more than any other single group, consider that the Volstead Act and even the Eighteenth Amendment have not in any sense the same status as have the provisions of the common law relating to criminal acts. It is evident that such people must be won to a voluntary observance of the law if it is to be made effective, since it is scarcely possible to arrest all the attendants at an annual bar association meeting where liquor flows as freely as before prohibition days.

On the other hand, the enforcement problem itself is one of the major elements of the present situation. On the face of it, the enforcement organization is anomalous. The chief line of responsibility extends from the President, through the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to the Prohibition Unit which is organized under that commission. This is due to the fact that in pre-prohibition days the Bureau of Internal Revenue had developed a very successful machinery and technique for apprehending violators of the excise laws. It was thought best to leave the enforcement of the prohibition law in the same hands. Prosecution of violators is of course in the hands of the Department of Justice. This division of responsibility raises an obvious question as to the efficiency of the present scheme. When the prohibition law was enacted the then Secretary of the Treasury, Carter Glass, protested against the arrangement. The attitude of the present Secretary of the Treasury on this point appears not to be a matter of record. But it is commonly stated, and supported by a great deal of evidence, that the prohibition law at the present time is not wholly in the hands of its friends.

Is This Worth While?

By William Willard Howard

CAME into the reception room of Anne Louise Howard on the border of Bolshevik Russia a young woman; bright and clear of eye, rosy and round of countenance, brisk and graceful of gesture—came smiling, with outstretched hands and pleasant words of greeting—a shining vision of imperishable youth and hope and well-being.

In the five seconds during which I rose, stepped forward and took the welcoming hands I searched in vain the card-index of memory for some clue to the identity of this radiant visitor. The face was vaguely familiar; but, I could not fit this engaging personality to that of anyone whom I had known.

Doubtless my response to the young woman's greeting lacked some quality that it should have had, for the welcoming hands were withdrawn with a faint suggestion of disappointment.

"Why!" said a voice that vibrated like the far-off chiming of bells at sunset: "I do believe that you have forgotten me!"

"I have not forgotten you," I protested, "because, you see, I doubt if I ever have had the pleasure of meeting you."

"Woe is me! He never knew me! He repudiates me!"

Anne Louise Howard turned in a sort of puzzled wonder from a half-clad child to whom she had been talking.

"Surely," she said; "you have not forgotten the Countess Marija?"

"What gentle pleasantry is this?" I said. "The Countess Marija is a pale, thin young woman, with hollow cheeks and mournful eyes. I could not forget her."

The visitor laughed aloud.

"It is true!" she said, "you have forgotten me—after only six months."

"But; it is impossible!" I protested. "It is altogether incredible! It cannot be true! Perhaps you are a younger sister. There is some resemblance—"

"The Countess Marija indeed was a pale, thin young woman, with hollow cheeks and mournful eyes six months ago. The Countess Marija to-day is—"

The radiant creature stepped back a pace, and, with an infinitely graceful inclination of lithe, supple figure, made a slow, formal curtsy that she had last used at the court of the Tsar.

"This gracious American lady, who remained here after you went away, found me half starved. I had sold the last jewel that I possessed; I had bartered the last bit of old lace for food; I had given my last warm cloak to pay the rent of one end of a room; I was so weak from hunger that black specks and blurs came into my eyes; I could not walk a block along the street without stopping to rest. I was desperate and despairing. The future seemed to hold only one thing—death.

This lady from God-favored America gave to me work and money that I might not perish from the earth. I worked, at first, a little at a time, as my strength permitted. With the money paid to me for the work I bought food. As I gained strength I worked more and more, always putting the money into food. After a few weeks I was able to work eight hours a day. For weeks and weeks I have had enough to eat—that is all! You see the result."

It was true enough. It really was the Countess.

"You are the eighth wonder of the world," I said.

"Nay," protested the Countess. "I am only a fractional part of the eighth wonder of the world. There are many others."

"You mean that the rest of Anne Louise Howard's workers show a similar degree of physical improvement?"

"You should see them! It is not only physical improvement; it is mental and spiritual regeneration, as well. It is an exaltation from the depths of despair to the higher levels of hope and courage. It is almost a resurrection from the dead." . . .

This, then, is what Anne Louise Howard has done. This is the result of the patient work of this lone relief worker during the dark and gloomy days of a sub-Arctic winter; of the raw cold of a reluctant spring; of the rainy and foggy summer—these Russian gentlewomen lifted from the quagmire of destitution and despair and placed upon the firm ground of self-support. . . .

I ask of you who read these lines: Is it a good work? Is it worth while? If you think that the saving of the lives of educated, cultured gentlewomen is worth while, will you help Anne Louise Howard to extend that work so that she may reach out a hand to the many, many other Russian gentlewomen whom she cannot save from unthinkable destitution and certain death, because of limited means?

The particular kind of help that I want just now is an opportunity to exhibit publicly to American women of taste and discrimination the hand-embroidered Russian Princess Blouses and hand-embroidered one-piece gowns made by the Russian gentlewomen employed in Anne Louise Howard's relief work. You can help me by arranging for an exhibition and sale of these exquisitely beautiful garments in your city—possibly in the assembly room of a woman's club or in the lecture room of a church. I know, from actual experiment, that the blouses will sell readily if they can be shown to women who know and appreciate fine needlework.

On my return from the border of Bolshevik Russia last spring I sold the first lot of blouses by mail only. That was well enough, for a beginning; but, now that I have returned from my second trip with a larger supply of blouses, and, in addition, a supply of one-piece gowns, I must have additional means of sale if I am to meet Anne Louise Howard's insistent call for funds to give employment to the throngs of destitute women now begging for work.

If you will help in this by arranging for an exhibition and sale under the auspices of a woman's club, a church or a local committee, I will provide, at my own expense, all the publicity matter, printed circulars, letters of invitation and other forms of notification that may be required. I will give my personal attention to these matters, and will attend the exhibition if it is a physical possibility. I must give a little time, now and again, to my own business; but, apart from that, my entire time is at the call of this work. To me this is not a duty. It is a priceless privilege of service.

May I hear from you promptly? Thousands of gentlewomen are dying of hunger and broken hearts. We can save some of them—if it is worth while.

Through the Earthquake in Japan

In Yokohama

[The following account of personal experiences in Yokohama while it was being destroyed by earthquake and fire was written by a missionary lady well known to me. This record of those terrible two days constitutes a document of unusual human interest. Though written for her immediate kindred and friends in America, many will be glad to see what took place, through the eyes of an exceptionally intelligent and well-balanced observer. Miss ——— had gone to Yokohama to bid farewell to her friend from California, who had been visiting Japan on a tour of inspection on behalf of the Woman's Board of the Pacific. The letter was put into her friend's hands before she actually got away on the first steamer that crossed the Pacific.—SIDNEY L. GULICK.]

HOME—safe and well, September 6, 1923.

Saturday morning Ella and I did a few last things and went to the boat in good season. She found her baggage and letters and everything all right. Her room was a beautiful one, and her roommate a very pleasant young woman from Sensen, Korea. They told her that there were plenty of empty cabins, so they could doubtless have separate cabins after she got started.

I wanted to take the 12.30 train in order to get home at six o'clock Sunday morning and have a real Sabbath, so I did not wait until the boat left at twelve, but said good-bye before the band began to play or the confetti to fly. The last word to Ella was, "I am so glad that after all these years of planning and the months of travel your trip has come to an end without one unpleasant hitch." Then we kissed and parted.

On the way to the train I went in to see Mrs. McCloy about her cook, who is to be Jennie's cook, and then to the Sakuragicho station, where I took the electric car for Yokohama station. We had just pulled out of the station at 11.58 when the car suddenly began to jump and knock and swing around in the strangest manner, utterly indescribable, and it seemed inevitable that the car should turn over. We crouched and ran for the door and jumped off, falling to the ground. We were on a built-up concrete sort of trestle. The concrete broke into bits, part of it a foot lower; the car next to us overturned. Too dazed to realize what had happened, I glanced about, and there was not a house standing. A yellow dust arose and a great shriek, and then a deathly silence. I cannot account for the silence. It may be I was too stunned to hear. A redcap seized my handbags and we stumbled back to the station, avoiding the falling wires. Many people on crowded cars were electrocuted—a merciful death. The station and two large buildings were still standing, but ready to fall. While we waited in the large open place in front for the shaking to let up, immediately in all directions fires sprang up. A stream of humanity came pouring toward us, many of them bleeding. I did not know what to do. A foreign gentleman said he would help me, but he suddenly disappeared. Another man came saying he was on the bridge when the shake came and he lost his handbag. He thought someone had taken it and would some one please tell the policeman about it. I knelt on the ground till a policeman whistled and said, "Everyone to the hills." Not knowing Yokohama, I followed the crowd over the broken, tippy roads, the walking extremely difficult, and the fear of falling into cracks. One man had the experience of the earth opening where he was standing and he fell in up to his waist.

I saw a young man of twenty walking beside me and said, "Are you alone?"

"Yes."

"Won't you stay with me to-day?"

"Gladly."

"What is your name?"

"Hayashi Shotaro."

And so we began our journey together, and never knight had a more faithful squire! If it were not for him I think you would never have the account of this day. He proved to be a Korean with no relatives. He had come to Japan with his father, who had died, and he had shifted for himself. We went up Hogsaka till we came to a shrine, a Daijingu on quite a high hill. The shrine itself, strangely intact, sitting there calmly as if it always had and always would, while the large buildings had fallen. And one structure, an enormous concrete base, had disappeared and the great blocks of concrete were strewn about like children's blocks. You can imagine how that impressed the people, and how many earnest prayers were offered there. The people began to pour up there from every direction till I could guess there were more than a thousand, possibly two thousand. I thought we were quite secure and we stayed there several hours. I became so interested in various groups, the rich and the poor, the calm and the frightened. One woman sat there sweet and smiling with her six children sitting in a row, as proper and quiet as if they were in Sunday-school. How good the young men were to their mothers! One young man said he was connected with the Y. M. C. A. He brought his mother, his baby, his wife and his sister in safety. They had nothing but one egg each, which he had picked up as he passed the store, leaving his card and expecting to pay later. He had tried to buy some bread, but they were holding it for big prices. One man came toiling up with a kerosene can full of midsu ame [a malt candy made from wheat or rice, almost hard when cold, but quite fluid when warm]. He leaned over as he toiled up the hill and the heat of the September day and the heat of the many fires melted the ame, so when he put the can down, from his hair to below his waist he was one shiny mass of sweetness. But a shout went up, and the mothers scraped it off and put their fists in the can and got gobs of it for their dinnerless children, who had no prospects of supper or breakfast ad infinitum. The wounded were brought up on peoples' backs. An old mother came leading a stalwart young man who stumbled along and she supported him as best she could.

My boy went off to reconnoiter and came back with a girl of twenty on his back, and her mother tottering after. The girl was wounded and he found them lying by the roadside with the flames almost up to them. We made them as comfortable as we could with my pillow and piece of matting, and part of my ice water poured into her bottle of raspberry vinegar. In her other hand she was clutching one of those wooden vibrators.

The boy went again and came back saying he did not like the look of things. The fire was getting pretty near on two sides, and the wind was blowing a gale. It seemed to us as if we were safe, for the space was so large and there were so few buildings. I went off to look, and I did not like it either. I saw an official looking man and said, "It looks pretty bad here, doesn't it?"

"Yes, but what can we do?"

"One can't get away from here, and where is there a safer place?"

I went back to my boy and he said, "Let us get out of here."

"How can we leave these women; they will be terrified." My heart clung to all these people whom I had been watching—the little girl of eight who had been praying steadily for two hours; the old blind woman whose face was peaceful, but whose lips never ceased to move in prayer; the frail old white-haired men and women who cling to each other with such a look of despair; the family of five refined, well-dressed people, all pale and exhausted, the mother, the son, his little girl and his wife lying there with her baby a few days old. Still I could not help them and many people were undertaking a difficult and hazardous way of escape. We stole away from our prostrate friends, hoping they would not see us go. Our objective was a villa on high land across a deep valley with precipitous sides all broken and crumpled, over some fallen houses and up a hill so steep I never could have done it without help. I begged my boy to throw away my baggage, but he clung to it, would go and place it, and find the best footings and come back for me. In going down he would place his foot and have me step on it, and in going up he would pull or push, and at last we reached the top. There were villas, a shallow pond and open spaces and trees. The made ground was much broken and at every shake (there were one hundred and fifty of them that day, five hundred all told) I feared the place would slide into the valley. After resting awhile we moved down into the valley, but I could not stand it, to be where we could not see the approach of the fires, so we went up another hill to a pleasant wooded place with many people. Found a cow lying down chewing her cud. Here we could see the approach of the flames, so we said, "Let us find our way into the country if we possibly can." Another steep hill, under fallen trees and over the debris of fallen houses and with the people behind calling, "Hurry, hurry! we will all be burned," and so on, until we came to the city reservoir, the highest place in Yokohama.

The whole city was burned up to it on one side clear over to the Bluff, which was burning fiercely. We sank down on the sand they had in brick enclosures for filtering purposes and felt we were safe here as we could be anywhere, and, anyway, there was no other place to go. There we sat and watched for two hours the four places we had been in, one after another, burn and burn. The loss of life at the Daijingu was terrible. There was no way of egress but the one we had negotiated with so much difficulty. As we crossed the narrow neck of the valley the flames were within, I should say, three hundred feet and the heat intense. Had we waited ten minutes there would have been a panic. The strong pushing the weak in their frenzied efforts to get away, and many crumpled under foot. It was heart-rending to watch those beautiful, cruel flames, and to think of the many we had been interested in who could not get away.

I have not time to finish this story, but will write again when I have time of the experiences after reaching the reservoir Saturday at about six, until I reached home Tuesday afternoon. I am hoping my squire will appear to-morrow morning. We are concentrating on work for the refugees and are told to be ready to receive from thirty to seventy to-morrow morning at the College (Kobe). I have been asked to take care of rooming arrangements, so I shall be too busy to write for some days.

I have seen people who have seen Cousin Ella on the Empress Australia, but we have had no communication. They are waiting for the Empress Asia to come from Vancouver. After discharging her cargo here she will go back to Yokohama and take the Empress Australia passengers to America.

I am so grieved for Cousin Ella that her trip should be brought to an end in this way. I feel so thankful that the way has been made so easy for me and that I have this home to come to. I do not want to be a refugee.

Later. We reached the reservoir in safety about sunset. Already the whole of the city was in flames, except one small valley next to the reservoir on the other side, which is all that escaped. The Bluff was still burning fiercely in spots. A pall of smoke was over all and in every direction except the west, where Fuji was majestically smiling. Shall I say beautifully or cruelly? I spotted the sand pile enclosed in a brick bin as my abode, and presently others came, and together the men made a shelter of corrugated iron about four feet high in the center and twenty of us had our refuge there for about two nights; possibly the others remained there much longer. We came very close to each other. They were all Japanese. I saw no foreigners until I reached the steamer Monday at ten A. M.

My close contact with the many Japanese strangers has given me a deeper love for them and appreciation of real Japanese character. Patience, fortitude, generosity, kindness, sympathy—all these I saw in abundance.

I grieve to say there was one terrible blot that I wish to forget. I will omit the account of the Koreans who had escaped from their burning prison and were thought to be looting and shooting, and what angered the Japanese most, poisoning the wells and reservoirs. If the rumors had been well founded, they deserved their awful fate, but at such a time as that, credence is given to tales, however bad, if they are only gruesome. I saw and heard what went on Sunday afternoon and night and it was terrible. My Korean boy lay with his face in the sand beside me all through that horrible time. The people in our shack knew he was a Korean, but in spite of it were most kind and tied a red cloth on his arm, which was a sign of being a Japanese.

Hayashi had his life threatened on the launch going out to the steamer, but its being daylight and his being with me saved his life. I heard later that the real looting was done by men in the boats down in the concessions, who in many cases rifled the safes. Of course, a great deal must be excused at a time of such excitement and because the buildings were doomed to burn anyway. One of the head men of the Hong Kong-Shanghai bank was wounded and while the men helping him went for a stretcher he was knifed and the bank keys taken. Mrs. McArthur told me this. She, like so many others, was buried in her home and was dragged out wounded just before it burned.

You may wonder what we had to eat those two memorable days. No one had eaten luncheon, as the earthquake occurred just two minutes before twelve o'clock. My resources were a dry muffin, a small roll, a tiny bunch of grapes and a little chocolate. These we divided between us for supper and breakfast. My thermos bottle of water I gave to different people whose needs were dire, and also gave them half my chocolate. I asked Hayashi to go into the unburned valley and see if there were anything to eat. He came back with a small package of caramels. I saw some people who had evidently found bananas and asked Hayashi if he could find some. He found a hole in the ground where bananas were being ripened and brought back about fifty. I divided with the others, giving one each to twenty-five people or more. Then I tasted one and found it so green I could not swallow it. I wrapped the rest in my kimono to keep them out of sight until they ripened.

Sunday Afternoon. Some rice and potatoes have been conjured up and we have accepted a few. I did so hate to take anything because the need of those so generously offering was likely to be so great and so long continued, while I was sure the Korean boy and I could get off on some ship bound for Kobe.

The concrete edge of the reservoir was a little higher than we were, and I shall never forget that first night. Against the glare of the burning city there was a constant procession of dark silhouettes passing and calling loudly to the mass of those from whom they had become separated, hoping to find them in one of the camps. One large, well-dressed man came into our shack and threw himself down exhausted for a couple of hours. He slept and then ate a mouthful or two and with only a word of "thanks" went out on his quest for his mother, wife and four children. This search was kept up all the time I was there, but I never heard him speak a word.

There were some joyful reunions in our shack. One fine young man was brought there wounded and burned. He had been dragged out from débris and his wounds bound up and then left where he hourly expected to be fatally burned; his own father found him and brought him to our camp. All the afternoon I thought he was dying, but was so rejoiced to see him open his eyes and when I left he was sitting up.

Monday morning I said good-bye to our camp and started out to try our luck in getting away. As we passed by the place where we had rested in what we thought to be safety, and from where we barely escaped, I stood and looked up, but Hayashi said, "Don't go up there, it is too terrible." We had no difficulty in making our way through the city by the wide streets that were paved with concrete three feet thick, all broken to pieces, yet one could easily step from block to block. There were no streets visible except the few very wide ones. I had no sense of direction, but as far as we could see there was nothing but broken tiles, concrete, wire entanglements and a sea of ashes. The odor of burning flesh was everywhere, and around the banks and offices were piles of charred bodies.

As we drew near the harbor we saw many men carrying bales of woolen goods. They were helping themselves to the goods in the iron custom godowns (storehouses). Two fellows had found a gun. When the others saw it they cried, "Guns! Where did you get them?" They ran like the wind to get some. Seeing a lot of sampans (harbor boats) I turned down to the water front. One young fellow had tapped a box of roller skates and had put on a pair and was merrily skating on a bit of unbroken pavement.

We tried to get one of the sampans to take us to a boat or ship going to Kobe, but to no avail. This was harvest time for them on shore, and they couldn't leave their looting job. We discovered a launch with steam on and, asking no questions, boarded it, and were politely requested to get off. We continued to sit in the boat and begged our sweetest to be taken to any foreign steamer in the harbor. They tried at first just as sweetly to urge us to take a sampan and said they were going "in a different direction." But we were obdurate and sat still. Finally, starting in another direction, they turned and took us to the Audie Le'Mon. I gave them two yen, which they politely returned. One fellow then began telling of the killing of Koreans at Tokyo, looking fixedly at Hayashi san. Then as we drew near the steamer he demanded five yen. Men came down the gangway shouting and protesting, and I supposed they were turning us away, but what they were doing was to tell us not to pay a single cent. They were most cordial about taking me on board, but were so angry about the money demanded that when a boy from the launch tried to board the steamer they threw him back and were doing the same to Hayashi san when I stepped on the lower rung of the gangway and said, "That boy saved my life and I will go back on the launch unless you take him on, too." Then they were very nice and took him on gladly.

We were a little later transferred to the President Jefferson and bound for Kobe with several other refugees. In transferring I passed under the stern of the Empress Australia, on which Mrs. Brunner was a passenger. I said to the officer on board. "I would give fifty dollars gold to call a message to the Australia." He said their wireless was taxed to the limit, but I could get a message to the ship probably. So I went to the wireless room and asked them to send it. I was also hoping that Mrs. Brunner saw my name on the list of those who were saved. (Neither message nor list was seen by Mrs. Brunner.)

In transferring to the President Jefferson I was separated from my faithful Korean boy. I arrived home Tuesday afternoon, September 4th, and was received with rejoicing. Two days after Hayashi followed, although he did not have my address, only my name. He wandered about in Kobe until he found our gate-post with my name on it. He leaned his head against it and wept tears of joy. I was not at home when he came, but the servant, having heard his story from me, was ready to give him a royal welcome. I am now hoping that Mr. and Mrs. Newell may be able to take him to Seoul when they go. He is a fine looking young man, rather short, with good teeth and good features. There is something most winning in his personality and worthy of trust. He is well worth giving a chance in the world.

The Experiences of the Bible Society Man

[The following is part of a letter written to Dr. Haven, one of the secretaries of the American Bible Society.]

ON the first of September (the memorable day of the beginning as well as the cause of the terrible catastrophe), just at twelve o'clock midday, I stood at the exit wicket at the railway station, Kashiwabara, one hundred and fifty miles north of Tokyo, awaiting a train by which Mrs. Aurell and son were returning from Karuizawa. I was hardly touching the bars at the side of the wicket when I suddenly discovered a waving or staggering sensation. For a moment I wondered if there was something the matter with myself, but soon was convinced that an earthquake was on. The heaving and waving to and fro of everything about me made me step out into the open space by the station so as to avoid being struck by possibly falling tiles from the roof. The motion of the ground became so violent that it was almost difficult to stand still. Two square water tanks on the other side of the tracks opposite the station rocked to and fro extremely, making the water splash over in great quantities, first on this and then on the other side, until it seemed there would not be much water left in them. During this interesting time the train pulled in, but none of the passengers, somehow, had noticed that there was an earthquake. Forty minutes later, arriving at the lake, everybody was talking about the unusually strong earthquake and wondered if something awful had not happened somewhere. Some wondered if Mount Asama, the famous volcano, fifty miles away, had not possibly erupted and gone to pieces. I've mentioned the above to give you an idea of the terrible strength of the earthquake in the totally devastated districts in view of what we experienced here one hundred and fifty miles away from there.

No news reached us here until about nine o'clock Sunday morning (2nd). (The reason for that was that all sorts of means of communication had been completely cut off.) Then alarming reports came first by a milkman and next by a telegram from Karuizawa. It was truly hard to believe that the whole city of Tokyo had been destroyed and was burning. But as it was said that Mount Fuji was the center of the earthquake (that was not so) we felt the reports no doubt could not be too strong. You may imagine the state of mind we were thrown into. What to think or do distressed us most extremely. Finally, that evening a party of us started off for Tokyo. The trains were already crowded and as we rolled on towards our destination people would literally "pile" into every car, even through the windows. The rudeness and unreasonable things that were done made it practically impossible to avoid fights throughout the whole train. Just before entering the city suburbs everybody had to get off the trains and walk, crossing a river on a "pontoon" bridge. The railway bridge was supposed unsafe, and there was no bridge for the public near, outside of this contrivance. It was deemed unwise and dangerous for more than two or three hundred people to cross this pontoon at one time, and there were thousands of people on each side of the river struggling to get over. Military men with bayonets had an extremely difficult time to guard and direct them. Had they been allowed to rush on freely this bridge would not only have been broken down, but thousands of people drowned.

Well, we managed to get across, and, walking a mile or more, we scrambled with the masses on to another train which took us just inside city limits. Then from there, as no transportation facility of any kind was available, we walked and walked, meeting thousands upon thousands of homeless people. The great and famous Zeno Park was covered with weary and disheartened refugees. Reaching the part of the park facing the largest extent of the city, we had our first view of the great devastation. Oh, what a scene! On the left the famous Zeno station, with many hundreds of cars absolutely diminished to heaps of stone, brick and scrap-iron. In front of us for miles and miles the same condition prevailed. Electric cars, motor cars and everything reduced to ashes and rubbish. The wire entanglements in the streets made our progress slow. Telegraph poles were still burning—in fact, they were the only pieces of wood that could be seen in the whole devastated district. At certain places much smoke and heat still emitted, making it dangerous to pass by. One of my companions said that he had visited devastated Belgium and other places in Europe, but this scene to his mind surpassed as a calamity. We lingered a little in the Kanda Ward at the City Y. M. C. A., the National Y. M. C. A. and the Baptist Tabernacle. All these buildings were supposed to be fireproof, but, alas, though the concrete walls, floors and stairways stood the test, every least thing inside of them had been wiped out of existence. Even the contents of a good safe in the Tabernacle when opened had withered so that when touched they crumbled like ashes. The fine Salvation Army headquarters, the Y. W. C. A., churches and schools of all descriptions and banks, all alike totally gone!

I cannot go into detail—it would require days to do so. We spent the night at a missionary's house in a spared part of the city. We were frightfully tired, so that we slept most sweetly despite hourly quakes that still came during the night. In the morning . . . looking up Mr. Ziegler [of the Bible Society], who had spent the past terrible days in the hotel, together with him I walked over to where the Bible House had once existed. I knew it was destroyed before I went there. I had hoped that in some way the Lord might have preserved it, but He had allowed it to go with the rest. The walls stood up very well, but the fire had done havoc with all that was consumable within. The only thing I could see was the safe, but I could not get to it because of the still burning timbers that had fallen down from the two floors and the roof above. On one of the walls Mr. Tanaka had stuck up a note for me which said: "Staff safe." Having seen this, we walked up as far as the ruins of the Methodist Publishing House. Even the wooden blocks of the paved street were partly burned. Parting with Mr. Ziegler, I set out for Mr. Tanaka's home. It took me at least three hours to get there. All was well there—only the plastering of his house had been pretty thoroughly shaken down.

Mr. Tanaka's story is too long to tell. The gist of it is: At noon of the first they were suddenly annoyed by a terrible rumbling noise and shaking of the whole building. Something like that had often happened when large motor trucks rushed by on the street. But this time it was unusually annoying and increased and lasted minute after minute. They realized it was a terrible earthquake! What should they do? They grabbed the book-keeping material and cash box, rushed down stairs and chucked it into the safe, shut it and hastened out into the street. The earthquake lasted four minutes. Next door in the drug store combustible acids somehow were ignited in the rear and started a fire. This was fought with might and main and happily put out and all seemed safe in that locality. In many other parts of the city fires had started by the time our men went to their homes. They of course were anxious about their respective homes. Tanaka and the assistant bookkeeper before leaving the Bible House had opened the safe and taken out the ledger and other important books with the cash box, taking the same with them. Finding all well at his home, Tanaka could not resist going to the Bible House again in the evening. He found it intact and no fire in the immediate neighborhood. It was midnight by the time he got home. Early Sunday morning he went there the second time, then what he had feared really had happened—the whole Ginza street had gone down in ashes. Of course, there was nothing to do but to retrace his steps home disheartened in the fullest sense of the word. He could get no information to me. He could not get a train out of the city. And in addition to that a report commenced to spread that the Koreans were up to mischief everywhere, throwing bombs and setting fire to the still remaining parts of the city. Tanaka was out every night till twelve o'clock assisting the police in guarding their community. We do not know what to think of this scare. We are inclined to believe there were bad elements of the Japanese behind it. Yet it does seem true that some of the Koreans took advantage of this occasion to give vent to their feelings of resentment toward the Japanese. Time may make that clear.

Relatively, the disaster at Yokohama is greater than that of Tokyo. Besides our plates we had a large stock of Scriptures at the Fukuin Printing Company. That being wiped out also, the agency's loss is very great. Our fire insurance policies do not cover fire arising from causes of earthquake. So we have nothing but five thousand yen in the bank and about six hundred yen in the postoffice. As yet I have not arrived at any plan as to what shall be the first step in starting work again. To-day the thought came to me to try to get some printing done at Kobe, asking permission to use the plates of the B. & F. B. S.* If that can be realized I will start work in the part of our field nearest Kobe, which will make transportation comparatively easy. In about two or three weeks we hope to get the money out of the bank and thus begin operations if only on a very small scale.

The Idea of Immortality*

IMMORTALITY is a subject of perennial interest. It is true that when a questionnaire was sent to a number of experts in physiology and psychology some replies indicated indifference. But in comparison with the total number of people who have lived and died on this planet we believe that the proportion of those who are indifferent to immortality is negligible. In one form or another, humanity is profoundly interested in the question of the future life. Multitudes in health and prosperity may not think about it, but in illness or bereavement the subconscious self becomes vigorously active. Most of the older books treat the subject in an unsatisfactory way. They are hard and mechanical, and their authors were plainly influenced by the scholastic philosophy and the poems of Dante and Milton rather than by the New Testament. Modern books are more helpful, but, as might be expected, are of varying value. We have recently been looking over the Harvard Series of Ingersoll Lectures on immortality. They include some valuable discussions and some very poor ones. The most unsatisfactory of all is Karsopp Lake's "Immortality and the Modern Mind." It would be lamentable, indeed, if the "modern mind" could find nothing more in immortality than Professor Lake has found. He calls his statement a "confession of faith," but he might more accurately have characterized it as a confession of doubt. As far as one can determine from his somewhat foggy discussion, he does not believe in personal immortality, but is inclined to a pantheism whose habitat is India rather than America.

The present volume by Professor Pringle-Pattison is on a higher level. The author is the widely known emeritus professor of logic and metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh, and a fellow of the British Academy. He is a scholar of wide reputation and a thinker of recognized power. Perhaps the fact that his special department is logic and metaphysics may be both an advantage and a disadvantage in such a discussion, since an expert of that kind is prone to treat the question from the viewpoint of the head rather than that of the heart. Some truths about immortality are deeply rooted in experience, and one can feel them even if he cannot adequately express them. The longings of the heart may be quite as trustworthy as the reasoning of the brain. However, this book is far from being a mere metaphysical discussion. It has large practical interest for the average reader and its tone is sympathetic and reverent. It deals with such subjects as primitive ideas of the soul and the after-life, Hebrew and the Greek ideas of immortality, pre-existence and immortality in Plato, mind and body, reincarnation and Karma, eternal life and personal immortality. He holds (p. 19) that "nowhere in the Old Testament do we find a clear and definite doctrine of immortality. If we think we do in certain passages, it is because we read our own ideas into the language. All that we find is scattered anticipations, vaticinations of the heart. But the importance of these isolated passages is that they indicate the path along which a fuller and more assured belief was eventually reached." In the New Testament he, of course, finds clearer teaching. He doubts, however, whether the term "eternal life" connotes the meaning that is ordinarily assigned to it. He says (p. 142) that "the gospel He (Jesus) proclaimed was not a promise of future reward for certain beliefs about Himself, but a gospel of deliverance, a message of present salvation," "not a password enabling a man to escape dire penalties in the future or admitting him to great rewards, but a change of the inner man, the adoption of a new attitude towards life and its happenings." To St. Paul (pp. 143-144) "the death and resurrection of Jesus, and his own resurrection to which he undoubtedly looked forward as a future event, became a description of the eternal nature of the spiritual life, symbols of an experience daily realized. It is in this sense that Christ is said to have brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. 'This gift to men' (I purposely quote a strictly orthodox commentator, S. D. F. Salmond) 'is not the inculcation of the truth of an endless existence, nor any dogma of the soul's deathless perpetuity, but the revelation of a higher life.'" From an analysis of various New Testament passages he concludes (p. 145) that "eternal life is not a state of existence to follow upon physical death, but an all-satisfying present experience of the love of God in Christ."

He does not regard (p. 195) "personal immortality as an inherent possession of every human soul, or a talismanic gift conferred indiscriminately on every being born in human shape." He asks (p. 197), "Why should the universe be permanently burdened by the continued existence of those who made no use of life while they had lived?" "Immortality (p. 200) is not something that comes to us automatically, but essentially something to be won and held." He inclines (p. 202-203) to "the idea of a final restoration wherever a real self has come into being," but he argues that this idea, "if it is allowed to harden into a dogma, involves a danger," and that "to proclaim universal restoration as a necessary law of the universe is to ignore the fact that, in the nature of the case, the destiny of a self-conscious spirit is committed to itself and depends upon a personal choice. To assure people that, whatever they do, all will come right in the end is not an effective method of awakening them to the gravity of decision here and now, which bind upon the soul the fetters of habit and make it ever more difficult to find the way back."

The author concludes that (p. 205) "the idea of immortality has no religious significance, and it loses all credibility if we separate it from the idea of eternal life as a realized possession." "If (p. 208) we are occupied with 'thoughts immortal and divine,' or with some great cause which means

Our Lord Jesus a Missionary

MATTHEW 9:35-38; LUKE 8:1-3; JOHN 3:16, 17.

"God so loved the world, that he gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have eternal life."—John 3:16.

THERE is a passage in one of Paul's letters to Corinth in which he says, "Woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel." Paul may well have had in mind words to the same effect in the book of Jeremiah, where the prophet says, "Then I said, I will not make mention of Him, nor speak any more in His name. But His word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and I could not stay."

We sometimes talk as though the whole task of missions were a debatable matter, and we could take it or leave it at pleasure. Nothing is further from the truth. The missionary impulse is not a debatable one, it is a natural and inevitable one under normal conditions. It is not something to be argued about, but acted upon. The actual concrete details of missionary practice always allow room for discussion and even for candid differences of opinion. But the fundamental impulse is a religious imperative, not a religious option.

That is what Jeremiah meant by saying he had no choice in the matter. There were hard and utterly discouraging times in his life when it seemed a waste of breath to prophesy. He was whistling up the wind to no visible purpose or effect. It seemed the reasonable thing to stop and keep silence. But when he tried to do that the ferment of his own feelings and the fire of his own convictions became insufferable and he had to speak out once more.

Paul felt the same kind of necessity. He was neither the master of his fate, nor the captain of his soul in this matter. It was simply an insufferable misery to him not to preach the gospel. The "woe" was on him and he had no choice of his own about his missionary task.

Jesus never said just so much in so many words. There are great reserves in Jesus which guard much of His own inner life in the silences. But surely we read our gospels aright if we read in them the same inevitable necessity in His ministry. He has set His hand to the plow and cannot turn back. He must go on his way, to-day and to-morrow and the day following, to Jerusalem. He must preach in that city as in the cities of Galilee, for to that end was He sent. There is all through the Gospels this dominant sense of a tremendous necessity laid upon Jesus by virtue of His very nature.

We are not discussing theories, we are discussing facts. And the plain fact is that when any man has anything in his life which he values, and which means much to him, he has to share it with other persons. And the simplest rule of thumb for dividing what is really of worth in your life from that which is of no worth, is to find out what there is in your life that you have to tell others about because it has meant so much to you, and what means so little to you that there is no inclination or need to say anything about it to anyone else.

We are all missionaries every day for a hundred interests of daily life. It is a perfectly well recognized fact among all business concerns that the satisfied customer is the best advertising medium that exists. He tells the next man what he has discovered, and this vast intricate hand-to-hand advertising is the way that a product is finally and permanently marketed.

If you are fond of your home you like to have guests come into it and share it with you. If you read a book you enjoy you cannot be content until you have passed it on to some one else. If your car runs well and gives satisfaction you urge your neighbor to buy your make, because you know he will be satisfied with it. We are all of us engaged in missionary work every day. The thing is not debatable. It seems almost like one of the laws of nature, something written by necessity into our very being.

Now the reverse side of the shield of this truth is perfectly plain. If there is anything in your life for which you are not a missionary, that means either that it is not worth much, or else that it is worth much but you have not found out what it is worth. If there are interests in your life that you can keep to yourself year after year, you probably ought not to be bothered with them yourself. They are trivial and unimportant. Or else you ought to go much deeper into them than you have gone, and discover whether there is value there which you have never found.

It is very easy to sit in the study and satisfy yourself that Mohammedanism, for example, has nothing to it. But out in Central Africa the Mohammedan missionaries are pushing their way south through the heart of the continent, making converts. And when you realize that fact you know that Mohammedanism has to be reckoned with because men seem to be under the old imperious necessity of sharing it with others.

The most significant fact that we know about Mormonism is the fact that every member of the Church of the Latter Day Saints has to spend one or two years of his life as a missionary for that faith. You may look upon the spread of Mormonism as a menace, if you are so minded, but you have to admire the vitality of a religion which can command that kind of loyalty from all its members.

This simple law of life as to the inevitable necessity of sharing what we have found to be worth while with others is the rock bottom of all missions and is non-debatable. If this impulse is absent it simply means either that the religion in question is not a vital and important religion, or else that the men who say they profess it simply have not begun to understand and to experience its worth.

The thing begins at home. It is first of all simply a process of going out and finding your brother Simon or your neighbor Nathanael. It may not mean that you preach at him in words, or try to argue him into conversion. But it will mean that in the most natural, effective way possible you will succeed in sharing your Christianity with him.

You may not even be conscious that you are a missionary. Probably the best and most effective missionary work is always unconscious. But if you have found out what Christianity is worth you will not be able to keep that knowledge to yourself, you will share it with others. "There are," says Rufus Jones, "multitudes of men and women in out-of-the-way places, in backwoods towns, and on uneventful farms, who are the salt of the earth and the light of the world." He goes on to describe one such, a very simple old farmer, who had no creed and made no formal profession of religion, yet one could not hoe a row of potatoes beside him, without being bettered by the direct contagion of his deeply religious spirit. That is being a missionary.

The trouble with most of us is that we enjoy our religion selfishly, that we come to it for refreshment when our spirits are dry and parched. But we do not stay long enough in the presence of the wells of water so that we are filled to overflowing. And being a missionary is simply being so filled with religion that one has no alternative but to overflow into the life of the world.

Now with Jesus being a missionary was simply overflowing into the life that was around him. He never went very far or preached to strange nations. The Christian program of foreign missions is an inevitable and logical outcome of the spirit of Jesus seeking expression through the organized life of the Church. Jesus did not reach the stage of church organization. He simply started the process.

Some of us will always have to face and accept the opportunity for such work at the outposts and in the thin red line at the van of the Church's work. But the fact that the rest of us do not or cannot enter such service does not relieve us from the missionary necessity.

We need, to-day, a greater candor and naturalness within the circle of the Church. We are too shy and self-conscious and unnatural about religion. There is a verse on the very last page of the Old Testament which says, "They that feared the Lord spake often one to another." What a fitting prelude to the missionary spirit of the New Testament! Nothing would make so much for the spread of Christianity at the present time as a winning of this spontaneous and natural habit of speaking often to one another about our religion, as the most real and important thing in life. A lonely, noble soul of the last century once jotted down in his journal this entry, "What a superstition it is which forbids people who really think to talk to one another on religious matters! Not a soul has said a word to me for years about God." It seems incredible that this should be so. And it only means that the religion of that man's friends was artificial and of little real worth to them.

Do not suppose that the missionary and the minister are the only persons who do this work. The Christianity which we profess rests on a half dozen great propositions, and one of these is "the priesthood of all believers"—the right of every one to be a missionary. And this is not so much a right as a duty and a necessity.

If you do not feel this old imperative urge which has kept Christianity alive and spread it from one century to another century, from one nation and race to other races and nations, there is something wrong. It means that you have been playing at being a Christian. And your lack of interest in the principle of missions is not a criticism of missions alone, it is a comment upon yourself. It means that you have never been plunged into the mind of Christ.

Each of us has the right to choose the type of missionary work he can do best, professional or unprofessional, abroad or at home. But no real Christian has any other choice than this, to share with others that life which is too great and catholic to be possessed and enjoyed alone.

WILLARD LEAROYD SPERRY.

With law enforcement to the front in public interest it is worth while to quote again the statement made by the late President Harding on the twenty-fifth of last June:

"Whatever objection there is," said he, "to the so-called invasion of personal liberty does not hold when the supremacy of law and the stability of our institutions are menaced.

"I do not see how any citizen who cherishes the protection of law in organized society may feel secure when he himself is the example of contempt for law.

"Lawless drinking is a menace to the Republic itself.

"There must be no issue in this land paramount to that of enforcement of the law."

SOMETIMES when an opening is very wide, it is impractical to use a rolling partition hung from above. Then we use the side coiling or vertical rolling partition. THE ART OF GIVING IN JAPAN

We are among the most informal of people. The Japanese have a rubric for almost everything, down to the very tying of a package in which is a gift. If you are to make a gift four things are necessary—the gift, a piece of white paper in which to wrap it, a gift string, and the little emblem signifying that the article sent is a gift, which is always put in. This little emblem is called a "noshi" (no-she), and comes in many sizes and colors. It may be that the gift is too large or is not a good shape to wrap in paper, like a basket of fruit, so in this case just the little noshi is put in.

The gift string is half red and half white and consists of five strands. Sometimes one can get a red and gold string instead of a red and white one. They come in various lengths and are tied very carefully. The red must always be at the red side. Just the simple bowknot is very common, but sometimes the strands are tied separately to represent flowers or butterflies, or are curled and made to stand up in spirals. The gift string goes around the gift from underneath from left to right and not vertically on the gift. The paper is left open at the top and bottom, and one must be careful not to put things in upside down, for that would be very rude. One can get paper on which is stamped a gift string and noshi.

It seems queer to think of taking a gift to a funeral, but that is the usual thing at Yamaguchi, Japan. Two very common funeral gifts are cake and money. If you give money, it is wrapped in a special way in the white gift paper, then put into a cake box. These boxes vary in size, but are usually two or three inches deep by six wide and eight or ten long. The box is then wrapped in paper and a black and white cord put about it, but no noshi is sent with it. If the person has many friends, there will be big piles of boxes, each labeled with the donor's name, on one side of the room in which the funeral is held. Afterwards a representative of the family must go to everyone's house and thank them for the gifts, and so many days after the funeral a return gift is made to each one who brought something. Around Yamaguchi it is usually half the value of what one gave at the time of the funeral.

"I do not despair that the very sense of self-preservation will teach the nations that the only path of security is the path of peace, the only path to prosperity is the path of good-will, and although for the moment the omens are not bright, although the firmament is clouded, I am still sanguine enough to believe that in a very short time the clouds may clear, the skies will brighten, and that Europe, as well as America, will be able to acclaim the great gospel of peace on earth and good-will among men."—Lloyd George on his arrival in this country.

for us the kingdom of God upon earth, or, for the matter of that, in doing anything that we feel is worth doing, we have neither time nor inclination to brood over our personal future. Our life is full of these objective interests. So death should find us; and to a mind so attuned physical death ought to appear no more than an incident in life, an event to be accepted as naturally as sleep. Other preparation for death there can in any case be none. The very idea of specific preparation for death and a future life (as if the new life were to be entirely different in kind from the old, with no continuity between the two) can have no meaning for those who have sought and found eternal life here."

The average reader will probably question some of the statements in this volume. The present reviewer finds himself obliged to do so, but he has tried to give a fair idea of the book. No one can read it without being deeply stirred. It is a book to be thoughtfully studied, and although one may not arrive at some of the conclusions of the author, he is certain to be profoundly impressed by the scope and dignity of the discussion.

THE JAPANESE EARTHQUAKE

[The following is a copy of a letter written by a Japanese High School boy to the Rev. H. D. Hannaford, of the Japan Mission, now at home in the United States on furlough.]

Biwajima, Nogoya,
5th. Sep. 1923.

My dear Mr. Hannaford:—

I'm very sorry to report you the general effects of the unprecedented calamity which took place in Tokyo, Yokohama, and the neighboring town. As you already know, the damages inflicted are more than we can expect, although the exact details are still unknown, as all the communication agencies were literally destroyed.

It was just at noon and we were at our dinner table when we felt a severe shock. We unconsciously jumped out of the house. The shocks severe, or weak continually succeed, and we could not remain tranquilly at home. The shock continued for three days, although it gradually became less severe.

At that time the most severe district was Kante in which Tokyo and Yokohama is included. Almost all the houses there were thoroughly destroyed, or semi-destroyed. Meanwhile about fifty specks of fire arose, and soon they augment their blazing force and at last they were amassed on one great conflagration and spread to the whole city. The multitude of refugees must again shelter themselves desperately from heat. But being surrounded by fires crowds of people were either burnt to death or plunged into waters and were drowned.

Simultaneously with the first shock the water pipes were burst up and even a drop of water could not be obtained. So that the fires were left alone, taking its own course. Even the fire spread to the palace and the Emperor and Empress took refuge to somewhere. But it was soon put out as all the forces of fire-brigade worked together at the risk of their lives.

At the same time Yokohama was also inwrapped with more fierce conflagration, and all the city was literally burnt down except a few buildings. Already both city were altogether reduced to ashes and annihilated, as it were, like a living hell, and nothing could be seen from the airplane but a black wastes of smoky land.

The casualties in Tokyo is amounting to a quarter of million and in Yokohama a hundred thousand, among whom European residents is amounting to five hundred and Chinese a thousand and five. At night on that day Tokyo was visited by a tidal waves. The survivors who barely escaped from the disaster were thirsty and hungry as so many wolves. Some of them quenched their thirsty and soon died away. The grand wharfs of Yokohama were sunk into waters and five thousand refugees on them were washed away. A passenger up train on the way to Yokohama were derailed at the sudden shock and fell into the sea. The whole passenger in it of five hundred were burried in a watery grave except thirty-two, who emerged from it. The conflagration continued till the afternoon of the 3d, during which both cities were 160 F. in warmth. Shiba-ku was saved from the fire. But on the second day fire broke out again at the Torano-mon girl school, and the greater part of Shiba-ku was burnt. Some say that Meiji-Gakuin

We Must Rebuild the Japanese Churches!

The earthquake in Japan not only caused the death of thousands, the impoverishment of hundreds of thousands, but it totally wrecked all the Churches of Tokyo and Yokohama.

The Japanese Christians, pastors and laymen, as well as our missionaries, have shown marvelous courage. They have been foremost in caring for the wounded and ministering to the suffering. Their courage is still undaunted and immediately

They Have Started a Campaign to Rebuild Their Churches

This radiogram has just come to our Mission Boards and tells its own story:

“Japanese Church Federation (and) the Federated Missions of Japan (have) formed international (and) interdenominational commission (for) survey (and) reconstruction. Seventy churches (have been) destroyed (and) 6000 Christian families (are) homeless.”

Converse.

(Secretary of Federation of Christian Missions of Japan,)

The cost of rebuilding the seventy churches destroyed cannot be less than $500,000.

Here is a remarkable opportunity for the Christians of America to render not only a beautiful service of good-will to their Japanese fellow-Christians, but also to make an investment that will be lasting and which will go on rendering a beneficent service through many years.

We wish it could be said that every one of the fifty thousand readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK—children as well as adults—had some part in this investment. It would make history. Likewise, this investment would do more to create lasting peace and good-will than all the navies in the world.

Have you not noticed that all of the yellow journals of both Japan and America have stopped talking war?

THE CHRISTIAN WORK wants to have a large share in rebuilding these churches. No doubt the Foreign Mission Boards will at once begin a campaign to raise funds to rebuild their churches. The independent native churches must also look to America.

Will not every reader of these words send a contribution at once to THE CHRISTIAN WORK? Do not pass this wonderful opportunity by—send what you can, large or small.

If you want your contribution to go through one of the Mission Boards for a Mission Church, indicate that fact in your letter. If you want it to go to the native churches—and much must be sent to them—indicate that also (all unindicated contributions will go to them).

We have asked Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, who was missionary in Japan for many years, and who is known by every native pastor in Japan, to forward checks for the native churches, to be used under the direction of a committee in Japan.

the mission school was safe from fire. Another says that it was already burnt down. Takanawa palace was certainly reduced to ashes. All prominent institutes, schools and buildings were crushed and inflamed. Thousand corpses were left alone exposed to the heat of fire. On the third day a heavy storm visited the capital and millions of refugees had no shelters nor food to appease their hunger and innumerable children died of it. Such is the present condition of the capital. Successive reports informed us the more miserable state and shudders us all the more chillingly. Nothing could be compared the heart-felt thanks more deep impressioned than the life-boat of America, i.e., the despatch of American squadron for the rescue of our distress. All our native shed tears of joy at the news of it. We earnestly entreat our Father that the losses sustained will be mitigated as possible.

THE JEWISH CLAIM TO THE MOSQUE OF OMAR

The Chief Rabbinate of Palestine claims the site upon which the famous Mosque of Omar stands as a place even more sacred to the Jew than to the Moslems. It is one of the few places in Jerusalem whose identification is without serious question. The Temple of Solomon must once have stood there. So sure is the Orthodox Jew that the site of the Holy of Holies is somewhere beneath the Mosque that he will not enter the building lest he profane the sacred spot. The Chief Rabbi has submitted the Jewish claim to the Mosque to the Government Commission on Holy Places, which is adjudicating the rights of the various communities to the sacred places. Naturally the Arabs are very bitter in their opposition to the Jewish claim, for the Mosque of Omar is the third most holy shrine in all Moslemdom. Palestine is still far from being a land of peace.

Christian Civilization— Is It Christian?

After Nineteen Hundred Years Has Christianity Seriously Modified the Pagan Character of Human Society?

This question was put to a group of the most influential social students in the American Church, all of them leaders and close advisors of the various social service movements in all the denominations and the Federal Council of Churches. Among them are:

Bishop Francis J. McConnell
F. Ernest Johnson
Charles A. Ellwood
Alva W. Taylor
Samuel Z. Batten

Harry F. Ward
Ross L. Finney
Albion W. Small
Arthur E. Holt
Herbert H. Shenton

Edward Alsworth Ross

☐ They divided the problem up into many pieces, each taking one piece to investigate.

☐ Their answer is an amazing revelation!

☐ In a series of articles they declare with surprising unanimity that the industry, the economics, the politics, our nationalist conceptions and practices and the international relations of our so-called Christian civilization are based upon and shot through and through with utterly pagan implications.

☐ Our workaday life and our public life have not yet seriously felt the influence of the mind of Jesus. On the contrary, a society dominated by Christian men is found to be governed by rules which are non-Christian, anti-Christian, flagrantly pagan.

☐ If these pagan rules and principles remain unrevolutionized, says Professor Albion W. Small, "the goodly fellowship of the Apostles could not operate our present industrial system and make its workings just."

☐ These churchmen agree that it is vain to ask men to be Christians in industry or politics and at the same time accept pagan ideals, motives and methods as their rules of action.

☐ No such concerted analysis of the moral character of our social order has ever before been attempted in the light of the mind of Christ. The position of leadership held by the writers—officials in the social service organizations and close counselors of officials—makes their articles an authentic expression of the slowly forming

THIRTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE LORD'S DAY ALLIANCE

The Lord's Day Alliance of the United States will celebrate its thirty-fifth anniversary in New York from November 11 to 13. The anniversary sermon will be preached at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church at eleven o'clock, Sunday morning, by the Rev. George Elliott, D.D., LL.D., editor of "The Methodist Review," in whose former church in Washington, the Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church, the Alliance was organized on December 12, 1888.

On Monday morning there will be a meeting at ten o'clock at the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church. Dr. William E. Doughty, of the Near East Relief, will speak on the Sabbath and other conditions in Europe. Mrs. Robert Bruce Hull, of the Woman's National Sabbath Alliance, will discuss the woman's side of the question. Dr. Bowlby, the general secretary of the Alliance, will speak on "Cakes Hot from a Griddle."

On Tuesday the entire day will be given over to addresses and the presentation of papers by the secretaries of the State and District Organizations. This meeting will be held in the Presbyterian Building. Pastors, Sunday school superintendents and leaders of young people's societies should be especially interested in these anniversary exercises.

A CHINESE IDOL DAY

The processions carrying idols in Chinese villages quite make one think of similar processions carrying the images of saints in our own enlightened land. Dr. F. R. Whepley, Jr., describing the annual idol festival in a small village near Hong Kong, writes: "The three idols had all been retouched and repainted so as to look clean. The priests were arrayed in brilliant red gowns and hoods, but there seemed to be no great dignity attached to the performance, for one was shamelessly drunk. They supervised the placing of the idols in special chairs, which had been gayly decorated, and then boys picked them up and started to carry them through the streets of the town. Cannons were fired as they started to carry them, and a constant discharge of firecrackers was kept going. Others pounded brass gongs and drums as the procession went along, here and there some one came to the door and asked that they come in and drive the devils out of their house, which was of course done and paid for on the spot. In between houses they carried the idols on a run and seemed to think it a great joke. As soon as the end of the street was reached all the noise stopped and all hurried back to the temple where a lottery was being conducted. That night a theater was run nearly all night and will be while the celebration lasts. This is the great festival of the year." It sounds as noisy and "heathenish" as Coney Island.

TEN DOLLARS FOR A WORLD MINUTE

The Congregationalists have worked out a new scheme to make people realize what their gifts accomplish. They have reckoned out that the work of their church costs ten dollars a minute. So the slogan for their benevolence canvass this year is "Every Ten Dollars Makes a World Minute Yours." Ten dollars will support for one minute twenty missions, eight hundred and twenty-five missionaries, fifty-six hundred native workers, twelve hundred and fifty schools with their eighty thousand pupils, and seventy-nine hospitals in foreign countries, while at the same time at home it will support nearly fourteen hundred missionaries, help to build one hundred and eighty-one churches, to organize forty new churches, and support thirty-five colleges, academies and schools, and two hundred and fifteen mission churches. It will do even more than that. It will support the educational program of the denomination in the colleges and will care for the Church's seven hundred pensioners. All this is done for ten dollars a minute. Who would not buy a minute?

BRITISH HELP AGAINST LIQUOR SMUGGLING

Last week Ambassador Harvey put a period to his work as our representative at the Court of St. James by securing the approval of the British government to a treaty which would allow the American authorities to search British vessels for liquor outside the three-mile limit of territorial waters. Hitherto vessels have lain off the New Jersey coast in plain sight from shore, but more than three miles out, and from them rum-running vessels have landed liquor on our coasts. The new treaty will allow the American authorities to search British vessels anywhere within an hour's sail of our shore. No specific distance is set, but such a provision means anything from ten to fifteen miles. Our own government will affirm that it accepts the three-mile limit for territorial waters except for purposes of prohibition enforcement. The United States has never officially recognized this principle hitherto. The agreement also provides that the United States will allow British liners to carry liquor under seal into American ports. It is understood that the Americans will use their new right of search reasonably. They will not stop trans-Atlantic liners and other vessels which are of established reputation. Their whole effort will be directed against rum runners. In order to make the new provision really effective it should be extended to all countries. Since England, the greatest maritime country in the world, has accepted it, probably lesser nations will be ready to do so. If other nations do not, the rum runners will be able to transfer their registry to other flags. America will much appreciate the British action, for hitherto the British government has not appeared especially inclined to be helpful to the United States in enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment. Of course, the agreement will have to be confirmed by the Senate. There is a little question whether the Eighteenth Amendment will allow the bringing of liquor into our ports, even under seal. That matter will have to go before the Supreme Court.

THE BRITISH IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

The Premiers of the self-governing British dominions have been holding an important conference at London for the last month. The self-governing dominions are Canada, Newfoundland, the Union of South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, India and the Irish Free State. The last, of course, is represented for the first time. The status of India is somewhat different from that of the other dominions. It is represented by the British Secretary of State for India and two Indians, one representing the Indians under direct British rule and the other representing the semi-independent states, but neither of them elected by the Indians themselves. The conference welcomed the suggestion that the various parts of the Empire should give a preferential tariff to each other, in order to help the dominions as well as

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

Great Britain. It also approved the extension of the American right of search of vessels for illegal liquor to a limit beyond the three-mile line. One of the most difficult questions before the conference was the right of Indians to settle in other parts of the Empire. The Indians want complete equality with all other British subjects. In the case of the British colony of Kenya on the east of Africa, just north of the Equator, the British have recently very strictly limited their rights. That decision has made the Indians very sensitive about their position. The question of Indian immigration into Newfoundland, Ireland and New Zealand is virtually academic. In Canada, British Colombia has restricted the Indians' political rights; otherwise they have full legal rights. Sydney Bruce, Premier of Australia, speaking at London, absolutely declined to depart from the Australian idea of a "white Australia." But the Indians were most concerned with the attitude of South Africa. Already in the Province of Natal they outnumber the whites. The one and a half million white inhabitants of South Africa are confronted by six million blacks within their bounds. If the Indians might come into the country freely, they would in a comparatively short time probably also outnumber the British and Dutch. Practically all the premiers said that their objection to the Indian was due to economic and not racial grounds. That makes their objection a little more palatable to the Indians, but even so the question of Indian rights is liable to make more and more trouble in the British Empire. It is one outcropping of what may be the most dangerous question to confront the world before the end of the twentieth century.

ANDREW BONAR LAW

Andrew Bonar Law, late Premier of Great Britain, who died October 30th, was a son of the manse. His father, the Rev. James Law, was a Presbyterian minister in New Brunswick, Canada. He named his son for a brother of the distinguished hymn writer, Horatio Bonar. When Mr. Law finished his schooling in Glasgow at the age of sixteen he entered the employ of his uncle, head of the iron working firm of William Kidston and Sons. In due time he became a partner in one of the largest iron manufacturing and exporting houses in the Scotch metropolis. In 1900 he retired from active business and went into politics. He became a member of the House of Commons. There, as all his biographers note, he took an obscure seat far back in the House. A little spare man, there was nothing about him at first to attract attention, but when a question involving trade and tariffs came up Mr. Law rose to speak. He poured out a mass of statistics, interpreted clearly, all bearing on the point which he wanted to establish. When he sat down the House realized that it had in its membership a man who knew trade conditions better than any man on the Treasury Bench. His advance thereafter was very rapid. In 1911, when the agitation against Balfour forced his withdrawal from the leadership of the Conservative Party, neither Walter Long nor Austen Chamberlain could command the leadership of the party. Bonar Law was elected as a compromise on whom all could unite. But even then the man in the street asked in mystification, "Who is Bonar Law?" When Asquith was forced out of the premiership during the war the King summoned Bonar Law to form a new cabinet. Law, however, insisted that Lloyd George was the right man to head the new government. So the new cabinet formed with Lloyd George as Premier and Bonar Law as Chancellor of the Exchequer. When finally Lloyd George fell in 1922, Bonar Law won the general election on a platform of tranquillity, and so reached one of the two most powerful offices in the world. Failing health compelled him to relinquish it after only six months of office. That six months was marked by the funding of the British debt to America and by nothing else of particular note. Bonar Law was a victim of cancer of the throat, complicated by pneumonia at the last. A very humble-spirited, quiet man, a marked contrast to his predecessor, with his brilliance and his shiftiness, Bonar Law was the sort of man that the English wanted after their experience with Lloyd George. They knew where they could lay their hands on him, that he would not suggest one remedy to-day and another tomorrow, that he was dependable. While a shrewd and sometimes a sharp debater, personally he was a soul against whom no man could nourish enmity.

PROSPECTS FOR THE CONFERENCE

The French answer to the British invitation to a conference in regard to reparations has not been officially communicated to the United States, but Premier Poincaré speaks as though he expected to limit the inquiry strictly to Germany's present capacity to pay, new methods of payment, the renovation of German finance, and a new monetary system. Such limitations would not be acceptable to the United States and it is doubtful whether we should go into a conference, even unofficially, if it were so narrowly confined. In the Rhineland the firm stand of the British against the Separatists has led to the Belgians driving out the Separatist mercenaries from Aix. We may expect to see the idea of a separate Rhineland die a natural death. In Germany the Socialists have withdrawn from the Stresemann cabinet. Whether that means that the latter will fall or not remains to be seen. At this writing it takes from one to one and a quarter trillion German marks to make a dollar. The Germans are printing a new kind of currency inscribed, "4 marks 20 pfenigs gold equals one dollar," with the promise that this will be repaid the bearer with seventy per cent. premium on September 2, 1935. This new "stable currency" is extremely sought after and for the moment is at a premium even over real dollars. Lloyd George's speeches here have been a real factor in making more popular the Administration's present move to take some part in the discussion of Europe's vital questions.

THE ECONOMIC CRISIS IN THE EUROPEAN CHURCHES

One cannot study at first-hand the conditions confronting the churches in many parts of Central Europe to-day without being stirred to the depths. The situation in some areas is too pitiful to be fully credible to those who have not seen it with their own eyes. In Hungary the economic stringency occasioned by rising prices and a falling currency means that hundreds of city pastors whose parishes are made up of working people and the salaried middle class are receiving, according to Bishop Ravasz, of Budapest, no more than two or three dollars a month. In Germany the situation is heart-rending. In many districts, notably Saxony, where the revenue of the state has been completely cut off, almost every pastor is said to be working every day in a factory in order to keep body and soul together. The lot of the old ministers, indeed of all elderly people of the middle class, is tragic beyond words. The utter collapse of the mark means that the competence which they had saved for their declining years is swept away. The amount that meant a comfortable income for their declining years will now not buy a single loaf of bread. On July 23 the mark stood at one million two hundred thousand to the dollar; at the end of August it was around five million to the dollar; in September it was one hundred and fifty million. All this within eight weeks! Such a situation seems a joke to the American tourist, but means hunger and despair for the great rank and file of the middle class.

EUROPEAN NEED: AMERICAN OPPORTUNITY

In some countries the Protestant groups, being small minorities, are subject indirectly to discriminations that weaken the Church still further on the economic side and threaten its very existence. The Reformed Church in Rumania is made up of Hungarians who before the Versailles Treaty were a part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. According to the Peace Treaty equal treatment is guaranteed to all racial, linguistic and religious minorities. But, in the light of evidence too clear to admit of doubt, it appears that this provision of the Peace Treaty for the protection of minorities is practically nullified in Rumania by certain land reform and housing legislation. If the land reform bill, which professes to provide the landless peasants with the surplus of great landed estates, applied to all alike, no objection could be raised. But it does not. The law was issued in two different forms, one for the old territory of Rumania and the other for the new territory. In the case of the latter, but not the former, the law is confiscatory, providing that the landowner can retain a maximum of only five hundred acres of arable land, which may be reduced even to thirty acres. And the owner is indemnified at the rate of 1914 prices, which, due to the collapse of the currency, is not more than one five-hundredth part of present values. This process of expropriation threatens not only to impoverish the Protestant population of Transylvania, but applies also to the landed property of the churches. Against such incredible difficulties our fellow Christians in Europe are struggling heroically. But they must have help, generous and immediate. To deal in any effective way with this problem obviously requires some central agency in Europe, and it is now at hand in the Central Bureau for the Relief of the Evangelical Churches of Europe. It has the confidence of our fellow Christians in Europe. It was warmly endorsed by the meeting at Zurich of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. But the Bureau cannot do its work without the most generous support from the American churches. To come to the help of European Protestantism in the hour when it is facing the greatest crisis of modern times is as clear a duty as to maintain foreign missionary stations in Asia. It is a ground of great satisfaction that Rev. Chauncey W. Goodrich, the honored pastor of the American church in Paris for many years, is now to be in this country, associated with the Federal Council as the representative of the European churches, seeking for them the help which the American churches should rejoice to give.

A GREEK REFUGEE SETTLEMENT COMMISSION

The Council of the League of Nations has appointed a Greek Refugees Settlement Commission with Henry Morgenthau, formerly our Ambassador to Turkey, as chairman. Greece to-day has to look out for the housing and rehabilitation of a million Greek refugees from Eastern Thrace and Asia Minor and for more than a hundred thousand Armenians. The League of Nations Commission will attempt to raise an international loan of approximately twenty-five million dollars to put the Greeks on their feet. We trust that the United States will help largely in this loan. Probably most of those who read these words are aware that during the war we arranged with Greece to grant her a loan of forty-eight million dollars, of which we only paid fifteen million. We are morally bound by that agreement, even though we may have found holes through which we could get away from carrying it out. Here is an opportunity for the government to rehabilitate itself. In the meanwhile, who will look out for the Armenian refugees?

INTER-RACIAL FRIENDLINESS IN THE SOUTHERN PRESS

A recent conference of editors in Virginia drafted a statement in regard to the duty of the press in helping to maintain friendly and just relations between the white and colored people. Since then more than fifty other editors of leading dailies in North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi and Louisiana have attached their signatures to the statement. Practically every man to whom it was presented signed it without question, so that it may be taken that the statement fairly represents the present attitude of the Southern press. The statement is as follows:

In the attainment and maintenance of improved inter-racial relations in our Southern States we believe that a policy of co-operation between the more thoughtful of both races is fundamental, this being the antithesis of antagonism and polemic discussion.

Mutual helpfulness between whites and blacks should be encouraged; the better element of both races striving by precept and example to impress the interdependence of peoples living side by side, yet apart.

The Negroes of the South are largely dependent upon the white press for current news of the day. It would be well if even greater effort was made to publish news of a character which is creditable to the Negro, showing his development as a people along desirable lines. This would stimulate him to try to attain to a higher standard of living.

We do not believe that education suited to the needs of the individual of any race is harmful. It is a generally accepted fact that in both races if the entire mass were educated, industrial problems would adjust themselves automatically and the less fit of either race would find the work and place for which he was best equipped. It has been authoritatively stated that the Negro demand would absorb all teachers, preachers, physicians and lawyers the schools may turn out.

The influence of the thoughtful men of both races should be invoked in the effort to establish and assure equality before the law for Negro defendants in all criminal trials.

Abatement of mob rule and its crimes is an aim to which all good citizens should pledge their support.

In the harmonious co-operation of the thoughtful and exemplary men and women of both races lies the prospect of larger understanding and better interracial relations.

Anyone familiar with the South knows that a real change has already come over much of the Southern press in dealing with Negroes. It was a very great advance in some Southern towns when the newspapers began to publish notices of colored church services and of the meetings of colored people's associations. It was something quite new when papers began to print articles describing the good work done perhaps in a pig club by a Negro boy or the prize dress made by a colored girl. The new notice of the Negro in the white press of the South has proven a real factor in acquainting the two races with each other in a normal way. It is no longer true that only by committing crimes can a colored man get into the columns of Southern papers.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE MENU FOR GOLDEN RULE SUNDAY

We have already spoken of the suggestion made by the Near East Relief that we all observe Sunday, December 2, as Golden Rule Sunday, eating a dinner such as the Near East orphans eat, and sending the money we save thereby to the Near East Relief. President Coolidge endorses the idea. In a letter to the Near East Relief he says:

It is with a good deal of satisfaction that I commend your proposal to observe an International Golden Rule Dinner Sunday on the second of December, 1923. I feel sure that this suggestion will meet with very widespread approval and will bring more closely to mind the charitable requirements of those who are prosperous to those who are in adversity. It suggests not only a practical method for help, but the highest expression of sympathy, by sharing for a time the privations of others.

Ex-Premier Clemenceau, Prince Carl of Sweden, Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, Premier Gonatas of Greece, Paul Hymans, former Foreign Minister of Belgium, and Mlle Alice Masaryk, daughter of the President of Czechoslovakia, are among the prominent people in other countries who propose to observe the day personally. The Near East Relief sends out the following list of the food used for seven days at the Beirut orphanages. It will assist housewives in preparing menus for Golden Rule Sunday:

BREAKFASTS:	DINNERS:
All bread (10 to 25% corngrits) desired.	Rice Pilaff once.
Tea four times a week.	Pilaff bulgour once.
Tea with condensed milk once.	Potato with meat once.

THE AMERICAN UNIVERSITY AT CAIRO

Dr. Charles R. Watson, President of the American University at Cairo, has been released by the university for the first half of the current academic year in order to secure funds in America. The United Presbyterians, the only American missionaries at work in Egypt, appreciated before the war that if they were to make Christianity count among the leaders of Egypt it was necessary to have a first-rate Christian university. The government had started a University of Egypt whose prestige would soon have left the mission schools in the shade. With the co-operation of the Reformed Church they worked out a plan for an independent interdenominational Christian university. During the war it was impossible to do more than make the university an institution on paper. Since then it has really got under way. It now occupies an old palace in the neighborhood of the government buildings in Cairo and has the promise of becoming a great institution. Its enrollment last year was about two hundred, of whom a hundred and sixty were Egyptians. Already the university is insisting on a high academic standard. It rejected forty-seven per cent. of those who applied for admission this year. The standing it has already reached in the community may be judged by the fact that at its first commencement five ministers from the King's cabinet; the Governor of Cairo; Prince Mohammed Ali, the leading member of the royal family; and, perhaps most remarkable of all, the head Sheikh of the ancient Azhar University, were present. The Prince, who is a brother of the ex-Khedive, and who himself has been an exile for three years and is very popular with the people, rushed to the platform at the close of Dr. Watson's commencement address to shake hands with him, while the crowd went wild. What those on the ground think of the work and need of the university is evidenced by the following letter from our American Minister:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, OF AMERICA, CAIRO, EGYPT

My Dear Dr. Watson:

May 25, 1923.

After traveling over almost the entire world, I know of no place where the missionaries are scoring for the things that are really worth while as they are doing in the Near East, particularly in Egypt.

If our people at home, therefore, desire the harvest here to be one hundred per cent. to the good, let them give liberally to this mighty cause for righteousness, which is being taught by these self-sacrificing godly men and women—the missionaries.

I think I might say that just now our people should interest themselves in the American University at Cairo, in a way and manner as they have done with Robert College at Constantinople, and the great American University at Beirut; for most certainly the opportunities to do superlative work along the lines which I have noted, are unsurpassed in this metropolis, numbering nearly one million souls.

Sincerely and faithfully yours,

J. MORTON HOWELL.

The university has as yet no dormitory. It can as yet give no courses to fit men for commerce, law or scientific agriculture. Its endowment, some one said, amounts to one hundred and fifty dollars! Dr. Watson between now and February wants to raise four hundred and thirty thousand dollars. Fifty thousand of that would supply the funds still needed for the current academic year; ninety-five thousand dollars would go to the budget for 1924-1925; forty thousand would settle the present debt on the property; fifty thousand would go toward the purchase of land outside the city for the agricultural department; one hundred and twenty thousand of it would be for the building of an auditorium sufficiently large to accommodate the students and moderate sized audiences from the Cairo community. That leaves only seventy-five thousand dollars for endowment. Those who are interested can communicate with Dr. Watson at 1120 Land Title Building, Broad and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia, Pa.

are well aware of the chaos in this department of human activity. You know that currency has reached the vanishing point in Germany, that Italy is meeting her fixed charges with borrowed money, that France has not faced her debt problem, that Great Britain taxes her resources to their furthest limit to reduce her vast obligations, that many of the other European states have no means at their command to discharge their immense liabilities. But far more serious than these liabilities is the loss of credit, which indicates the loss of confidence, and both are due to the loss of character. Look where you will in Europe, the last and worst spectacle is not commercial failure, but moral failure; the collapse of those intrinsic qualities which seem less able to endure the assaults of peace than the trials of war.

Fault-finding with these deplorable calamities by more fortunate Americans gets the world nowhere. Wherever you find demoralization, there are its causes. Some are near, some remote, but all should be ascertained in a scientific and a sympathetic temper. The superficial treatment of deep and aggravated distresses is worse than useless; and in the sad crisis now before us it is well nigh criminal. It is a sobering reflection that had the United States inherited European politics, nationalism and economics, she might have fared as badly as the peoples of that continent. Her recent beginnings, isolation and hitherto exhaustless natural resources have given her immunity from countless wrongs and disasters which our fellow-men across the Atlantic did not always create, and so cannot always control.

Let us beware of the patronizing pride fostered by circumstances if we would have a clear vision of world affairs. Nearly all educated people are troubled by the fear that the limits of population have been reached in New York City, and that its extension must mean its deterioration as a place for human residence. Yet as soon as one leaves that city he enters upon a comparatively sparsely populated area, stretching three thousand miles westward to the Pacific Ocean, and capable of sustaining with ease about ten times the present number of people in this country. Suppose, however, that the congestion of New York City prevailed throughout the United States! Who can question the severity of the problems that would ensue upon such a congestion? And unless we are greatly mistaken, it is the congestion of Europe, especially in her manufacturing states, that makes much of her misery. If the white inhabitants of Europe and America, of South Africa and Australia could be redistributed upon a predetermined basis, the results might insure our present form of civilization for an indefinite period to come. There are millions of square miles of fertile territory in Canada, New Zealand, Australia and South Africa, not to speak of our western commonwealths, which are largely undeveloped because they are uninhabited. Climate, soil, products, minerals, in numerous instances equal and in some instances surpass those of the countries that teem with people who are treading one another into the earth. The relations of nations become strained, treacherous, and even villainous, because of the struggle to survive. Their food supplies are so distant that a year's blockade starved Germany and three years' blockade beat down her sixty millions to the dust. At one moment during the late war, notwithstanding her incomparable sea power, Great Britain faced the same outcome. The ideal of self-sustaining states, contented within their respective boundaries, and free from the menace of invasion, can hardly be realized as long as the

Over-Population and Despair

NOTHING is easier in these days than to deride the faith which persists; which believes in an approaching age of righteousness; a new birth of social and national life; a reunion of science and religion; a purification of human ideals and practices. Ominous figures, prominent in Church and State, and in the realms of learning and trade, warn us that there is no good time coming. Europe, the mother continent of our western civilization, prolific of mighty men and mightier deeds, according to the prophets of despair is now in a decadent condition. Her time-honored institutions are crumbling, her lofty ambitions are wrecked, her eager hopes of "another world after the war" are a mockery. Those who believe that Christendom will survive cannot indulge delusions about its desperate condition, nor neglect the many and weighty evidences which sustain the gloomy conclusions to which we refer. They force their terrible meanings upon the most casual observer and compel him to speak cautiously about the possible outcome of present events and tendencies. If after they have been duly considered one remains optimistic of the future, it will at least be a reasoned optimism, dependent for its existence upon the full acknowledgment of prevalent evils and candid dealings with them. Financial questions bulk largely in the public eye because they are associated with our daily bread. You white race owns a house of a thousand rooms and packs the majority of its people into a dozen of those rooms.

Unemployment increases in volume where the main industries are either stationary or in decline because of the lack of material. Take the case of Britain. She has a splendid political organization, and a social system which, despite grave drawbacks, is the best in Europe, if not in the world. Her throne has increased its prestige and usefulness while nearly all other monarchies have been eclipsed or abolished. The most cursory survey of this great nation convinces us of its inherent integrity, respect for law and fine sense of honor. Her relations with the Free State of Ireland are progressing favorably, her rule over the attached dependencies of the Crown is salutary. Her daughter states showed what they felt toward her in 1914 and the following years of conflict. Her possessions have widened by leaps and bounds since 1918. Yet she has since the signing of the Paris Treaty had a million wage earners upon her hands whom her industries were unable to absorb. This army of the unemployed is without parallel in her history, and nearly every member of it is a liability. Millions of dollars are paid weekly in doles to keep these non-producers from actual starvation. Some of them have bidden work good-bye and will not undertake it again. Why live in this hand-to-mouth fashion? Why breed such extensive demoralization? Why lower the morale of a noble and a free people when nothing but the sea separates the surplusage in question from competency and productive power? Germany is also suffering from over-population. In their anxiety to lead the world her statesmen overloaded the nation and taxed the natural capacities of the land beyond all reason. The consequences were that in their demand for an outlet they broke down all barriers of religion and law and let loose destructive forces which consumed the wealth of nations. Defeated in war, compressed within still narrower limits, having lost her shipping and foreign investments, her openings for emigration and trade, one wonders what Germany can best do. Should the former policies obtain, and she proceed to crowd the new generation of Germans within the confines of the present boundaries, the old troubles will be repeated. Surely the decadence of Oriental empires should teach the Occidental nations a more excellent way. What is needed to-day is not less but more migration. It is high time for the human race to resume pilgrimage; for other Mayflowers to sail; for a large transfer of people to the untenanted portions of the planet, where fresh assimilations can be made and fresh lines of civilization pursued. If twenty millions of Britons and Germans, to say nothing of a few millions more of Belgians and Hollanders, could agree to colonize South Africa alone, Europe might be released to cultivate her soil and dismantle her military array.

Of course, the obstacle is ethnical in its nature. Britons, we are reminded, will be English, and Germans German to the bitter end. But is this a valid argument? Admitting the tenacity of blood, ideals are still more tenacious. It is conceded by Europeans that the United States is the cherished child of Time. All prognostics of her decay and dissolution have been repudiated. The little one whose democracy was scorned by the wise and the great of the eighteenth century has become a great nation. Macaulay's prediction that when all the land was occupied and its material privileges ended our popular sovereignty would degenerate into anarchy has been completely falsified. Nobody quotes the great historian on that matter now except from curiosity. Yet here we have absorbed manifold types, some of which were highly diversified—Slav, Teuton, Latin, Celtic, Anglo-Saxon, Scandinavian, Jew and Gentile have blended into a measurable homogeneity of tastes, habits and sympathies. The point of saturation may have been reached in this marvelous process. We may not wisely proceed to introduce additional elements. But the fact that so many elements have been introduced, and in three centuries conformed to given fundamental standards of citizenship, is fatal to the supposedly insurmountable barrier of blood. It can be thrust aside by a common mind, a common purpose, and a common life, dictated by lawful freedom in an advantageous environment. If there were a dozen United States located in the strategic places we have enumerated the weight of population would be balanced and become a boon. At present it is altogether disproportionate and a curse. The lurid light streaming from the crowded cities and centers of Europe, and commencing to flash intermittently from some of our overgrown cities here, is a beacon of warning. It shows us toil without reward, misery as the general lot, social iniquities resting on unrequited labor and unpitied sufferings. It reveals revolution in its natural haunts, the dangerous contempt of the wasteful and well-to-do, and the dehumanizing envy and hate of the ill-to-do. Every species of human vermin breeds in spots where God intended men and women to be the architects of their gracious fortunes. These are the so-called masses, every one precious in the sight of their Maker, who have been at the call of arrogant princes and sanguinary triflers with flesh and blood. Considered merely from its human side, the problem is, of a complete resetting of nations upon the foundation of a new idealism, in territories where that idealism can have a living chance. If there were no land to man, or no men to man it, the plea we make would be futile. But the exodus it suggests, if gradually effected, would give the white race a stability which, so far as we can see, is otherwise unattainable.

Social Service

THERE is more of what is usually regarded as social service, in the shape of philanthropic work, done in the world to-day than ever before. But the outstanding fact nevertheless is that the deplorable results with which these many agencies deal are still being produced, and on a scale on which it is impossible to cope with them. There are more men wounded every day in the struggle of life than all the Good Samaritans in the world can deal with. What is needed is some power that will stop the production of the evil. The people who take the Good Samaritan as an adequate type of Christian, and what he did as a sufficient demand upon them, have done Christianity and themselves and the world a great wrong. The first sphere in which a man should think of serving others is the sphere in which he works for himself. Things will never be right until the artisan can look upon his daily toil, the business man upon commerce, the professional man upon his professional work, as the sphere in which he must first and foremost be a social servant. If in these spheres he is first of all a self-server, he will help to create more misery and wretchedness in the world than all the so-called social workers can relieve. The practical problem for Christianity is, how to Christianize the ordinary life, how to make work, business, industry, professions, a real social service. The demand comes up at once against what has operated as the mainspring of commerce and industry since the industrial revolution. Self-interest first, the pursuit of private gain, the profit-making motive, has not only been the practice, but it has been the declared and defended theory of the system under which we have been working from that time. Adam Smith formulated it in the early days of the factory system. It was sincerely believed by many that the best way to increase the national wealth was to let every man get rich in his own way as quickly as he could. For this purpose all obstructions must be cleared out of his way. There must be freedom of contract, whether the contract was fair or not. It might be a contract between a rich man and poor one, between a strong man and a weak one, between an adult and a child, but in any case it must be free. There must be free trade for the same reason. Science came along very handily with one invention after another, all of which were bought by those who were able to buy them, and the benefits were not equitably distributed. On the top of all this came a false interpretation of Darwinism with a very comfortable theory to the men at the top that they were there by the operation of the very laws of Nature, as those who were at the bottom were also in their place by natural law. The system had a tremendous initial success of its kind, wealth greatly accumulated, business expanded enormously at home and abroad.

We often hear in this country that this is the system that has made England what it is. And it is true that England's greatness and prosperity were built up by making private gain, not social service, the mainspring of industry. But what were this greatness and prosperity? They never belonged to the English people as a whole. They were but the accumulated wealth of a few, leaving the vast majority in poverty. The English people as a whole have never been well off, never been comfortable under this system. In the years immediately before the war one-ninth of the population took one-half of the whole national income. Other two-ninths took nearly three hundred million pounds. The remaining amount was divided between two-thirds of the population, which meant twenty-five shillings per family per week, after deducting for sickness and occasional unemployment. Can anyone look upon this kind of business as, in a Christian sense, a social service? An article in the present number of the "Hibbert Journal" by a Japanese says: "Fifty years ago the word 'civilization' was a fascination to all Japanese and it was considered an urgent duty to usher this splendid stranger into the midst of society. But after she had entered she proved to be rather a harsh and cold miser, always thinking of money and of labor, at least to the great mass of the people, to whom she brought only toil and poverty." This coincides with the testimony of a Japanese statesman quoted by Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Webb in the "Decay of Capitalistic Civilization." The statesman said that the introduction of the system into Japan had brought in its train an ever-growing class of destitute persons—a class quite unknown in the old Japan of the daimio and the rice cultivator. "This destitution," he added, "is the price which Japan has had to pay for increasing the personal wealth of her leading citizens, and for becoming a world power." What the West gave to Japan was not a Christian social order in which all business and industries and work would be conducted first and foremost as a social service, but an order in which the few could become rich and powerful at the expense of the many. In our own country before the war all the investigators told us that nearly one-third of our population was living close down to the poverty line. Look at things in England to-day! We have a large rich idle class living by owning not by serving, a large poor class idle by compulsion, we have huge numbers working but scarcely living, while we have many others working at things which are so little wanted that a great army of advertisers are kept busy to try and make people think they want them. Such is the chaos which has resulted from making selfish interest and a pursuit of private gain the mainspring of activity. Nor is there any remedy for it unless we can change over to a new principle, which is the Christian principle of common service in daily life.

Now is this a question for the individual or a question for society? Can it be accomplished through individual action or collective action? Surely both. It should come home to every workman that no legislation can bring about improved conditions without improved work, and improved work will be work into which more conscience is put, and work pervaded by the idea of service to the community. On the other hand, businesses and industries should also be organized on the basis of community service first. We should give the laborer the chance of doing his work for the good of the community, and not for the mere profit of the few, and then we should insist upon his doing it. In this, as in every reform, we must combine individual with social action, work from center to circumference, and from circumference to center.

A good beginning would be to recognize that social service must be regarded as service rendered in the work we do for ourselves, i.e., the work we do for ourselves must be done in such a way as to truly serve society. The main motive of all business, industry and professional work should be the rendering of service, and the service rendered should be the test of its success. The test of successful business now is financial profit. The business itself may be good, and the man conducting it may be honest and fair and doing his best, but the test of his success will be that he can make it pay. This is not so in medicine or in art or in the ministry. Doctors, artists and ministers may be as keen for money as any business man, but their success in their work is never settled by the money question. A successful doctor or a successful artist may get a large income, a successful minister may get a good salary, but no one would recognize the success of either by the money he gets. The success of the doctor must always be with his patients. An artist is judged successful or otherwise by the estimate of the quality of his work made by those who understand. And no man would be called a good minister simply because he had a large salary, whereas a business man is considered a good business man if he makes a great deal of money. What a teacher would mean by having a good year would be that his scholars had made good headway. This is the standard we must bring into commerce and industry. The business must come to be judged by the kind of commodities it turns out, and by the kind of men the making of those commodities tends to produce. It is the reaction of all and the quality of the human life, and the service rendered to the world, that must become the test of success.

And whatever may be needed in the way of changing systems, let us not forget how much still lies on the hands of individuals to do. Our first social service should be our own work, done as well as we can do it, having taken, and still taking, good care to qualify ourselves for it. No social service done outside our work can justify us, if in the work itself we are behaving selfishly or negligently. If a carpenter scamps his work, no help he can render to his neighbors outside will make him a true social servant. If a plumber covers up defective joints, no effort that he can put into any philanthropic institution makes up for it. The first social service of a carpenter is good carpentering, the first social service of a plumber is good plumbing. A mother who does her mothering well, even if she does nothing in outside society, is rendering what is perhaps the most important social service of all. Similarly, a minister who neglects his ministry cannot make up for that by any amount of activity outside it, however helpful that activity may be. Whenever one meets a workman in any sphere who takes a pride in the quality of the work he does, it is exhilarating. Someone wanted to take a rise out of a man who had got on in the world by saying, "I remember the time when you blacked my father's boots." The reply was, "Sir, did I not black them well?" To be engaged in work which is a real service to society, and to do it at our best for the sake of that service, is to live a noble life, however lowly the sphere. "Shew thyself a workman approved unto God," said Paul to Timothy. What better joy could await us at the end of life than the consciousness that in all our work we had subordinated self to the social good? Only such a life will win the Master's commendation, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." T. R. W.

Another Kind of Hero

A GENERATION ago almost everybody read, at least once, Carlyle's great book on heroes. He gave us the hero as prophet, as priest, as poet, as king, and he made us realize that these heroes have been the real makers of human society. We should like to add a chapter on another kind of hero, who has, perhaps, not done much to build cities and states and church systems, but who has, almost more than anybody else, shown us the spiritual value of endurance—we mean the hero as invalid.

It is the hardest kind of heroism there is to achieve. Most of us know some man—too often it is oneself—who is a very fair Christian when he is in normal health and absorbed in interesting work, who carries a smooth forehead and easily drops into a good-natured smile, but who becomes "blue" and irritable and a storm-center in the family weather as soon as the bodily apparatus is thrown out of gear. Most of us have had a taste of humiliation as we have witnessed our own defeat in the presence of some thorn in the flesh which stubbornly pricked us, even though we prayed to have it removed and urged the doctor to hurry up and remove it.

What a hero, then, must he be, who, with a weak and broken body, a prey to pain and doomed to die daily, learns how to live in calm faith that God is good and makes his life a center of cheer and sunshine! The heroism of the battlefield and the man-of-war looks cheap and thin compared with this. We could all rally to meet some glorious moment when a trusted leader shouted to us, "Your country expects you to do your duty!" But to drag on through days and nights, through weeks and months, through recurring birthdays, with vital energy low, with sluggish appetite, with none of that ground-swell of superfluous vigor which makes healthy life so good, and still to prove that life is good and to radiate joy and triumph—that is the very flower and perfume of heroism. If we are making up a bead-roll of heroes, let us put at the top the names of those quiet friends of ours who have played the man or revealed the woman through hard periods of invalidism and have exhibited to us the fine glory of a courageous spirit.

One of the hardest and most difficult features to bear is the inability to work at one's former pace and with the old-time constructive power. The prayer of the Psalmist that his work, the contribution of his life, might be preserved is very touching—"Establish thou the work of our hands upon us, yea, the work of our hands establish thou it." What can be more tragic than the cry of Othello, "My occupation's gone!" So long as the hand keeps its cunning and the mind remains clear and creative, one can stand physical handicap and pain, but when the working power of mind or body is threatened, then the test of faith and heroism indeed arrives.

A man whose life meant much to us and whose intimacy was very precious to us made us see many years ago how wonderfully this test could be met. He was a great teacher, the head of a distinguished boys' school. He was experiencing the full measure of success, and his influence over his boys was extraordinary. He realized, as his work went on, that his hearing was becoming dull and was steadily failing. He went to New York and consulted a famous specialist. After making a careful examination the specialist said, with perfect frankness, "Your case is hopeless. Nothing can be done to check the disaster. You are hard of hearing already, but in a very short time you will have no hearing at all." Without a quaver the teacher said, "Don't you think, doctor, that I shall hear Gabriel's trumpet when it blows?" He went back to his school, learned to read lips, reorganized his life, accepted without a murmur his loss of a major sense, and finished his splendid career of work in an undefeated spirit and with a grace and joy which were envied by many persons in possession of all their powers.

All our readers will think of some "star player" in this hard game of patience and endurance, and will have watched with awe and reverence the glorious fight of some of these unrecorded heroes who won but got no valor medal. The only person who ranks higher in the scale of heroism than the hero as invalid is possibly the person who patiently, lovingly nurses and cares for some invalid through years of decline and suffering. Generally, though not always, it is a woman. Not seldom she is called upon to consecrate her life to the task, and often she gives what is much more precious than life itself. We build no monuments to daughters who uncomplainingly forego the joy of married life, who refuse the suit of love in order to be free to ease the closing years of father or mother, grown helpless; but where is there higher consecration or finer heroism? Men sometimes complain that the days of chivalry and heroism are past. On the contrary, they are more truly dawning. As Christianity ripens love grows richer and deeper, and where love appears heroism is always close at hand. Our best heroes are mothers and wives and daughters, fathers and husbands and sons.

Mr. Van Loon Recommends the Bible to the Boys

I HAVE been reading Professor Van Loon's Story of the Bible and I am not sure whether I like it or not. I have always had a prejudice against rewriting any book, whether it be Homer, Walter Scott, Dickens, or the Bible for children. It has always seemed to me too much like re-fashioning a sunset, or a mountain, or rewriting a Beethoven symphony or repainting a Sistine Madonna for children. I have no objections to writing books for children, or even making songs and pictures for the nursery, but I have always felt a sort of repugnance against touching the classics, whether in art or literature or music. It has been done to the Bible a thousand times and generally with poor results. Every year someone rewrites the Bible stories in language adapted to children. With a few exceptions the result has been ghastly. Even where there has been some literary style in the rewriting and the spirit and some of the language of the King James Version has been preserved, I have doubted whether even the boys and girls would be any more attracted to them than to the original itself.

Professor Van Loon assures us, however, right at the start, that he has no purpose whatever to rewrite the Bible. He declares that he is leaving the original text of the Bible severely alone. He admits that the King James Version is so good that it would be presumptuous for anyone to attempt to improve upon it. But he feels that the youth of to-day do not read it and will not—and he seems to doubt that even their elders read it much. This must not be, however, for one cannot be an educated man and be ignorant of the great stories, incidents and facts in the Bible. If these stories, facts and incidents can be retold in modern parlance, in the language the boy uses in camp, on the playground, with his chums, he will read, and read them with avidity. Professor Van Loon expresses a hope that this retelling of the Bible will lead the boy to read the original, but he has not much faith in this hope. Neither have I. To bring a boy up on jazz does not fit him to enjoy music—quite the contrary. But this is just what Professor Van Loon has done. He has “jazzed” the Bible, as Paul Whiteman has jazzed the classic music.

Professor Van Loon, disclaiming any motive to rewrite the Bible, says he is simply telling the Bible stories in his own words, as he might tell them to his own children gathered about his knees. He closed his Bible and then wrote the present book, making no endeavor to remember style or words. The result is a Bible sort of a la Brisbane. Mr. Brisbane's theory of editorial writing is that the people care for nothing but “jazz,” and he has the “jazz” style to perfection. Professor Van Loon runs him a close second. My own feeling, after reading the book, is that there is little of the Bible in it; but that it is a very interesting book in itself, full of lively tales and incident, calculated to hold the attention of the average boy as thoroughly as Mark Twain does in Tom Sawyer.

It is natural when Professor Van Loon is telling the dramatic stories of the Old Testament that he is at his best. Here are thrilling stories of adventure, and the most has been made of them. To one accustomed to the Biblical language, they come with something of a shock. One hardly knows where he is when he reads in the story of David and Goliath:

Quick as lightning David was upon him. He grabbed the giant's sword. He hacked at him with unexpected violence. With a single blow he cut off his monstrous head. He picked it up and carried it back to the jubilant soldiers. The Philistines fled and David was hailed as the savior of the country.

It is certainly vivid—but it is new. It is very difficult to give the meaning of either Ecclesiastes or Job to a boy. They postulate a certain fulness of human experience which youth seldom knows. The best thing to do with them is to keep them until experience interprets them. Professor Van Loon has perhaps done as well in putting them in the language of youth as anyone could do. But how about such a sentence as this, which misses the whole point of the Old Testament: “Moses decided to be the savior of his own peoples.” I always gathered from my reading of the Bible that it was God who decided that Moses should be the savior of his people, and not only preserved and trained him for that task, but irresistibly compelled him to it.

It is when Professor Van Loon comes to the New Testament that he breaks down—just as Mr. Wells did. I wonder if the time will ever come when those who seem utterly incapable of comprehending or understanding Christ will let Him alone. Even such great minds as Renan and Seeley saw only one facet of His nature, and they had studied Him for years, and they at least devoted a whole book to Him. But Mr. Wells, in his “Outline of History,” dismisses Him with a few pages—and they very weary and unprofitable—while Professor Van Loon, in telling the main incidents of His life sums up His character in such sentences as these: “He was very faithful in His religious duties”; “He was not like other people”; “His heart was filled with love for His fellow-men”—all of which sentences I could apply to a hundred of my friends. The trouble with all such characterizations as those by Mr. Wells and Professor Van Loon is that they utterly misrepresent the Gospels and Epistles to their readers. Professor Van Loon is not fair to the Bible here. Either he should give his readers the Christ the Bible portrays or leave Him out. The Christ portrayed on every page of the Gospel was the Son of God, the being in whom God was incarnate, God in Christ reconciling the world to Himself. “He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father,” is the Christ of the Bible. Simon Peter summed up the Christ the Bible portrays in his memorable words, “Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.” At least Professor Van Loon might have told the boys that the Bible tells us of one who was “Lord and Master of us all.”

Of course Boni and Liveright have put the story out in sumptuous form, as they did "The Story of Mankind." There are sixteen full-page color prints and over one hundred and fifty drawings. There is one beautiful picture of St. Paul crossing the Mediterranean. I am told that the motor boats are supplanting the square-sailed fishing boats, which have not changed one iota since the Greeks and Phœnicians scoured the Mediterranean in them two thousand years ago.

I myself stood entranced for one hour once at the harbor of Santa Maria in Southern Spain, watching these boats coming into the harbor before the wind—with full-bellied sail—exactly the same ship in which St. Paul made that expedition bringing Christ to the Western world. I shall watch with great interest the reception of the book and shall be interested in seeing how many agree with me.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Valley of Dry Bones

By the Very Reverend Howard Chandler Robbins, D.D.

Preached at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, September 23, 1923

"Then said he unto me, Prophecy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, Thus saith the Lord God. Come . . . O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live."—Ezekiel 37:9.

IN the very remarkable prophecy which we read this morning, Ezekiel foretells the resurrection of the Jewish state, which had been stricken and ruined by a devastating war. He tells of a vision in which the hand of the Lord was upon him, and carried him out and set him down in the midst of the valley which was full of bones. And the Lord said unto him, Son of man, can these bones live? And he answered, O Lord God, thou knowest. Then said he, Prophecy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, Come, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. I do not know of a more interesting passage in the Old Testament than this of Ezekiel standing in the valley of dry bones, which symbolized ruin and frustration and helplessness, and invoking there the breath of resurrection.

It may be a far cry from Judea in the sixth century before Christ to Europe in the twentieth century of the Christian era, but the parallel is there for those who care to note it. Travelers coming home from Europe are bringing with them all sorts of impressions and depressions, depending more or less upon the contacts they have made while abroad. But there is one impression which all of them, apparently, have received, and which they are pretty nearly unanimous in expressing, and that is that the old world is prostrated just now by a very paralysis of fear. To use the language of Scripture, it is as though the nations of Europe were saying in the pathetic phrase of Ezekiel, "Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost: we are cut off for our parts." The cause is not far to seek. The travelers tell us that it is fear of the future, more than any other single factor, which is hampering and retarding the convalescence of Europe; that it is rather than any militaristic design or imperialistic ambition, which is responsible for the continuance of great standing armies, for the policies which keep open the wounds of war and rub salt into those wounds, for the widening rifts between former allies, and the new and dangerous political groupings and alignments. We are told that if the peoples of the old world could only get rid of this incubus of fear, bury the hatchet, get together and trust each other, recovery would take place all along the line with astonishing rapidity. Crops are good, and crops are the basis of all physical prosperity. In spite of all the losses of the war, man-power is still abundant. The productive power of these civilized, disciplined, industrious people is incalculable, more than adequate to any ordinary demands that may be laid upon it. But this productive power is at the present time quite largely lying undeveloped because the conditions for its exercise are so unfavorable. It requires peace, real peace, not nominal peace. It requires confidence. It requires co-operation. It requires a great forthputting of common purpose, based upon a harmony and agreement of wills. And at the present time there is no possibility of such co-operation, no possibility of such common purpose, because Europe fears the future, because Europe is haunted by memories and anticipations that have stricken down its hope.

That, as I say, is the practically unanimous verdict of our returning travelers. There is no reason to doubt the substantial accuracy of it. It is quite evident that what Europe is chiefly suffering from to-day is hopelessness, fear of what the morrow may bring forth, and that what Europe needs more than any physical relief, more than any political readjustments, is this spiritual thing, a new birth of hope and confidence, a lifting up of hearts in simple trust in God. But where is this to come from? Not from within. The people of the old world are too weary, too worn by suffering and embittered by contention, to be capable of self-regeneration. The initiative must come from without. It should come from those who are less scathed by war and have less reason for being anxious and depressed: it should come from America. The old world is asking a greater thing of us than can be measured by the loosening of purse-strings. It is asking a gift of soul from us. It is asking that a great wind of faith and hope and courage may rise in the west and breathe upon these slain, that they may live.

Many appeals for material assistance have come to us from the other side, and in Belgium first, then in Poland, Austria, the Near East and Russia, our country has responded in a prompt and generous way. We have shown by our acts that we are deeply concerned in the fate of Europe, and that whatever may be the case as regards political isolation, isolation as regards sympathy does not and will not be permitted to exist. But here is an appeal much deeper, much more subtle, much more difficult to meet, seldom if ever put into words, yet real, none the less. Wistful eyes are turned to America from many lands, looking not for bread, but for breath itself, for a communication of vitality.

How can we give what we have not yet got ourselves? That is the sobering and humbling aspect of the situation. We, too, with much less reason or excuse, have our post-war psychosis of fear, with its consequent moral depression. It has been responsible for any amount of objectionable and un-American legislation, most of it by this time happily repealed. It has been responsible for outbreaks of organized mob violence such as have not been known in this country since the Civil War. The ugly doings of the Ku Klux Klan and similar organizations are manifestations of fear—fear of the Negro, fear of the immigrant, fear of the Roman Catholic Church, fear of the Jew. Fear is the only explanation of our timidity in the handling of problems of world reconstruction, our delay, for instance, in following through to a great conclusion one of the greatest and most distinctive of American traditions by giving full and unqualified adherence to the World Court. In the religious world, fear of scientific knowledge, fear of new revelations which God has made of His truth through the medium of natural sciences, is back of the so-called fundamentalist movement, with its insistence upon the impossible doctrine of the verbal infallibility of the Bible, and with its uncharitable effort to drive out of the Christian fellowship those who cannot hold this doctrine.

When one talks with individuals, the same situation is evident. One finds that three out of four of the persons one talks with are living in fear of something or other. They are afraid of draughts, afraid of infections, afraid of losing their jobs, afraid that their children will be run over, afraid of taxes or of tuberculosis, afraid of poverty or of pyorrhea. "The thing that I greatly feared is come upon me," said Job. That is a typical experience. Only too often fear appears to act as a magnet, inviting the disaster which it apprehends. At the present time, a great many people are afflicted by this fear of living. They dread the changes involved in living in a world which is full of chances and changes. They want things to go on as they have always gone. They don't like the idea of readjusting themselves to meet changed conditions. They don't like the unknown. They don't like taking risks. In a period of stress and disturbance and drastic readjustment such as the whole world is going through now, these people are miserably downcast and despondent. They succumb to an incubus of apprehension which is invariably a sign of low spiritual vitality, a sort of typhus fever of the soul.

And so it seems to me that if our country is to respond at all adequately to that great, unexpressed, pathetic appeal from the old world to the new, and if there is to rise and blow from our country that breath of hope and courage and renewed faith which is to quicken Europe, it can only be after we ourselves have experienced some kind of revival of faith, of stalwart optimism, and of the spirit of adventurous trust in God in which, three hundred years ago, the foundations of the nation that we love were laid. What is this human life of ours? It is not an endless maintenance of the status quo ante. It is not a series of dull, drab repetitions. It is an adventure of the spirit. It is a school for the training and development of character. And, somehow, character appears to thrive best, and to develop most vigorously when it is exposed to all manner of hazards and vicissitudes. Vicissitude develops resourcefulness and courage. The men and women who have made the most of their earthly lives are the men and women who have had the spirit of pioneers. The men and women who have done most have been the men and women who have dared most. We think of Columbus, sailing with brave eyes fixed upon the far horizons of an uncharted ocean. We think of Livingstone patiently threading the jungles of Africa and laying a new continent open to the world. Trust in God sustained them. It was belief in God, religious faith, which quickened in them the spirit of adventure.

That is what is needed now, a pioneer spirit to cope with what are really pioneer conditions. It is the splendor of our times that they constitute one of His great building eras, that the future of the world for generations to come depends upon what men think and will and do to-day. This is a world the keynote of which is creative evolution, where the future is not mechanically determined, but everlastingly in suspense. It is a world which men can alter by the forthputting of their wills. O new world, still uncreated, still undetermined, what will, what purpose, what forces, what convictions shall go into the making of you?—that is the question which is uppermost to-day in every generous mind. I believe that to a very great, perhaps a preponderatingly great, extent the answer to that question lies with our colleges and our churches, and that if they will be true to their own inherent idealism there will go forth from them a breath of inspiration which will carry, sooner or later, to the world the bright contagion of a quickening faith.

The Northern Methodist churches are already electing their representatives to the General Conference to be held next year. A little while ago a country Methodist minister in California wrote to some of his fellow country clergymen suggesting that instead of electing district superintendents and big city pastors to the General Conference they should elect ordinary pastors. The response has been almost overwhelming. The movement has spread widely through the Methodist Church, to the consternation of bishops and district superintendents. District superintendents have found themselves defeated time after time and the next Conference will have a materially different aspect from most of its predecessors. The pastors' bloc, as it is called, may control the next meeting. Although the party is referred to as the pastors' bloc, really it appears to be made of country ministers—a rural pastors' bloc.

Great Britain and the British dominions each made available last year, $7,500,000 to assist suitable persons to emigrate overseas from Great Britain to the dominions. Beginning with this year the sum will be $15,000,000 from each of the two parties. In spite of the fact that to-day in Great Britain there are three hundred thousand men under thirty years of age registered as unemployed, in the past fourteen months only 34,500 persons have been accepted as worthy of aid and only 26,000 have actually emigrated. This is only one-fifth of the number that might be helped by the first appropriations. In the same months the British have entirely filled their quota of immigrants to the United States. The fact is that the pull to the cities is so strong that people are not anxious to emigrate to countries where practically the only way of making a living is through farming. They would rather go where manufacturing cuts a greater figure than in the great plains of Canada or Australia or South Africa.

Memorandum of the Representatives of the Church of England on Christian Unity and the Reply of the Federal Council of the Evangelical Free Churches of England

[There have been so many requests for the full text of these two momentous documents that THE CHRISTIAN WORK is reprinting them from the British papers. They are arousing much discussion in England because of the clause in the Memorandum concerning the validity of Free Church orders. Many of our readers will want to preserve these historic documents.—EDITORS.]

THE Federal Council of the Evangelical Free Churches of England, at its meeting in September, 1922, received the report of the joint conference held at Lambeth Palace, and reappointed its committee and sub-committee to continue the conferences. In so doing, in Paragraph III of its report, the Council mentioned certain "practical difficulties which yet remain to be considered." Among them was "the status of the existing Free Church ministry." Accordingly the sub-committee proceeded to give long and full consideration to this subject, and we who represent the Church of England have been asked to submit a memorandum upon it.

It will be remembered that the main object of the conferences which have been held has been to elucidate the appeal of the Lambeth Conference to all Christian people. Whatever wishes or opinions we who submit this memorandum may individually have, we consider ourselves bound by that appeal and not entitled to go beyond its statements, or what in our judgment may be legitimately inferred from them. Further, our memorandum cannot be regarded as an official interpretation of the appeal. The responsibility for what is contained in it is limited to those who present it.

We are compelled to say at the outset that our difficulty in discussing the status of the Free Church ministry has been to discover accurately what the term includes and implies, whether the phrase represents any accepted unity as to the principles which underlie this ministry, or as to the manner in which it is conferred. We do indeed most thankfully acknowledge that the Free Church members of our committee agreed with us in the statement of principles with regard to the ministry of Christ's Church, which were set forth in our first report (II 1-6). But the very full, frank and friendly conferences which we have had together made it plain that in fact within the Free Churches there have been and are very varying traditions and conceptions as to the nature of the ministry, and as to the meaning of ordination, and very varying customs as to the manner in which ordination is conferred and ministers are accredited. For example, to mention only one of these differences, although in our first report it was agreed (II 5) that "it is in accordance with apostolic practice and the ancient custom of the Church that the commission by the Church should be given through ordination with prayer and laying on of hands by those who have authority given to them to ordain," yet in fact several of the Free Churches have not used in the past and do not always now use the laying on of hands.

During our conferences we have been asked to consider

Free Church ministries prospectively—from the point of view of the conceptions and usages in which they are increasingly ready to unite—rather than retrospectively—from the point of view of conceptions and usages which have been prevalent, in the past. It is indeed a great satisfaction to think that the principles which we were able to set forth in our first report as agreed upon by us all are becoming more and more fully characteristic of the ministries of the Free Churches represented on our committee. But our difficulty is that we are specifically asked to write about the Free Church ministry as it exists. We trust that our Free Church brethren in the committee will generously appreciate the difficulty thus frankly expressed, and understand why it is not possible for us to give any single and unconditional answer to the question put before us.

In what follows in this memorandum it will be understood that we have in mind ministries which in some real measure are given and exercised in accordance with the principles set forth in our first report—ministries which rest upon a long-established order, which have been conferred by some solemn and authoritative act implying ordination to the ministry of the Universal Church and not merely commission to the ministry of a particular denomination, and which are regarded as involving a life-long vocation.

I.

Such Free Church ministries we find it impossible to regard as "invalid," that is, as null and void, or as effecting none of the purposes for which the ministry has been divinely ordained in the Church of Christ. Indeed, we wish that the terms "valid" and "invalid" could be discontinued, involving as they seem to do a knowledge of the Divine will and purpose and grace which we do not possess, and which it would be presumption to claim.

But we consider that we are entitled, by manifest tokens of Divine blessing which these ministries possess, and also by the spirit and the terms of the Lambeth Appeal about them, to go further and to say that we regard them as being within their several spheres real ministries in the Universal Church.

The Bishops, in the Lambeth Appeal, began by saying: "We acknowledge all those who believe in our Lord Jesus Christ and have been baptized into the name of the Holy Trinity as sharing with us membership in the Universal Church of Christ, which is His body." And as to the ministries of those communions which do not possess the Episcopate, they say that they do not call in question for a moment the spiritual reality of these ministries, but, on the contrary, they thankfully acknowledge that these ministries have been manifestly blessed and owned by the Holy Spirit as effective means of grace.

It seems to us to be in accordance with the Lambeth Appeal to say, as we are prepared to say, that the ministries which we have in view in this memorandum, ministries which imply a sincere intention to preach Christ's word and administer the sacraments as Christ has ordained, and to which authority so to do has been solemnly given by the Church concerned, are real ministries of Christ's word and sacraments in the Universal Church.

II.

Yet ministries, even when so regarded, may be in varying degrees irregular or defective.

The committee has already agreed in regard to the now separate churches that, "even though they be parts of the visible Church, they cannot be considered as all alike giving equally adequate expression to the Lord's mind and purpose." Such irregularities or defects may belong to the sphere of faith or discipline, and also to the sphere of ministry. There are some who consider our own ministry in one way or another defective or irregular. It is possible that even among the Free Churches themselves there may be ministries exercised by one which are regarded by another as in some respects more or less important, irregular or inadequate. In each case such judgments must be regarded as due to our several beliefs as to the mind and purpose of our Lord himself for His Church and the continuous guidance of the Holy Spirit within the Church. The existence of these differences with regard to the authority and functions of the ministry, inevitable in the present divided condition of the Church, only increases our longing for a time when, in a united Church, they may be removed.

The belief and practice of the Anglican Church are set forth in the Preface to the Ordinal contained in the Book of Common Prayer, in which it is said "that from the Apostles' time there have been these orders of ministers in Christ's Church: bishops, priests and deacons," and that "to the intent that these orders may be continued, and reverently used and esteemed, in the Church of England, no man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful bishop, priest or deacon in the Church of England, or suffered to execute any of the said functions, except he be called, tried, examined and admitted thereunto according to the form hereafter following, or hath had formerly episcopal consecration or ordination."

Thus, the Anglican Church is bound to secure the authorization of its ministers for its own congregations, and no one could be authorized to exercise his ministry among them who had not been episcopally ordained.

It is not possible in this memorandum to set forth fully the reasons for this position. But it can be said:

1. We regard the rule quoted above as much more than a mere rule of internal discipline. It embodies principles to which the Anglican Church has throughout its history adhered, and which contribute to the special position which it claims to hold in the Christian Church.

2. We cannot lose sight of the relations in which we stand to other Episcopal churches in East and West; nor can we ignore the danger of creating pain and disturbance, or even the possibility of schism, within our own communion if the rule and principle contained in the Ordinal were to be set aside.

III.

In the last section we have stated our position with the frankness which has been characteristic of our conferences. But we hope that what we have there said will be viewed as regards the present, in conjunction with what we have said in the preceding section as to the character of some at least of the Free Church ministries as real ministries of the Word and Sacrament; and, as regards the future, in conjunction with what was said in the first report of the committee (II 8, 9). We have there recognized that these ministries have a value of their own as standing for elements of Presbyterial and Congregational order which should be maintained with the episcopate as permanent elements in the order and life of the United Church. We desire that in the episcopal ordinations of the future these elements should in some real way be represented so that both our traditions and those of the Free Churches should contribute to the fulness of the future ministry of a United Church.

Moreover, we see in the movements towards union, of which our conferences have been a happy and hopeful sign, that a new situation is being created which calls for new ways in which the ministry of the Free Churches and our own may be brought into closer relations. For when circumstances arise which have no exact precedent a true principle of "economy" entitles the Church to meet them with new methods. We may quote the words of the Committee on Reunion which submitted the appeal and its accompanying resolutions to the Lambeth Conference (Report, page 141):

When men set their faces steadily towards the ideal of our appeal, and specially when negotiations for organic reunion are in progress, or, again, when a scheme of union has in any place been adopted, situations will arise in which we should all agree that new lines of action may be followed.

Thus (1) as regards the immediate present, here in England, the Convocations of Canterbury and York have endorsed the resolution of the Lambeth Conference (12 A (i)). "A bishop is justified in giving occasional authorization to ministers not episcopally ordained, who, in his judgment, are working towards an ideal of union such as is described in our appeal, to preach in churches within his diocese, and to clergy of the diocese to preach in the churches of such ministers." We earnestly hope that this resolution will be followed by action in accordance with it. (2) As regards the future, if by God's blessing any of the Free Churches and the Anglican Church were to agree to unite on the basis of the acceptance of episcopacy for the future, the Lambeth Conference (Resolution 12, A (iii)), has given its approval to the suggestions that ministers of both the uniting communions should at once be recognized as of equal status in the councils of the United Church, and that the terms of the union should include for the time being the right of non-episcopally ordained ministers to conduct services other than celebrations of the Holy Communion, and to preach in churches which possess an episcopal ministry, if licensed thereto by the bishop. But the whole subject of the arrangements which should be made for the exercise of ministry by the ministers of one of the uniting churches in the congregations of the others during the period between the time when the union has been inaugurated and the time when it would be completed by the ministries of all the churches having one common source and authority, is one which demands further and very careful consideration. We do not think it necessary to discuss this subject in the present memorandum. If our conferences are continued and the subject were to be expressly referred to us, we would be prepared to consider it. It is plain that during this period of transition there would be many inevitable irregularities and difficulties and a constant need of patience, charity and mutual consideration. But there would also be the sustaining and encouraging knowledge that each year would bring the time nearer when union would be sealed by the possession of one ministry throughout the United Church.

IV.

Finally, we would urge that it is in the light of this hope for the future rather than from the point of view of the difficulties of the present or of the provisions necessary for a time admittedly transitional that the problem of reunion must be considered. It is towards the fulfilment of this hope that we must direct our thought, our labors, and our prayers.

APPENDED NOTE—PRESENTED ON BEHALF OF THE FREE CHURCH REPRESENTATIVES ON THE JOINT CONFERENCE.

The representatives of the Federal Council of the Evangelical Free Churches of England on the sub-committee, having considered the document presented by the Anglican members as their reply to the question of the status of the existing Free Church ministries, desire to express their cordial appreciation of the spirit in which the reply is conceived. While recognizing that the responsibility for this answer must rest with the Anglican members, the representatives of the Federal Council desire to record their opinion that the document contains statements of such importance as amply to justify their hope that the Federal Council will reappoint the committee to unite with the representatives of the Church of England in further discussion of the many points that still remain to be considered.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL'S REPLY

The Federal Council of the Evangelical Free Churches of England receives the report of its committee, which contains the memorandum on "The Status of the Existing Free Church Ministry" by the Anglican members of the Joint Conference meeting at Lambeth. The Council concurs with its representatives on the Joint Conference in expressing cordial appreciation of the spirit in which this memorandum is conceived, and it has given to it respectful and careful consideration. Believing that a direct communication of this character from the Anglican representatives calls for and is entitled to some definite statement as to the attitude of the Free Churches in respect to it, the Council makes the following comments on its main positions:

1. We cordially welcome the crucial declaration that "the ministries which we have in view in this memorandum—ministries which imply a sincere intention to preach Christ's word and administer the sacraments as Christ has ordained, and to which authority so to do has been solemnly given by the Church concerned—are real ministries of Christ's word and sacrament in the Universal Church." The Lambeth Appeal itself spoke in general terms of these ministries as having "spiritual reality" and as having been "blessed and owned by the Holy Spirit as effective means of grace." It is now explicitly said of them (a) that they minister the gospel of Christ; (b) that they minister also the sacraments; and (c) that they are within the Universal or Catholic Church. If the recognition thus so unmistakably given in words were translated into unmistakable actions a great and difficult problem in reunion would be within sight of practical solution.

2. We note, however, with regret that, in the succeeding section of the memorandum, not only is this recognition not followed by recommendations for appropriate action, but the plan contemplated and required for the exercise of a full ministry within the Anglican Church is precisely that plan which would be followed and which is followed in the case of persons possessing no kind of ministry—namely, episcopal ordination. This means that what has just been conceded in the most satisfactory language is not to be given effect to in practice. Any question—either on the part of the Anglican Church or of that of the Free Churches—of "irregular" or of what may be regarded as "defective" denominational commission is quite a different matter, to be dealt with in its own proper way; but that way certainly is not ordination to the ministry of Word and Sacrament in the Church of Christ of a man already acknowledged to be in that ministry. All this seems to us manifest and even axiomatic; and we are unable to believe that the position which, at one moment, acknowledges that Free Church ministries are "real ministries of Christ's word and sacraments in the Universal Church," and at the next requires nevertheless that those in them must be ordained to the ministry of that very Word of Christ and those very Sacraments of Christ—that such a position will be found one on which our Anglican brethren, with consistency of thinking and acting, can permanently stand.

3. We turn to the grounds of this insistence on episcopal ordination and we are referred to the preface attached to the Ordinal in 1661, which laid it down that "no man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful bishop, priest or deacon in the Church of England or suffered to execute any of the said functions except he be called, tried, examined and admitted thereunto according to the form hereafter following, or hath had formerly episcopal consecration or ordination." We remark that this drastic rule, which applies to "any of the said functions," is not strictly obeyed by the Church of England to-day as regards the function of preaching; and the Lambeth Conference of 1920—as the present memorandum reminds us—expressly countenances this exception in certain circumstances. This is but one indication that we are dealing to-day not with the Anglicanism of the Restoration, which deliberately desired to exclude Nonconformists and which penalized them, but with the Anglicanism of the Lambeth Appeal, which earnestly seeks reunion and which approaches Nonconformity with friendship. But we should do injustice to our Anglican brethren who present this memorandum if we suggested that they grounded themselves merely on a clause from a preface inserted at a time more marked by controversy than by charity. They say that this preface "embodies principles to which the Anglican Church has throughout its history adhered." We submit that this is hardly accurate historically. It is well known that up to the time of this deliberately exclusive preface there were ministering in the cures of the Church of England "many"—it is Bishop Cosin's reckoning—who had not received episcopal ordination and whom the bishops did not reordain. We do not magnify these cases, which were, we admit, exceptional. But if the Church of England in the seventeenth century could receive ministers from certain reformed churches without episcopal ordination and yet did not thereby lose its catholic identity, then it could and can—so far as principle goes—in the twentieth century admit, by some method other than ordination, those whom, despite their not having had episcopal hands laid upon them, it has just formally and fully recognized as being really in the ministry of Christ's word and sacraments in the Universal Church. It could do it so far as any "principles to which the Anglican Church has throughout its history adhered" are concerned. We ask no immediate or premature answer. We believe that God's guidance of us all in this matter has not ended, and that the last word on it has not yet been said on either side. We feel deeply that this age-long and difficult problem can be solved only by some great and worthy act, inspired by courage and vision, in which men and churches are willing to take their lives in their hands for the sake of the realization of a great ideal.

II.

The Federal Council makes the above comments on the memorandum which it has received in an entirely conciliatory spirit towards what it recognizes to be a friendly as well as a sincere statement. In the interests of union, the representatives of the Free Churches have endeavored to meet their Anglican brethren at every point so far as they could do so without sacrifice of vital principle. The question of ordination is the place where we look to the Anglican Church to meet their Free Church brethren. The Council has felt that, after three years of fruitful conference, it could express its mind on this subject, as it has done, with perfect frankness. The movement towards reunion has now passed the stage when it can be dealt with simply by discussion. We have come close to the crucial issues, and must deal with them with clearness, courage and charity.

III.

The Council adds that the recognition of Free Church ministries given in the memorandum which it has considered enforces the contention which the Council has more than once emphasized, that the deliberations over union in conferences and committees should be accompanied by practical action. Since Anglican clergy and Free Church ministers are in the one Universal Church, and are ministering the same Word and the same Sacraments, then, surely, there should be more of fellowship and co-operation than there is, even though the final difficulty about ordination be not yet surmounted. The Council feels the union movement cannot—especially in the minds of the people—live entirely on private conferences and their reports; and it renews its declaration of last year that “the discussion of union should be increasingly accompanied by acts of unity between the churches.” It heartily welcomes the references to this towards the close of the memorandum. And in this connection it notes with warm appreciation the visits of the two archbishops and some of the bishops to the Free Church assemblies, and the presence of a number of Free Church preachers in cathedral and other Anglican pulpits.

IV.

The Council recognizes with deep gratitude the guidance and blessing of God in the course which the conferences have taken and the spirit by which they have been moulded. The way of reunion is not yet clear to any one of us. It is our part to seek a fuller understanding of one another in further conference and common prayer, believing that God's way will be revealed to us.

The Council reappoints the committee as follows: Rev. Walter H. Armstrong, Sir Ryland Adkins, K.C., M.P., Rev. J. T. Barkby, Rev. S. M. Berry, M.A., Rev. Charles Brown, D.D., Rev. W. T. A Desperate Effort to Make the Reader Understand About War

BY PROFESSOR CHARLES P. FAGNANI

Union Theological Seminary

IT IS not a question whether wars in the past have been right or wrong, nor whether wars in the present are right or wrong. Nothing is gained by arguing either aspect of those questions.

The vital question that confronts our time is whether war in the future shall be declared illegal by the common consent of mankind and be outlawed, as private murder is now.

A thing may be right at one time and wrong at another; for instance, polygamy, duelling, the carrying of a revolver, the manufacture and sale of intoxicants. War has been right; shall we make it wrong in the future? Nothing is ever going to stop war but the making of it a crime. We now have laws of war; they are, of course, perfectly futile, but they show that war is legal.

To speak of humanizing war is absurd. To attempt it is waste of time and breath. From the dawn of history war has been universal. It has enormous prestige and glory, with all its accessories of music, flags, feathers, brilliant uniforms. It has afforded opportunity for the display of some of the finest traits of human character as well as the worst. But is it not high time for the race to abolish it, lest it shall abolish the race?

This will in nowise reflect upon the heroes who have fought and died in the past, upon the Fathers of the Revolution, on our dead of the Civil War, nor upon the splendid youth who sleep in Flanders Field. They did their duty, and did it superbly. But is it not our duty to banish the now loathsome thing from the earth?

Can this be done in any other way than by outlawing it, than by bringing it to the bar of a World Court, after the consensus of nations has declared it illegal, and condemning the nation that attempts it as a criminal to be held up to the reprobation of mankind.

Shall war be outlawed for all time to come? Let us settle that question first and by itself. How to work the decision out practically the future will show.

Is it possible for a man to call himself a Christian to-day unless he numbers himself with those who sigh, and cry, and agonize for the outlawry of war? C. P. F.

The National Council of Catholic Men has decided that they will submit the plan which receives the Bok peace award to the vote of their members. Such a scheme is a very happy one. The greater the number of organizations that discuss the plan, the more certainly will the peace plan have virtually the backing of the whole nation. The Federal Council of the Churches, the General Conference of Friends, the American Jewish Committee, the Jewish Welfare Board and the National Council of Jewish Women have likewise promised their co-operation in seeing that the plan is discussed and understood.

There are more Greeks in Constantinople than in Athens, more Jews in New York than in Jerusalem, and more Poles in Chicago than in Warsaw. Is the naming of the world wrong?

CHILDREN'S BOOKS

Books on the Bible Story

WHAT A CHILD OUGHT TO KNOW ABOUT THE BIBLE

By H. R. STEVENSON. James Pott and Company. 112 pages. 75 cents.

This is the kind of book which any intelligent child would enjoy reading because Mr. Stevenson has written it in a most attractive manner and one which is particularly adapted to making the Bible clear and interesting. The best thing about the book is that the boy or girl who reads it will not have to turn around on going to college, and unlearn what he or she has read. The introductory chapter describes what the Bible is and how it was written, in so far as facts are known. There follow separate chapters on the Patriarchs, the Times of Moses, the Period of Joshua and Judges, Kings of Israel and Prophets of Israel, and then three very interesting chapters on the Gospels, and one on the other writings in New Testament. The chapters are divided into paragraphs, and at the end of each chapter is a brief review of its contents.

It is astonishing to notice how simply and suggestively Mr. Stevenson deals with the difficult questions of the Bible. For example, the question of truth as taught in history and poetic narrative (see paragraph 28), or in dealing with Jesus' parables, where he lays down certain principles of interpretation (see paragraphs 145-148).

Certainly, the book will be valuable not only to children, but to parents who are doubtful as to just how to teach the Bible to their own children.

Dr. J. Paterson Smyth writes a most enthusiastic and discriminating foreword.

THE BIBLE STORY

By JAMES BAIKIE, F.R.A.S. The Macmillan Company. pp. 472. $5.

While not written especially for children this book is one which will have a special appeal for them both because of the simplicity and innate dignity of the language and because of the fifty full-page colored pictures of J. H. Hartley, which are made from a personal study of the East.

"The story," says the author in his preface, "is told from stage to stage in the order in which its events actually occurred, so that the reader may follow it with uninterrupted attention, and be spared alike the trouble of disentangling the incidents from the somewhat bewildering setting in which they are embedded, and the toil of piecing out the partial narrative of one book with the equally partial narrative of another."

The narrative does not go outside the Bible except for a brief chapter on the period intervening between the Old and New Testaments.

THE STORY OF JESUS—THE CHRIST

By HELEN BROWN HOYT. (Revised Edition.) W. A. Wilde Company, Boston, Mass. pp. 233. $2.

This is a plain narrative of the life of Jesus as recorded in the Gospels told in language that is clear to young children and illustrated with 137 black and white reproductions of pictures by many different artists.

The author lays no claim to originality, but tries to tell the story so that children will "love it and absorb into their own beings the elements of true living which only the life and teachings of the Christ can give."

Adventure

FROM THE DEEP OF THE SEA—THE DIARY OF CHARLES EDWARD SMITH

The Macmillan Company. pp. 357. $2.50.

This volume of stirring adventure describes the voyaging of the whale ship Diana in 1866-7, from the edited diary of the surgeon of the vessel. It is not, of course, addressed especially to boys, and perhaps for that very reason will be the more welcomed by them and by all who love records of heroism and indomitable will. In a prefatory word the editor (who is the son of the diarist), says: "The history of the old whaling industry teems with horrifying tales of disaster, some of which are related in its diary. Many a fine ship has gone north and never been heard of again. The Diana was more lucky, for she managed to return fourteen months later, but only after terrible hardship on the part of her unfortunate crew.

"In the case of most of these old whale-ships the story of the sufferings of their crews has merely been retailed orally by the survivors on their return to port. In the case of the Diana we have a record of each day's adventures, written as soon as they had occurred, or even while they were actually occurring."

The book is illustrated by reproductions of the rough sketches in the diary. One of the interesting features is the sense of God's presence that illuminates the pages of this Quaker diarist.

This record goes to increase the noble public heritage of examples of heroism and faith.

HEROES OF THE WILDS

By CHELSEA CURTISS FRASER. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. pp. 372. $1.75.

This is a good book of stories for boys with its enthusiastic descriptions of the heroic elements in the lives of men who earn their living or find their interest in the out-of-doors. Mr. Fraser has been at some pains to get real information about the men he describes. He writes vividly and with picturesque touches. The life of the lumberjack, the forester, the cowboy, the trapper, the wild-life photographer and others are portrayed with typical scenes from their lives. While each chapter is a general treatment of a type, it is yet concrete in that the author seems to have always particular men in view. In some instances the bulk of the chapter is concerned with a particular man, as in that on the explorer, where Dillon Wallace's record of the Labrador trip and the death of Leonidas Hubbard is the theme, or in that on the wild-life photographer, where the figure of George Shiras is central. There are sixteen illustrations, including a characteristic one of Theodore Roosevelt on horseback.

THE YOUNG WIRELESS OPERATOR

By LEWIS E. THEISS. W. A. Wilde Company. pp. 310. $1.75.

Mr Theiss has written three other volumes on the wireless operator in various pursuits. This book is a thrilling story of Secret Service work against smuggling and rum-running. Every incident is based on actual occurrences. The author was formerly a newspaper reporter, and he knows New York and all the waterways nearby. Out of events which he knows at first hand and on the basis of the scrap-books which he kept he has constructed an exciting story of real adventure.

MORE JUNGLE TALES

By HOWARD ANDERSON MUSSER. George H. Doran Company. pp. 196. $1.50.

This is a supplementary volume to Mr. Musser's earlier collection of tales and is further evidence both of the extraordinary devotion and the love of adventure that a missionary's life in India may call forth. Mr. Musser portrays the humor and the picturesqueness and the excitement that life lived with a Christian purpose discovers. In his delight in the wonders of nature one is reminded of this same enthusiasm burning in the heart of Livingstone. And there is also evidence of that same profound pity that touches the life of the eager man or woman among an oppressed people.

Twenty-four short tales of missionary endeavor for the souls of men, women and children and of incidental adventure among monkeys, snakes, panthers, tigers, compose a really thrilling volume. In places the description seems to the present reviewer too terrible for little children. But for boys at the age when they are thinking of their careers and need to know clearly the crying need of our world it will be a real inspiration.

Incidentally this book will offer a fine lesson to those who do not realize the faith and heroism which the missionary project demands.

There are six full-page illustrations.

STORIES FROM 'ROUND THE WORLD

By HAZEL NORTHROP. Fleming H. Revell Company. pp. 152. $1.25.

Here is a collection of sixteen fascinating stories written about children and for children by an author who is both enthusiastic and restrained. The very titles are attractive: "The Horse Which Bought Lella a Dress," "The Boy Whose Christmas Name Was Billy-tears," "Little-Sister-Two Is Stolen."

There is good material in these stories for imaginary tales to Sunday-schools. Only one unfavorable criticism may be made. Occasionally a word used seems unfitted to the understanding of children.

Mrs. Northrop has written other successful books of stories about children in other lands. This new volume should be of service in binding our divided world together in bonds of sympathy and understanding among children. The possibilities of such an event are inestimable!

THE STORY OF GRENFELL OF THE LABRADOR

By DILLON WALLACE. Fleming H. Revell Company. pp. 237. $1.50.

This boy's life of the great apostle to the Labrador was written to help out in the campaign for a million dollars to endow Dr. Grenfell's work. Dillon Wallace, himself, has lived in Labrador. He can write of things at first hand. Of course the story of Grenfell is one to appeal to boys. The familiar stories of the great doctor's boyhood; his new consecration, thanks to the preaching of Moody; his travels as physician to fishermen and "Liveyeres," are tales to charm the boys. The episode of Skipper Tom's cod trap is one of the best Sabbath observance stories that we know—how Skipper Tom refused to rescue the trap from the iceberg on Sunday because of the example he would set to the rest of the little village. Perhaps the story would be really a little bit better if Skipper Tom had lost the trap for sticking fast to his conscience. But we are glad, anyway, that he did not.

What ignorant and poor people the Labradorean natives, the Liveyeres, are! But their letters of appeal to Doctor Grenfell are full of human feeling. Take that one from the man whose daughter was sick:

"Reverance dr. Grandfell. Dear sir we are expecting you hup and we would like for you to come so quick as you can for my dater is very sick with a very large sore under her left harm we emenagin that the old is two enchis deep and two enches wide plase com as quick as you can to save life I remains yours truely."

The improvement in living conditions that came to Labrador with the co-operative stores is an argument to make us question whether we all might not well go and do likewise.

A Sunday-school teacher of boys will find "The Story of Grenfell" a treasure mine for an occasional tale to tell his charges. Personally we question whether there is call for quite so much moralizing as that in which Dr. Wallace indulges, but perhaps the boy does not object to it after all.

ON AUTUMN TRAILS AND ADVENTURES IN CAPTIVITY

By EMMA-LINDSAY SQUIER. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation, New York. pp. 230. $2.

A collection of stories of wild animals of the hinterland of Nova Scotia, supposedly told the author by the natives, make up the first part of this book, while "Adventures in Captivity" tells of the caged animals in a moving picture zoo in California. Behind most of this is a background of Indian superstition. Many of the tales are rather tragic for children, but they are well written and show a real love for the forest brethren. The happy existence of the animals at freedom in the Nova Scotia forests contrasted with the stolid, unhappy life of the animals caged and trained for the movies carries its own argument. There are four full-page illustrations.

Patriotism and Romance

JACK GREGORY

By WARREN LEE GOSS. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. pp. 270. $1.75.

Mr. Goss, whose "Jed" (published a few years ago), relates the adventures of a boy in the Civil War, tells in the present volume the plain story of Jack Gregory in the days of the American Revolution. In a brief prefatory word he says: "The purpose of this book is to teach patriotism by calling attention to those times when the foundations of this nation were cemented by the blood of its people, in its seven years war for independence. In these days when there is a threat to overturn orderly liberty and to place in its stead license, these lessons from our past seem especially needful."

The author gives a running account of the course of the war and Jack's adventures therein from a raw recruit at Bunker Hill to an aide to General Washington—a well told tale.

LITTLE STORIES OF A BIG COUNTRY

By LAURA ANTOINETTE LARGE. W. A. Wilde Company. pp. 146.

Here are simple records of some of the natural wonders of our country. The author writes of Yellowstone Park and Mammoth Cave and Niagara Falls and the Great Lakes and coal and petroleum, etc., as wonders which children should know. The book is illustrated with a good photograph for each subject and is well adapted to attract the interest of little children to some of the marvels of our country. Interestingly enough to the reviewer, who is a New Yorker, one of the chapters is devoted to New York.

BILLY BARNICOAT

By GREVILLE MACDONALD. E. P. Dutton and Company. pp. 230. $2.50.

A romantic tale which those who believe only in "the strict truth" will not like. It tells of a small boy washed up by the sea and of his astonishing adventures with mermaids and witches and storms and smugglers. Altogether an entrancing tale of a sturdy little boy wrecked on the terrible Cornish coast, where adventure seems the natural order of events. The frontispiece is an attractive colored picture of Billy and Caroline (a cat) on the rocks, and there are many black and white illustrations, all by Francis D. Bedford, and done with that abandon which children love.

WINONA'S DREAM COMES TRUE

By MARGARET WIDDDEMER. J. B. Lippincott Company. pp. 343. $1.75.

This is the latest in a series of wholesome books on Winona by this deservedly popular author, who knows how to write about young people, both entertainingly and helpfully.

It is not in a foolishly sentimental vein that the author writes. She honestly believes in the goodness of human nature and the value of human life, and she writes with enthusiasm and conviction. In this volume she writes of the romance which came to Winona and how her dreams were realized.

It is a good human story that leaves a pleasant thought in the mind.

Stories for Little Children

RIP VAN WINKLE

By WASHINGTON IRVING. J. B. Lippincott Company. pp 69. 75 cents.

The Children's Classic series published by Lippincott (of which the present volume is one), provide an excellent way to bring before children some of the famous classics which alas! are being neglected to-day in favor of some very inferior tales. Some day there is going to be a revolt of the children against being talked down to as "kiddies." Childhood classics will return to favor since they are written without condescension and with real thought.

The type of this series is large and clear and the present volume contains four bright illustrations in colors and six in line.

THE LITTLE GREEN ROAD TO FAIRYLAND

By ANNIE R. RENTOUL and IDA RENTOUL OUTHWAITE. E. P. Dutton and Company. pp. 103. $3.

This is a delightful volume for little children and those who would like to be little children. The latter will find the short quotations from a variety of sources at the beginning of each chapter a sort of lay text for what follows and all children will delight in the adventures of Robin and Maykin and their friends among the fairies and brownies. The eight full-page colored and eight black and white drawings signed with the initials of the second author are charming. Several pleasing and happy verses add to the attractiveness of a welcome book.

LITTLE LUCIA AND HER PUPPY

By MABEL L. ROBINSON. E. P. Dutton Company. pp. 124. $1.50.

This is a supplemental volume to "Little Lucia," the story of a little girl who broke her leg and lay still in a hammock under the trees, where she made friends with little animals and birds.

Now Lucia's father has brought her a puppy which is as comical as puppies really are. This puppy provides plenty of entertainment with his love of mischief and his friendliness. Finally he saves his little mistress's life.

A simply and attractively written story for children with a number of well done pen and ink drawings.

THE BLACK CATS AND THE TINKER'S WIFE

By MARY and MARGARET BAKER. Duffield and Company. $2.

The tinker and his wife find a band of enchanted cats in a great cave and rescue them, and a big black cat lives with them ever after in great happiness. The story is illustrated with a series of bewitching silhouettes of all sorts of cats and kittens as well as the tinker and his wife and their family. A fascinating book for a child.

THE MAGIC GIFT

By NANNIE LEE FRAYSER. The Pilgrim Press. 30 pages. $1.

It is a curious fact that most stories told to children for the purpose of inculcating patriotism place sole emphasis on heroism in time of war, so that a great many children associate the flag only with battle. The present story is of quite a different type. The author seeks to interpret the three colors of the flag, red, white and blue, as symbols of courage, purity and truth. The story is simply told under the symbols of three fairies, each of whom seeks to make a gift to people which will be the greatest of all gifts. After the adventures of each fairy to assemble her gift, they meet to decide which shall be adjudged the best, and conclude that the only way is to unite them all in one. Thus the flag was born.

The book is attractively printed in large type, and attractively illustrated with seven black and white drawings by Elizabeth B. Warren.

We are hearing a great deal concerning the crowding of our colleges, but there is still room for them to grow. The Bureau of Education's statistics show that out of one hundred boys who enter the fifth grade only two graduate from college. Of the one hundred who start in the fifth grade, eighty-three enter the sixth grade, seventy-one the seventh grade; sixty-three the eighth grade. Then comes a great break on entering the high school. Only thirty-four of the original one hundred start their courses there and only fourteen of those thirty-four graduate. Half of the high school boys go to work and half of them go to college. According to these figures only two of the seven who enter college receive diplomas four years later. The last figure especially seems rather hard to believe.

Mussolini

By Rev. Alva W. Taylor, Ph.D.

National Secretary of the Disciples' Board of Temperance and Social Welfare

[Dr. Taylor, by virtue of travel and of constant study, is an authority on European matters. The gain or loss of the democratic ideal is of interest to all who love their land. It is very closely related to the side of religion that deals with human relations.]

THE Greco-Italian difficulty put the Italian dictator into the limelight. It served also to define his temper to the world. No time was given Greece to offer apologies or explanations. The ultimatum was swift, peremptory and high-handed. There is not one particle of evidence that Greece could have prevented the assassinations or that Greeks committed them. Indeed, the presumption is that Albanians did the work.

Had it been England, France or America involved instead of Greece there would have been no such action. Corfu was neutral quite as much as was Belgium in 1914, and Mussolini committed the same crime as did the Kaiser. The fort was unarmed and the firing was on defenseless civilians. A number of refugee children under the care of the Near East Relief were killed while in swimming. The rules of civilized warfare were flouted in failure to notify the civilian population. The helpless little wards of the Near East Relief were really wards of American charity.

The Italian dictator demonstrated very well that he meant it when he criticized a former cabinet officer for soft-heartedness, saying sarcastically that when Shanzer heard of a little killing he went hurrying about with his dove of peace. The seizure of Corfu was the act of an egoist or a madman. The Balkans are more of a tinder-box to-day than they were in 1914. Either Mussolini gambled upon their economic inability to make war or he was willing to risk it for the sake of his imperial promise that the Adriatic shall become an Italian lake.

Mussolini has learned little from those fateful days of July, 1914. Then as now there was an assassination, an ultimatum, an impetuous attack and the invasion of neutral territory. Germany flouted The Hague Tribunal as Mussolini flouted the League of Nations. Germany had boldly refused to submit to the tribunal when it was in the making; Italy had signed a bond to submit to the League. There was war in 1914 because Europe was armed and ready; there is no war to-day, though half the nations are armed to the teeth, because they are poverty-stricken. Mussolini says he loves peace and intimates it can always be had on the basis of his demands. He called efforts to prevent the Greco-Turkish war "assinity." He calls conferences "sentimentality" and "Towers of Babel" and affects to despise the word "humanitarian."

There has been much adulation of Mussolini. Most of it has been by those who most bitterly hate Lenin—and for much the same reason. Mussolini is more thoroughly the personal dictator, for his will is supreme in Italy, while Lenin is simply the brains of a small committee that rules.

Mussolini rules under the forms of the old parliamentary government, Lenin under the form of a new Soviet representation. But Lenin attempts to turn productive enterprise over to communistic control and Mussolini decisively turns it over to capitalistic control, and therein lies the difference that deflects judgment. Lenin takes over the banks; Mussolini gives them power in return for help to his government. Lenin attempts to run the railroads; Mussolini arranges to return them to private ownership, and even talks of doing likewise with the postoffice. Otherwise they are much alike, except that Lenin is a life-long and consistent communist and Mussolini is a convert, or a pervert, as one's bias dictates, for he was a raging Socialist before the war. Beneath exteriors they look much alike to one who attempts to objectify them from the standpoint of democracy.

Here are the Italian dictator's own words for it as published in the "Fascista Review":

"Neither communism or fascism has anything to do with liberty."

"Men nowadays are tired of liberty."

"The great experiences of the 'after-the-war' period marks the defeat of liberalism."

"Both in Russia and Italy it has been demonstrated that it is possible to govern outside, above and against all liberal ideas."

"Liberty is no longer the chaste, severe maiden for whom generations in the first half of the last century fought and died."

"It (fascism) has already passed, and if necessary will pass again, without the slightest hesitation, over the body, more or less decomposed, of the Goddess of Liberty."

In other words, Mussolini personally transfers his allegiance from the "dictatorship of the proletariat" to that of a military dictatorship. As to whether it was a genuine conversion or a taking of the main chance partisans will differ, but there need be no difference regarding his commitment to the theories of dictatorship. Early in 1914 he was preaching the former; to-day he is dictator, but suspends the publication of the journal in which he advocated socialist control because it continues to advocate it. His path to power lies over the embers of the labor halls in which he then preached it and he has earned for himself the sobriquet, "Knight of Castor Oil," because of the ruthless manner in which his followers have administered that delectable position to his former comrades.

Of course, a dictatorship is a wise and benevolent and far-seeing thing, providing only that it administers your own favorite political prescription. So take your choice between the Lenins and the Mussolinis. Both are remarkable men. Each has organized a minority into a host of disciplined, self-sacrificing followers and through them each rules according to his will.

Mussolini's assertion of power has been called Italy's "bloodless revolution." As compared to that of Lenin in Russia it could be so called, but it was far from bloodless. Lenin and his 600,000 disciplined communists were turning over an entire old order. Mussolini with his three hundred thousand, who would "mystically obey my orders," was returning to an old era, and it is much easier to capitalize tradition and ancient glories than it is to initiate innovations that spurn both tradition and ancient glories. But all Italy felt the ruthless hand of the Fascista. Hundreds were killed in street fighting, millions of property was destroyed and a kind of guerrilla warfare was carried on in defiance of law and order until complete control was won. There was one ingenious atrocity visited upon luckless opponents. It was that of pouring castor oil down their throats. This was reserved, it seems, as an especial degradation for men of light and leading, such as priests, editors and labor and political leaders. Government was simply taken over without legal right or plea and on the vigilance committee plan, in some such spirit as the Ku Klux Klan has manifested in some places in this country.

All this was made possible by three facts. One was that of communist radicalism, another was the driving ineffectiveness of the bloc system of parliamentary government with thirteen parties represented, none of which was able to marshal a majority, and the other was that of a war-bred youth under the dramatic leadership of Mussolini.

Communistic radicalism made for low production and low-brow control. The system of party blocs made for weak, ineffective government with a mercurial change of administration dependent upon the ever-changing front of party blocs. Government had become the plaything of selfish party negotiation and Parliament a mock stage of oratorical buffoonery. Youth returned from the war smitten with hyper-patriotism and the effects of propaganda, and the emotional Latin temperament was being played upon by D'Annunzio and his irridentism. Mussolini, reared in turmoil and coming from a section where violence and extremism had always characterized politics, either experienced a genuine conversion from radical socialism through his army experience or saw an opportunity to capitalize his genius for leadership. He needed no change in commitment to theories of dictatorship and force; that required nothing more than a transfer from the communistic to the militaristic.

So the Fascista clans were skilfully maneuvered from victory to victory until he faced the government with a demand for power. The "old fox," Giolotti, matured in long years of playing the Italian temperament, giving to take and yielding to conquer, told him to take it and see how long he would keep it. So he took it, warning Parliament to yield or he would "make these gray halls a bivouac of my bands." Out of a membership of 535 a bare majority of seventy-seven voted him one year of supreme power with authority to utter decrees as if they were laws. The Socialists alone dared vote against him, a one-time leader of their own. All others absented themselves.

Just as there are times when rebellion is the only recourse for the lovers of liberty, so doubtless there are times when a dictator is the only recourse of law and order. Apologists for the strong-arm methods of Italy's dictator rest their case on this thesis. Time alone can tell whether he is "this strutting little Cæsar" or the "one great man the war has turned up in Europe." His dramatic pose, with chin on breast, and his well-known admiration for Napoleon, makes it easy to call him the former. The rapid invigorating of Italy's anæmic body politic through efficient administration makes it quite as easy to call him the latter. But the application of efficient administrative methods to a dictatorship of legislation, together with a flouting of liberty and conference, and his loudly proclaimed slogans of Italy first and Italy only, grates loudly upon the great slogans of democracy and peace.

He is voted power under the threat of "vote it or we will fill this chamber with Fascista clubs." He fills the Senate with Fascista appointees, turns out of office, high and low, all not of his following, and even now purges the Fascista of all who are not willing to take the oath of personal allegiance to him. He assumes supreme control of army and navy, supplants the old militia with a Fascist guard, taking oath not to the king, but "to God and the state"—the state being his own person for the present. He surrounds the Parliament with Fascist guards, announces that he will report on his year's tenure of office four months after the time expires and warns his opponents, saying: "Let our adversaries have no illusions that our control of government is brief," adding that such "illusions are childish and stupid." To Parliament itself he announces that "the Fascista has in its hands the power and the will to use it."

The Cabinet ministers no longer report to Parliament, but to Mussolini; he does the talking to the people's representatives, and he takes the place of the king at the Cabinet table. King, Pope, Parliament and opposing parties are all recognized just so long as they do not cross Mussolini's will, and Mussolini, of course, rules only for the good of them all. Thus the Kaiser's ideal of government stops for the time at least the evolution of Italian democracy toward the English system of a silent monarch as a symbol of national unity, with a Cabinet responsible to the elected representatives of the people. Whether it is because he dares not risk too swift an overturn of parliamentary forms, or because he hopes to restore them purified to a rejuvenated government, the dictator demands and secures an election law that gives a representation of two-thirds in Parliament to the party polling a plurality. His party possesses only about one-third of the votes, but is the largest of the sixteen that can go to the hustings, and "Fascista clubs" can win any election. With this "electoral reform" a four-year tenure of power is assured. With the press suborned and forbidden to print anything adverse to the government, the King, the Pope, or religious institutions, or favorable to foreigners as opposed to Italians, the only way to overthrow Mussolini will be through an armed uprising akin to his own.

Meanwhile, what may the world expect of him? He has no use for the League of Nations, calling it a "society of meddlers," and declares for the "realpolitik" method of dealing with one nation at a time, each nation taking care of its own self-interest. At the same time he demands that the Adriatic be made an Italian lake, which means a Jugoslavia without a real seaport and Italy astride Britain's route to India. To this end, no doubt, the seizure of Corfu was intended to be the first step. He boldly proclaims that the "Anglo-Saxon system has had its day," and says, "It is to Italy's interest to collaborate in destroying it." He has little love for the French and has manifested enthusiasm over no sister nation except the Turks. It would seem that world peace has little to hope and much to fear from his dictatorship.

Internally, he has scrapped much of the social legislation secured through years of effort, but has enacted an eight-hour law and set up arbitration tribunals as a method of stopping strikes and lockouts. His plan seems to be a sort of paternalistic syndicalism. He would regimentate the nation and make the pass-words of national life, "Order, hierarchy and discipline," wherein the strong are to be importuned to rule by the right of their strength, but to rule in benevolent regard for the welfare (not the rights) of the weak.

Sargasso

By William Willard Howard

IF you were on board a dismasted, rudderless ship, drifting around and around the windless Sargasso Sea, while relief ships, freighted to the deck beams with food for Bolshevik Russia, Japan, China, Greece and the Near East, passed close by without a friendly hail or offer of help, you would be in a situation no less tragic than the present plight of the Russian refugees—the members of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia who fled from their ancestral lands and homes to escape death at the hands of revolutionists, and now are dying, one by one, of hunger and broken hearts in the alien lands in which they took refuge.

America has fed the peasants of Bolshevik Russia at a cost of sixty million dollars; she has sent score of missions to the Greeks, Armenians, Syrians and Turks; she has given ten millions to the Japanese, and other millions to the Chinese, while the brains, education, culture and creative ability of the third largest nation in the world have been passed by and left to starve in a Sargasso of hunger and cold and neglect.

During my second visit to the border of Bolshevik Russia last August and September I was able to give four weeks to an investigation of the condition of the Russian refugee children in that far outpost of Eastern Europe in which Anne Louise Howard is giving relief in the form of employment for destitute Russian gentlewomen.

I set about the investigation in as practical a manner as though I were buying a cargo of Russian pine timber for one of my ships. I sent word of my purpose to the Baroness Berends-Situna and asked her to accompany me. That fine representative of the nobility of monarchist Russia literally got out of a sick bed to go with me. Together we called into council the principals and teachers of four large public schools. We went to the schools because we knew that the Russian refugee mother insists that her little daughter shall go to school even hungry and half-clothed. The principals and teachers gave to us names and addresses taken at random from their books of enrolment. Then the baroness and I went forth on foot into that Sargasso of hunger and suffering.

The baroness and I promised each other that we should go at this work with the cool, matter-of-fact, business-like precision of a charity organization agent; that we should gather only cold facts, and that, above all, we should not allow our emotions to be stirred or our sympathies unduly excited. I thought that I might get through with it on that basis, because I have had ten years' experience in the organization and administration of emergency relief.

Looking back at it now, after a lapse of a few weeks, I am free to say that it cannot be done. At least, I cannot do it. I might have gone through with it, with the outward unconcern of a charity organization agent, had the persons under inquiry been grown men. But, they were not grown men. They were little children.

After two days the baroness went back to bed for a day's rest. I was glad to turn my attention to an inquiry into the possibility of getting a cargo of brick for shipment to New York. But, in the month that followed, we did go through with our investigation. At the end of it I was so physically ill that I went to bed for three days. The baroness had to send for a doctor.

No, I cannot tell the story of what I saw; I cannot repeat the things that I heard. There is a limit beyond which I will not go.

There were one or two bright spots. Tatiana Livitzkaia was one. Tatiana is an orphan, ten years old, a member of the nobility of monarchist Russia. Her father was a celebrated physician and surgeon from the world-known University of Dorpat. Her mother, a member of a titled family, died of typhus in the Ukraine, in 1919. She was "buried like a dog." The father took Tatiana with him to the hospital where he was fighting typhus. He gave his life for his people; for he also died of typhus six months later. Tatiana's little sister was taken by a Russian family. Tatiana was left alone; for her only relative, an uncle, was a priest who, because of fear of revolutionists, could not take her.

Then Elizabeth Ruppul, a Polish nurse in the hospital, took the child, and fled across the border. American relief agents gave Tatiana a bowl of soup a day; but refused to give clothes because the nurse was well dressed. The nurse afterward was married to Alexander Wilson, a Polish store clerk who earns $12 a month.

The newly-married pair decided to keep Tatiana and to bring her up as their own child. I found Tatiana well-fed and well-cared for in their humble home. There are two small rooms and a dark kitchen. There were growing plants in the windows and flowers from nearby fields on the table. To help out with the rent the young housewife does mending for a laundry when she can get it to do. She must go four long blocks to get water for household use. In a small room overhead six persons are living.

Tatiana, member of the nobility of old Russia, will be educated and brought up as the child of the poor shop clerk and good-hearted nurse who does mending to help out with the rent. Tatiana, daughter of a celebrated physician and surgeon, will live a working girl's life, unless some inheritance of her father's genius lifts her into a place in the sun.

Perhaps you will ask me to point out the bright spot in this. Whether you look upon it as a bright spot or as a shadow depends on the point of view. If you knew the stories of some of the other little girls you would see why I call it a bright spot. Whatever we may think of the future of this orphaned daughter of Russia's nobility, let us accord all honor to Elizabeth, the nurse. She also is of the nobility because she has had compassion on this friendless orphaned child.

I renew my invitation to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK to increase the scope of Anne Louise Howard's relief work by assisting me to accelerate the sale of the beautiful hand-embroidered Russian Princess Blouses and one-piece gowns. I desire to place these exquisite garments on exhibition and sale at women's clubs, church bazaars and similar places, where their color combinations and wonderfully fine needlework can be seen by competent and discriminating judges of excellence in women's raiment.

Contributions to the working fund, in any amount, may be sent to The Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

From Gipsy Boy to Famous Preacher*

THE Lord has His own ways of finding workers for His Kingdom. If He needs an apostle to formulate the gospel, He calls a man from his tents and needles, and we have St. Paul. When He wants a great theologian, He calls Augustine from his heathen pursuits. When He wants a great organizer of forces, He calls Ignatius Loyola from the company of his soldiers. Does He need a great heart to open Africa, He calls David Livingstone. He touches the heart of an Oxford youth and John Wesley of the burning heart awakens, or John Henry Newman of the anointed pen. In far-off Asia He finds Chrysostom of the golden tongue; in medieval Italy He finds St. Francis of the holy life, and in modern New England He seeks Dwight L. Moody to be a modern Greatheart. Always, everywhere, the Lord reaches where He will. Along back about forty years ago He looked into a gipsy camp in the fields of England and called a boy named Rodney Smith to be His servant, and he has wrought wonders for the Lord.

In this book Gipsy Smith—for he has come to be called "Gipsy" ever since he began preaching—tells the whole story of his life. It is a fascinating book and full of encouragement, for it shows what one man can do whose soul is alive with zeal for the Lord, and whose heart has been touched by the Holy Spirit, although he grew up in the utter lack of education. (The Gipsy tells us he could neither read nor write when he began preaching.) The Lord had reached him in his darkness and saved him and filled his soul with light and joy. There was nothing for him to do but to go and tell the story to whomsoever would listen. He must show his light and joy. The book, after dwelling upon these early years, is the story of his missions in practically all the English-speaking cities of the world. It reads like a second Acts of the Apostles, and yet the Gipsy is the most modest man in the world. One who believes that he is a messenger of the Lord can speak of his successes without any egotism or vain-boasting. The successes are the Lord's, not his. The Gipsy certainly had successes. Quiet in method, gentle in speech, winsome in manner, as far removed from Billy Sunday as any man would be, yet everywhere the crowds came, and not only hung upon his words, but gave their hearts unto the Lord. There was the element of permanency in his work also, for the churches benefited in every instance. Indeed, his method was calculated to help the churches. He went into a community and told the story of what the Lord had done for him. Then he preached the Gospel to others in most winsome and persuasive tones. His converts immediately linked themselves up to the churches and remained with them to a greater degree than is customary with converts. He held many by midnight missions, gathering in the lowliest off the streets, and the story of this work is dramatic indeed. He also tells us that Dr. W. J. Dawson got his evangelistic impulse from sharing in one of these meetings at Brighton and afterwards used his methods with success in his own work. (Dr. Dawson tells the story in his book, "The Evangelistic Note," and gives Mr. Smith full credit for his influence upon his work and preaching.)

The Gipsy was one of the most popular visitors to the camps during the Great War and crowds of boys flocked to his meetings at the front. One of the most interesting parts of the book is devoted to these experiences, and it is a very suggestive part for preachers. It is a well-known fact that some preachers failed quite utterly to reach, or even hold, the boys for a half hour's talk, while others had great success. The preacher was dealing with crowds of boys who had no church traditions, and many of whom were quite ignorant of the simplest Christian terminology. They had, many of them, never given a thought to religion and simply were not interested in it. They went to the meetings arranged for them, no matter who was speaking, simply because it meant a change from the deadly routine of their daily life. Some men they simply could not abide, others they took to at once, and the Gipsy was one of these. He became a great favorite with the boys and some of the incidents he tells in these chapters on war experiences are very touching.

Several chapters are devoted to the friends he has made. They are legion because his work has taken him to the uttermost parts of the earth. He has known many great preachers and has come into very intimate contact with them. Among his most intimate friends were Dr. Maclaren and Dr. Berry, of Wolverhampton, and Dr. Parker helped him in his youth by kindly counsel. There are many interesting glimpses of Dr. Jowett, Dr. Clifford, Dr. McNeill and Dr. Dawson. One chapter is largely devoted to memories of General Booth and Sir Robertson Nicol. Dr. Nicol became interested in Gipsy Smith because he was a new kind of genius as well as a remarkable preacher of evangelical religion. Dr. Nicol was always on the outlook for geniuses. Many other interesting personalities walk through these pages and the whole book abounds in delightful tones. Like all really great preachers, the Gipsy has a delicious sense of humor.

In conclusion, attention should be called to the pages where the Gipsy takes particular pains to refute vehemently the charges that he had a disposition to belittle the churches and to assume that the majority of the preachers are indifferent to the winning of souls. He says: "Whoever wrote that does not know me at all. As God has led me, I have spoken as plainly as I could on occasion of indifference and apathy where it does exist, but I have never had the slightest desire to make wholesale, sweeping indictments. I have my weaknesses. I know them far better than anybody else does. I pray God to forgive me if any word I utter is unfair or gives needless offense to any. Thousands of preachers have been my friends. Those who have really known and under-

The President on Sabbath Observance

The above delegation called upon President Calvin Coolidge on October 10 to invite him to attend and address the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Lord's Day Alliance of the United States in New York November 11-13, to ask his assistance in obtaining a Sunday Rest Law for the District of Columbia, in securing a Saturday half holiday for the Government employees and a reduction of Sunday work in the Army and Navy. The President could not promise to attend the anniversary, but expressed his warm approval of the matters presented and assured the delegation that he would use his influence toward carrying them to a successful issue.

[The following little speech on Sabbath observance was made by the President in reply to the address by Dr. Bowlby.]

MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN: I profoundly believe in the Sabbath and have always recognized its sacred importance. I, therefore, appreciate the work your organization is doing for the preservation of the Christian Sabbath and the weekly rest day, and, with you, I feel that we should give attention not only to the physical aspects, but also to the moral and spiritual phases of the Holy Day.

I also appreciate your attitude toward the improvement of Sunday observance in the District of Columbia. There is certainly room for improvement. Of course, there are some kinds of work that must be done, but there is really more work being done on the Sabbath Day than is absolutely necessary and I hope to see this work minimized as rapidly as conditions will permit.

We are deeply interested in what you say about the postal employees and the proposed improvement in the service. We are glad to give every possible support to any movement that will improve their condition. There is no better body of men to be found anywhere in the employ of the Federal Government than the postal employees. To have so influential an organization as yours show an interest in these men is encouraging to us and I thank you for it.

In regard to the other matters you have mentioned, I promise you my influence toward a more wholesome observance of the Sabbath Day in the District of Columbia and elsewhere throughout the nation.

Again I wish you and your organization to know that I am interested in all you have presented for my consideration.

Christians Called to Be Missionaries

JOHN 17:18; MATTHEW 28:16-20; ACTS 1:6-8.

"Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all the nations."—Matthew 28:19.

A CHRISTIAN is a missionary. If he is not, then in some real sense he is not a Christian.

The call to missionary service is not merely one of many Christian obligations. It is the heart of the whole thing. It is not an arbitrary command added at the end of the Gospel. It is implied in every Christian principle. It is the inevitable conclusion of every Christian truth. It would be as easy to take Christ himself out of Christianity as to take away the missionary spirit.

Christianity is taken in a great many ways. Many accept what is congenial to them and leave out the rest. Others subscribe to what is reasonable, to what seems possible of fulfilment and dismiss what seem "the wilder visions of Jesus" from their program. And there is much beauty in all the parts of Christian teaching. Jesus as a poet, or a figure like his own good Samaritan, is attractive and lovable. But these diminished fragments of Christianity are something infinitely less than the daring faith of Jesus himself, and what is more significant can never supply the thrill, the strength of conviction, the passion for service which they feel who are possessed by the whole truth as He proclaimed it.

"Thou art not far from the Kingdom of God," said Jesus to one who had believed and performed many good things. That was a fine commendation for him. It meant that he had made a very good start. His life had brought him to a good point from which to go over into the Kingdom of God. But no matter how near his partial acceptance of truth had brought him, until he should go over into the Kingdom completely he was still outside of it. And what that means for such as this man is that he must be without the power of conviction, the higher enthusiasms that are only felt in the atmosphere of the Kingdom as Jesus proclaimed it.

Many pick up the missionary challenge at the beginning of Christ's clear command, "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations." But that is the end of it, not the beginning. And the end has no force or validity apart from the beginning. Men might debate all day as to whether this exhortation is imperative, and entertain many views as to the missionary program of the Church of Christ. But that is not the point where the debate should center.

The heart of the whole matter, then, lies in the conception of Christ which we hold, or which holds us. It will be well to concentrate there. If there is anything lacking in your feeling for missionary service, go back to Christ and to a study of His Kingdom as He set it forth. When you have seen it aright your very belief in Him will of itself, without any compulsion, commission you to enter this world-wide service. No one can measure the difference to the follower of Jesus between seeing Him as having only a limited place in the life of the world, or on the other hand as possessing all power in heaven or on earth. The limited Jesus may be a teacher, but only the universal Christ can be Redeemer and Creator of new life. When Jesus is enthroned, a passionate devotion for Him will be felt which will literally lift one to the level of great conquests and achievements. It is a pity to call anything Christian which has not the thrill of this mighty conviction. A Christ for the world is a radiant and inspiring figure who has aroused conquering enthusiasms among His followers. A Jesus denied this supremacy, after all His claims, is a pathetic figure hardly capable of arousing in His followers a moral passion adequate for the fulfilment of His simplest suggestions.

Nor shall we appreciate the basis of the missionary appeal of Jesus if we think that only at the end of His earthly ministry, and only in the specific words, He made His claim of universal power and authority. It is all implied in everything that He taught. The "therefore, go and teach all nations" follows His whole life and teaching. Everything that Jesus said and did is the premise of the inevitable conclusion of missionary service.

Not only is it in his words, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth," but in all His words. What stirring missionary documents are such parables as The Prodigal Son, which many feel has been unfortunately named and should be called the parable of The Loving Father; the teaching of the Lost Sheep, and the Missing Coin. And behind these graphic pictures the underlying conception of one God and Father of all, and one great family of mankind, His children, make inescapable the thought that his love must reach wherever a child may be found.

If you can think of a family circle continuing to make merry and enjoy their comparative peace and prosperity all the while a vacant chair stands to remind them that one member is tragically missing, then you may understand how far the elder brother had cut himself off from the vital bond of family life. The joy of the father was not merely a joy for his recovered son's sake. It was a personal joy that poured

Christian Civilization— Is It Christian?

After Nineteen Hundred Years Has Christianity Seriously Modified the Pagan Character of Human Society?

This question was put to a group of the most influential social students in the American Church, all of them leaders and close advisors of the various social service movements in all the denominations and the Federal Council of Churches. Among them are:

Bishop Francis J. McConnell
F. Ernest Johnson
Charles A. Ellwood
Alva W. Taylor
Samuel Z. Batten

Harry F. Ward
Ross L. Finney
Albion W. Small
Arthur E. Holt
Herbert H. Shenton

Edward Alsworth Ross

¶ They divided the problem up into many pieces, each taking one piece to investigate.

¶ Their answer is an amazing revelation!

¶ In a series of articles they declare with surprising unanimity that the industry, the economics, the politics, our nationalist conceptions and practices and the international relations of our so-called Christian civilization are based upon and shot through and through with utterly pagan implications.

¶ Our workaday life and our public life have not yet seriously felt the influence of the mind of Jesus. On the contrary, a society dominated by Christian men is found to be governed by rules which are non-Christian, anti-Christian, flagrantly pagan.

¶ If these pagan rules and principles remain unrevolutionized, says Professor Albion W. Small, "the goodly fellowship of the Apostles could not operate our present industrial system and make its workings just."

¶ These churchmen agree that it is vain to ask men to be Christians in industry or politics and at the same time accept pagan ideals, motives and methods as their rules of action.

¶ No such concerted analysis of the moral character of our social order has ever before been attempted in the light of the mind of Christ. The position of leadership held by the writers—officials in the social service organizations and close counselors of officials—makes their articles an authentic expression of the slowly forming

THE MOSQUE OF OMAR

The Chief Rabbinate of Palestine claims the site upon which the famous Mosque of Omar stands as a place even more sacred to the Jew than to the Moslem. It is one of the few places in Jerusalem whose identification is without serious question. The Temple of Solomon must once have stood there. So sure is the Orthodox Jew that the site of the Holy of Holies is somewhere beneath the Mosque that he will not enter the building lest he profane the sacred spot. The Chief Rabbi has submitted the Jewish claim to the Mosque to the Government Commission on Holy Places, which is adjudicating the rights of the various communities to the sacred places. Naturally the Arabs are very bitter in their opposition to the Jewish claim, for the Mosque of Omar is the third most holy shrine in all Moslemdom. Palestine is still far from being a land of peace.

out of his own relieved heart. Apparently the elder brother's heart harbored no pain during his brother's absence and so felt no happy relief when he returned.

It is of course very difficult to apply to the whole family of mankind the same intense feeling of devotion that we do feel in our closer, smaller circles. We do not realize the thousands who are in misery. There is nothing to remind us of those who are straying in far countries. We are not so bound up in life with all our brethren, that their pain and wretchedness is our misery, or that we can have no peace save when they are at peace.

It might be remarked that any church maintaining its life without supreme concern for those not yet reached will be getting along not only without those who are astray, but without the Christ they worship, for he is not with them, but out after the straying ones. If this generation wants to recover Christ let it go about his particular work. He is far more likely to be found in the out-of-the-way places and the byways where there are lost to be sought, than in our well appointed sanctuaries where no such Christian concern exists.

The missionary spirit then is just love for our fellow-men, an intense, unselfish love among those who have some real feeling that they are members one of another. St. Paul wrote, "Whether one member suffers, all the members suffer with it." Walt Whitman put it,

"I do not ask the wounded person how he feels, I myself become the wounded person,
My hurts turn livid upon me as I lean on a cane and observe."

When we have that spirit our lives will be given to the work of finding and recovering all who are far from the kingdom of God. To be content with our lot as it is, simply argues a heart so hardened that one can enjoy a feast while in the same house his brother writhes in pain.

The most beautiful conception we have of God is that Christ has revealed him as the "Love that will not let us go." And the love that will not let us go, cannot let the others go either. No sooner does that love win us, than it calls us into line with its own unceasing effort to reach, wherever it may through us, any who may be restored to the Father's house. Love is the indefatigable missionary. It is the "Love of God, cherishing all mankind alike which lays on us the charge, "Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations."

ASHLEY DAY LEAVITT.

A GOOD "BUY"

A New England business man has been giving one thousand dollars a year for the last six years for the work of the Congregationalists in Shensi, China. His one thousand dollars has established one hundred and twenty churches, brought regular preaching to two hundred points, and in the year 1922 alone helped to turn twenty-six hundred Chinese into Christians. What tremendous dividends!

CHRISTIANIZING, NOT EUROPEANIZING

We have on occasion lamented the tendency of the Young Women's Christian Association and of our missionary societies to introduce western European costume into foreign lands. We are thankful, however, that not all missionaries are doing their utmost to deprive the world of variety and color. An American young woman at Kolhapur, India, writes with enthusiasm of the girls in the Esther Patton School. They "look so nice in the native costume of eight yards of a certain bordered cloth, draped gracefully about the body. Their smoothly combed and oiled black hair is so neat, and their black eyes are so bright." She goes on: "The girls in the school do all their own work. There are teams for bringing water, scouring vessels, sweeping, cooking, etc. The food they eat is very simple. By thus keeping the home life in the school simple we do not unfit the girls for going back to the simple life of the Indian village." Such a school makes one feel that those who control it have a good store of sound, good sense in their possession.

HOW MISSIONARIES HELP THEIR PEOPLE TO BECOME SELF-SUPPORTING

Our missionaries do not help their people to learn agriculture and common trades so much as do the Germans and the French, and perhaps not so much as do the English. But our people are doing more such work year by year. In the Hilltop Orphanage in Sidon, Syria, for instance, they teach the making of jam and preserves. When Mrs. Jessup began the industry she feared that she might not be able to find a market, but she had a most pleasant disappointment. Last winter the orphanage girls made two and three-quarters tons of orange and lemon marmalade, with the expectation that it would last till next winter. But it was all sold long before then. During the apricot season many orders came in for preserved apricots, one alone for two hundred and ten rutles (twelve hundred pounds), and a hotel in Beirut ordered one hundred jars. If we discover in America that we do not have a healthy religious life except in a community which is prosperous, why should we not expect to find the same fact in foreign lands? The sale of the canned apricots is helping to make intelligent Christians.

The head of the Police Bureau of Seoul, Korea, not a Christian himself, is urging his men to join the Police Officers' Bible Class. In Korea employees in some cases are allowed to leave their offices early to study Christianity. Is Korea wiser than America?

stood me have brought against me no charge of this kind. . . . I always stand by the preachers. I do not criticize them. I owe them too much. If there was nobody to evangelize, there would be nobody to pastor. You must bring in before you can bring up. You must bear before you can rear. All I say to ministers is: 'You are in the ministry not only to preach, but to expect immediate results. Hand-picked fruit is the best in the market. Go for the hand-picked fruit, and when that fruit is too high and you cannot reach it, and you have not got a ladder, ask for some godly brethren to come along and help shake the tree.'"

THE POCKET PIECE THAT PUR-CHASED PEACE

BY W. H. MORSE, M.D.

The coin so wonderfully used of God, as described in this article, was struck by the Scripture Gift Mission, and over 130,000 of others like it were circulated among the demobilization camps at the close of the World War. This story is illustrative of the good they may have done which will never be known this side of eternity.

The object of the mission which issues these coins, is the free distribution of the Scriptures. It is supported largely by voluntary contributions. In no part of the country are the Scriptures more appreciated than in the southern mountains. A plan is usually followed whereby children, if they read a Gospel, may secure a Testament, and it is thrilling to see their eagerness to become actual owners of the Word of God. All gifts to further this work are applied to the circulation of the Word of God.

Remittances should be sent to R. B. Haines, jr., secretary, Scripture Gift Mission, 119 South Fourth street, Philadelphia, Pa.

"Just as sure as you keep carrying that token in your coin purse you will be giving it to someone for a quarter!"

That was my sister's opinion.

"Oh, no," I replied, "I guess not."

"Likely as not you will drop it into the Bible school collection," she continued, and then added, "If I were you I wouldn't carry it with me."

It was one of the little white metal tokens from the Scripture Gift Mission of Philadelphia, just about the size of a twenty-five-cent piece. On one side was, "The Wages of Sin is Death. Romans 6:23." On the reverse side was, "The Free Gift of God is Eternal Life in Christ Jesus."

There was nothing superstitious about carrying it, but somehow it seemed good to have it in my pocket, and I had carried it fully a year; then, one day, it was missing. I did not have the least idea as to what had become of it, or when I had parted with it. It might have been several days before I had noticed that it was gone. My pocket had not been picked, for it had been in the coin purse, and that was intact. But it was gone; and sister remarked, in doubtful consolation, "That's all there is about it!" I obtained another and I have it yet.

One Sunday afternoon, several months after the first token had disappeared, among those who came into the Mission Bible School at Hartford, Conn., in the men's class was a stranger—an Italian. I presume that the teacher would not have paid any very particular attention to him if it had not been for one thing, and that was that the man kept his eyes on me, the superintendent, instead of paying attention to the lesson and its teacher. After the Bible school session it is our custom to have a prayer service and testimony meeting for about half an hour, and on this Sunday there was nothing particular to distinguish it from any other Sunday if it had not been for the incident that took place.

There had been several interesting testimonies, when the stranger stood up. Pointing his finger at me he said, "And you? Why do you not give your experience?"

I do not recall my answer, and he went on, "Come now! You tell how you one time thought you would cheat a poor Italian fruit seller!"

"Explain that," I said.

"Yes," he replied, "I put it up to you straight. You were in Waterbury, Connecticut, one day. You stopped to her stand and bought the bananas. They come to twenty-six cents. Did you pay it? No, you did not. What did you pay? You paid just one cent, and you slipped around the corner and got away. You remember? No? Pretending it was a quarter, with the penny, you handed her a white metal piece."

"It is possible!" I exclaimed. "My pocket piece! Like this?" And I showed the one that I had. "I did not know that I had paid it out," I continued, "but I have no doubt but what you are right, for in some way it was missing. I will go on purpose to Waterbury, and make it right."

"You let me say more," the man said. "You see what it says on that piece. All right. The woman she showed it to me. I read it. 'Wages.' 'Death.' I could not get to understand. It fixed itself in my mind, and I could not get away from it."

"Say! I gave her twenty-five cents for it. I asked the grocer what it meant about Romans, for I came from Rome. He said it was in the American Testament, and he read it to me. I must read some more about that. So I went by the book store, and buy me one American Testament. I never had one before. I read it, read all of it. I went in the mission. And oh, you guess I came happy! Yes, sure. I go all the time. I am one of them now yet."

"How did you come to identify me?" I asked.

"I do not know," he said, "but I came in here, and the woman had told me how you looked. When I heard you talk I did not know that maybe you did not intend to cheat her, and gave it out to convert her. Yes?"

I replied that I only wish it had done so.

"Listen!" he said with a laugh. "It did. I showed her the Testament. I read it to her, to others. It bought peace for her, for others. Yes, it did!"

"You still have it?" I asked.

"O no; sure!" he replied. "I lend it. See? I let folks read it. I let the dear Lord do the rest. Sure it buys peace!"

It was a strange expression, but true in a very large sense; for during the war thousands of those coins were distributed at the evangelistic services held in the demobilization camps, and in very deed they helped to purchase peace.

LLOYD GEORGE ON THE TURK

In his new book, "Is It Peace?" Lloyd George comments very spicily on the familiar remark that the Turk is "a gentleman." He says:

"The Turk has massacred hundreds of thousands of Armenians, and dishonored myriads of Christian women who trusted to his protection. Nevertheless, the Turk is a gentleman! By his indolence, his shiftiness, his stupidity, and his wantonness, he has reduced a garden to a desert. What better proof can there be that he is a real gentleman? For a German bribe he sold the friends who had repeatedly saved his wretched life. All the same, what a gentleman he is! He treated British prisoners with a barbarous neglect that killed them off in hundreds. Still, he is such a gentleman! He plunders, he slays, and outrages those who are unable to defend themselves. He misgoverns, cheats, lies and betrays. For all that, the Turk is a gentleman!"

THE ANGLICANS AND DR. MEYER IN AUSTRALIA

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

In your issue of September 22, 1923, in reviewing three outstanding books on Christian unity, there was a pretty sharp criticism of the action of a bishop of the Church of England in Australia in refusing permission to the Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D., to preach in the Anglican Church, which the writer of the article considered another incident making the world doubt the sincerity of the Anglican Church. While I protest that it is not reasonable to commend or condemn a whole church, be it Anglican, Presbyterian, Congregational or any other, still you may like to have the following information as to the action of another individual Anglican.

When Dr. Meyer arrived in Hobart, Tasmania, he was given a civic reception, at which the Anglican Bishop made an address, from the report of which, in "The Mercury," of Hobart, of July 13, 1923. I take the following quotations:

"Bishop Hay pointed out that the reception, rather than conferring an honor on Dr. Meyer, conferred an honor on the city, inasmuch as Hobart was honored by the presence of that gentleman, and the influential gathering which had assembled to welcome him, including as it did many members of the Chamber of Commerce among other best-known Hobart citizens, bore out that contention. . . .

"Bishop Hay, in eulogizing the mutual helpfulness of the churches in Tasmania and the assistance so freely given them in uplifting the moral life of the people, referred to a leading article which appeared in 'The Mercury' that morning. It was a very generous article in some respects, he said, but in some other respects it was rather ungenerous. One did not wish to draw attention to the statement that it Jesus Christ came to Australia he would be unable to preach from a Church of England pulpit unless he were 'episcopally ordained.' He thought he could leave judgment of that point to the minds of gentlemen present as far as the Church of England was concerned in Tasmania. He had had non-Episcopal ministers preaching in the Church of England for a considerable time. The Rev. A. Job, the former State director of the prohibition campaign, had preached in Holy Trinity and St. George's Churches at Hobart, and in many other churches throughout Tasmania. He had done so with his (the Bishop's) full consent. Mr. Job had been anxious to have opportunities of speaking to the people, and he had been allowed such opportunities. They, of course, might reply to 'The Mercury,' but it would be rather unfair to say that if Jesus Christ came to Australia, judging by the immigration laws and their application to Asiatics, He might not obtain entrance. He was sorry that certain references to what was being done here or elsewhere had been published in the way they had, but it was not for him to comment on what his brother bishops had done, no doubt for particular reasons. He wished Dr. Meyer to understand that, as far as Tasmania was concerned, the different sections of the Christian Church were working in the most brotherly and friendly spirit possible, and such expressions in the press were apt to cause a jar, and to break a little of the fellowship which existed. He regarded ministers of other denominations as his closest friends, for he was brought into such close contact with them as to be able to appreciate them."

In an interview published in "The Mercury" on July 12, Dr. Meyer speaks of the negotiations which have been had at Lambeth between Free Churchmen and Anglicans. While he sees the difficulties, he adds: "But our negotiations have perhaps helped to bring about a unity of spirit which is far in advance of anything we have experienced in the past. I, myself, have preached in a number of Anglican churches with the ready consent of the Bishops." He goes on to speak of the renewal of his intimate friendship with the Archbishop of Melbourne and the fact that the welcome to the Archbishop's palace and his presence as chairman at Dr. Meyer's first meeting at Melbourne were happy signs that the old friendship had not been impaired.

The committee thanks all who have previously aided them, and hopes that many more will do so this year. There is still a great deal of suffering in the churches of our faith in Europe.

THE MONDAY CLUB SERMONS

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. INTERNATIONAL GOLDEN RULE SUNDAY

BY CHARLES V. VICKREY

President of International Near East Association

ALL CHRISTIANS, in theory at least, accept the Golden Rule as a guide in life. Do we practice it? Would not our lives be richer spiritually, our churches stronger, and our nation a greater force for international righteousness if we lived as we profess the Golden Rule?

The observance of Golden Rule Sunday, December 2d, is intended as a spiritual exercise for the prosperous, as a source of food supply for the homeless and starving, and as a tangible expression of international fellowship and good-will.

On this date all persons who are disposed to make a practical application of the Golden Rule are requested to provide for their Sunday dinner the same menu that is approved and used for at least fifty thousand of the orphans of the Near East, and to contribute the difference between the cost of the usual Sunday dinner and the simpler, less expensive orphanage menus as a thank offering for the purchase of food for the orphans of the Near East.

Sunday has been chosen because it is a day when all the family are at home with a greater regularity of attendance at the dinner table and when there is usually less haste with more opportunity for self-examination and review of our stewardship of life and money.

The Sunday following Thanksgiving is especially appropriate in America, as the Golden Rule dinner will present the contrast between the unprecedented prosperity, tranquillity and good fortune of America and the poverty and suffering of misery-ridden lands across the sea.

If rightly observed, this Golden Rule Sunday should have a spiritual value in the lives of our American churches that will far transcend in importance any possible material comfort that may flow from it to orphans of Christian martyrs of Bible lands.

Luxurious living and self-indulgence may be as injurious to the prosperous as undernourishment and starvation are to the less fortunate. In saving these thousands of children and training them for future usefulness we may find that we are saving our own souls and our own country from moral decadence.

It is a notable fact that this day is being observed internationally and should be an important contribution to international co-operation and world peace.

When people break bread together they become friends. On this International Golden Rule Sunday the people of all nations, figuratively, at least, will gather around the same table, partaking of the same food and in some measure thinking the same thoughts.

These tens of thousands of orphan children in considerable measure hold the future of the Near East, and by the international application of the principles of the Golden Rule, in dealing with them, we may be able to avoid international strife and disastrous warfare in the next generation.

Certainly if, through no fault of ours, it had been our lot to die in the late war, and if our children had been left not only without parents or responsible relatives, but also without a country, we would hope that some co-religionist or other philanthropist would provide for our children at least the necessities of life and opportunity for attaining self-support. "Whatsoever you would that others should do unto you (or unto your children thus left desolate), do ye even so unto them."

A DANGEROUS PREACHER

The Protestant minister is a strange and fearful animal to many a South American. Rev. Harold H. Cook, an American missionary in Brazil, writes: "There are people in the town of Ponta Grossa, Parana, who make the sign of the cross when they see a minister of the Gospel. They look on this as a protection against the evil influences which they believe emanates from him as a Protestant minister. Once a Brazilian worker offered a tract to a person, who commenced to tremble. On another occasion, writes this worker, 'the daughter of a lawyer said to me, "I cannot accept the tract you offer, because I made a solemn vow to be a faithful soldier to my bishop and help the Catholic church. I also promised not to read anything prohibited by the church."' Another person feared to attend our meetings because there is always somebody on the watch in the immediate vicinity of the Protestant churches, and woe to the Catholic who should be caught in the dreadful sin of entering it."

Mr. Cook tells of one good-sized town in his bailiwick that had seen a preacher of the gospel only twice before he went there last year, once in 1904 and again in 1915. In two other towns he was the first person that ever preached the gospel. A Brazilian preacher had visited one of the towns some years before, but had been unable to get a room for a service. Mr. Cook was so fortunate as to reach the place while the priest was away.

REORGANIZATION OF MOODY INSTITUTE

The Moody Bible Institute must be the largest Bible school in this country. Eight hundred and seventy-two students attend its Day School, eight hundred and sixty-two its Evening School, and seven thousand and thirty are enrolled in its Correspondence School. The Institute has just appointed the Rev. James M. Gray as its president, succeeding Mr. Henry P. Crowell, who for nearly twenty years has held the title. Mr. Crowell has become president of the Board of Trustees. Mr. Gray was formerly the Executive Secretary. Rev. L. W. Gosnell has become Dean of the Day School; Rev. P. B. Fitzwater, Dean of the Evening School, and Rev. J. H. Ralston, Dean of the Correspondence School.

SAILORS IN TEXAS

Nearly two thousand seamen have visited the Seamen's Church Institute at Houston, Texas, since its opening in January, 1923. Men from fifteen countries and nearly every state have made use of the building and have crowded the available lodging space. INDUCEMENTS FOR VISITING LIBERIA

Archdeacon Russell, of St. Paul's School, Lawrenceville, Virginia, came home from Liberia not long ago a "Knight Commander of the Liberian Humane Order of African Redemption." It is the most highly prized decoration within the gift of the Liberian government. Liberia College did its best by mailing the degree of Doctor of Laws to the Archdeacon after he had returned.

Evidently visiting Liberia has its advantages.

A remarkable collection of Bibles is now on exhibit at the New York Public Library. It includes the famous Gutenberg Bible (printed in 1453), the first real book ever printed from movable type, heading the list; the first American-printed English Bible, which was brought out in Philadelphia in 1782; and the first Bible in any language that was printed in America—John Eliot's Indian Bible in the Natick, Massachusetts, dialect.

AN IDEAL MARRIAGE

"Yassah, colonel, it's all right. Mah wife doan' need any watchin'. She'll shorely wuk jes' as hard as ef I was dere."

Such, at least, is the tale told by "Harper's Magazine."

The World of To-day

THE NOVEMBER ELECTIONS

Very few of the November elections this year were of much national interest. In Vermont the Republicans elected their candidate for Senator by a vote of two to one; in Salt Lake City the candidates representing the interests of the Mormon Church won decisively over the opposition; in Ohio, on the whole, the candidates who had the backing, public or tacit, of the Ku Klux Klan, did fairly well. They met defeat in Steubenville, where their opponents had organized. Their most substantial victory was in Youngstown, where their candidate for mayor won over a divided opposition. In New York, the notorious William R. Hearst had combined with the Republicans in his support of ten candidates for the Supreme Court. The Democratic management put out a poster representing Hearst and Koenig, the chairman of the Republican Committee, as bed fellows, with the shade of William McKinley exclaiming, "Has it come to this!"—a very effective bit of work. The Hearst-Republican candidates lost by a vote of practically two to one. The majority in favor of the Tammany candidates suggests that at least some Republicans must have objected to the alliance of the party with a man of Hearst's sort and voted for the Democrats. In the six special Congressional elections the Republicans gained one vote, so that they now have a majority of seventeen in the House; but there are many Republicans who are ready to vote quite without regard to party lines, so that the Republican control of the new House will be precarious.

THE END OF THE INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

For the moment the prospect of an International Economic Conference on the question of German reparations has gone glimmering. Premier Poincaré insisted that the conference should be limited to the question of Germany's present capacity to pay. He defined "present" as extending to the year 1930. That year is set by the Versailles Treaty as the term beyond which any modification in German obligations must receive the unanimous consent of the Powers in order to be binding. Poincaré also insisted that the conference should not consider the French occupation of the Ruhr in any way. Our Government has refused to enter a conference so limited, although it appears that Great Britain, Belgium and Italy would have been willing to do so. The fact is, America must not continue to stand off in a "holier than thou" attitude. If we told France that we were ready to consider an adjustment of French and other Allied debts to us, Poincaré could afford to take a very different course. No matter what we say, it still remains that the more we ask of France, the more she will ask of Germany. We cannot get away from that. And it is just as necessary for the French government to submit questions involving reparations to its parliament as it is for our administration to submit questions involving the Allied debts to Congress. It is time that we in America began to recognize that it is still true that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

THE GERMAN KALEIDOSCOPE

The outstanding event of the past week in Germany was the opera bouffe attempt of Hitler, head of the Bavarian Fascisti, to turn his dreams into reality. Hitler is a Viennese sign painter, thirty-nine years old. After the war, during which he served in the Austrian army, he developed his talent for demagogic oratory in the campaign to keep Lichtenstein Austrian. Later he resorted to Munich, where he out-Heroded Herod as a Bavarian chauvinist. Mussolini's examples stirred him up to form a Bavarian Facismo. Its motto was, "Down with Sovietism and Jewish domination." Last January he added, "Away with the French, the invaders." He managed to enlist thousands of young men in his organization. According to his own account the number ran up to a hundred thousand. He talked of marching on Berlin to overthrow the "Communist" government there. He had been expected to make a bid for power on September 27, but concluded on that day that discretion was the better part of valor. On the evening of November 8, with six hundred of his men he invaded the Burbrau Keller, a beer hall where Dr. Von Kahr, "Dictator" of Bavaria, was making a speech to the members of his government and a group of political leaders. Hitler announced that he would take direction of the provisional government of the German Empire and that General Ludendorff would take command of the German National Army. Von Kahr and the commander of the Bavarian troops, General Van Lossow, who was also present, apparently acquiesced in Hitler's revolution. Once away from the beer hall, however, they ordered the arrest of Hitler and Ludendorff. By the next morning, the Hitler putsch had come to an inglorious end. Hitler, as far as is known, is a fugitive and Ludendorff, lately supreme commander of the war armies of William II, is a paroled laughing stock. Germany can scarcely take him seriously again. Former Crown Prince Frederick William has slipped across the German border from his refuge in Holland. Whether the Allies will try to force Germany to exile him again is not yet determined. With all the political confusion added to the trouble they have in getting enough to eat, the Germans still manage to maintain a semblance of orderly government—a proof of their inherent strength.

EX-PRESIDENT WILSON'S ARMISTICE DAY MESSAGE

The night before Armistice Day the air was cleared for the radio to carry an Armistice Day message from Woodrow Wilson to the American people. Millions of people listened to it. Although it has been published probably in every daily paper in the land, parts of it should be quoted again:

"... the stimulating memories of that happy time of triumph are forever marred and embittered for us by the shameful fact that when the victory was won—won, be it remembered, chiefly by the indomitable spirit and ungrudging sacrifices of our own incomparable soldiers—we turned our backs upon our associates and refused to bear any responsible part in the administration of peace, or the firm and permanent establishment of the results of the war—won at so terrible a cost of life and treasure—and withdrew into a sullen and selfish isolation which is deeply ignoble because manifestly cowardly and dishonorable. This must always be a source of deep mortification to us and we shall inevitably be forced by the moral obligations of freedom and honor to retrieve that fatal error and assume once more the role of courage, self-respect and helpfulness which every true American must wish to regard as our natural part in the affairs of the world. . . .

"Happily, the present situation in the world of affairs affords us the opportunity to retrieve the past and to render mankind the inestimable service of proving that there is at least one great and powerful nation which can turn away from programs of self-interest and devote itself to practising and establishing the high ideals of disinterested service and the consistent maintenance of exalted standards of conscience and of right.

"The only way in which we can worthily give proof of our appreciation of the high significance of Armistice Day is by resolving to put self-interest away and once more formulate and act upon the highest ideals and purposes of international policy. Thus, and only thus, can we return to the true traditions of America."

The next day Mr. Wilson addressed thousands of his admirers who came to Washington on their annual Armistice Day pilgrimage in his honor. Wilson is still greatly handicapped physically, but the great brain which put out some of the enduring state papers in our history is still functioning. Three times the ex-President had to stop in his address on account of his emotion. The final words of his little speech were especially to the point:

"I am not one of those that have the least anxiety about the triumph of the principles I have stood for. I have seen fools resist Providence before, and I have seen their destruction, as will come upon these again—utter destruction and contempt. That we shall prevail is as sure as that God reigns."

LORD BIRKENHEAD'S BARBED COMMENTS

Lord Birkenhead, who started life as one of England's acutest lawyers, and who after the war became Lord High Chancellor, is a gentleman who does not think it necessary to sing in chorus with the "uplifters" of the world. Every one recalls his setting a good part of America by the ears on his recent visit here by describing President Wilson as an "impractical idealist," and by saying numerous other things which we may be thankful most of us do not believe. When he was installed as Lord Rector of Glasgow University last week he made a speech which would make one think that Bernhardt had come in the flesh once more. However, it is difficult to get away from his remark concerning the teaching of Jesus. "It would be unreasonable to suppose that when He admonished him who was assaulted to turn the other cheek to the striker, or him who was rich to sell all his possessions and give them to the poor, He was laying down standards of conduct which He either expected or desired to see generally adopted. He was, on the contrary, discussing through the medium of metaphor a sweet and beautiful moral atmosphere for the purification of imperfect mankind." Most of us might not venture to say what Lord Birkenhead has said here, but certainly we act as though we held his view. What, he asked, has been the reaction of the Christian religion upon international conduct? "What was its influence over the recent world convulsion?" He recalled the Pope's silence on the moral issues of the war. He might well have referred also to the feebleness of conviction displayed by the Church in many lands during the war. For the time being most of us ignored the command of Jesus to love our enemies.

A BRITISH REVIVAL OF PRUSSIANISM

Lord Birkenhead, in his rectorial address at Glasgow last week, quite tore away any pleasant camouflage in which we may indulge in justifying our abstention as a government from our international responsibilities. He ascribed our absence from the League of Nations as due to the fact that "they [the Americans] draw, and rightly draw, a sharp and logical distinction between idealism in their capacity as private citizens or private charity and idealism in their corporate or national character." And so, he said, "they exercise their undoubted right in repudiating at the first opportunity an idealism the contention of which they believe to be at once impracticable, strange to their position and incompatible with their national interests." He is indeed the devil's counselor. For what is the world in need of except to receive the message of Christianity as a categorical imperative, not only for individuals, but for corporations and governments? The final words of his address have been widely quoted. "The world continues to offer glittering prizes to those who have stout arms and sharp swords, and it is therefore extremely improbable that the experience of future nations will differ in any material respect from that which has happened since the twilight of the human race. It is for us, therefore, to prove in our history a martial rather than a military people; to abstain, as has been our habit, from provocations, but to maintain in our own hands adequate means for our own protection and, so equipped, to march with head erect and bright eyes along the road to our imperial destiny." The men who in the days of Greece or Rome argued that slavery was an everlasting institution were as reasonable—and as silly—as is Lord Birkenhead.

AS OTHERS SEE US

America as a country is so adolescent that we always want to find out what other people think of us. Every now and then we receive a visitor who surprises us by telling us the disagreeable things he finds in America as well as the pleasant ones. Israel Zangwill, the great Jewish novelist, has been painting us in unsparing colors the last week or two. "There is very little honor, justice or dignity in this country," he said, "compared to England." He illustrated our absence of dignity by remarking that the opinion of Benny Leonard, "who is a good pugilist, is sought on the merits of a candidate for judge and solemnly printed in the metropolitan press. Then there are sickening interviews with Little Peggy, the child cinema star, on matters of weight." He made a well-deserved comment on our Ku Klux Klan. "The Ku Klux Klan, which we would call a sort of exaggerated Boy Scout movement, is grotesque and your attitude toward it is no less grotesque. In England it would be laughed out of existence. But in America there is no sense of humor." Our lack of shame he illustrated by the terrible story of Leo Frank, the Jew who was lynched in Georgia a few years ago. Since then it has been proved that Frank was innocent of the crime of which he was accused, but the American people have done nothing to atone for the wrong done him. Zangwill contrasted the action of Voltaire, who, when he found that an innocent Frenchman had been put to death, did everything possible to make amends, even erecting a statue to the victim in his native city of Toulouse. Zangwill ended the shameful story of our treatment of Frank with the biting charge that America "could stand injustice." There is much bitter truth in what Mr. Zangwill has said. Consider his comment that the League of Nations cannot end war because the nations do not want to end war; or his remark that Christianity cannot end war because Christianity is a minority religion and has proved an "organized hypocrisy"; or his charge that America "held up a vision of world peace and then sneaked out." Of course his epigrams are too sweeping, but how much truth there is in the sneer that we pursue "peppiness" instead of happiness? "You are inconsequential," he told us, "and in general America thinks without acting and acts without thinking." But for all his perception of American failings, he began more than one of his lectures by saying that on the whole Americans were the most lovable people in the world. Mr. Zangwill's comments should be a tonic to us.

CHOCOLATE AND ORPHANS

Some thirty years ago, Milton S. Hershey put up a chocolate manufactory near Harrisburg, Pa., close to the farm where he had started life. Since then, thanks to Mr. Hershey's enterprise and America's tastes for sweets, the poor farm boy has become a multi-millionaire. As his business expanded a veritable town grew up about his factories. He formed water and electrical companies, and then a department store company to look out for the needs of the residents of his town. Before this he had started a trolley company to bring the workers to the factory. The Hershey Transit Company, it is worth noting, is the only trolley company in Pennsylvania that has never increased its fares above the original five cents. Mr. Hershey found that it was cheaper to raise his own sugar in Cuba than to buy it and today not only owns or controls more than fifty thousand acres there, but runs one hundred miles of railroad track. Mr. Hershey in his business always had a human interest. He cared about his employees. Long before Henry Ford began to pay bonuses to his workmen, Mr. Hershey, it is said, was paying his men a bonus of ten per cent. of their annual wages, and the quarterly dividends which he now gives his workmen run as high as twenty-three per cent. of their pay. The Hersheys had no children, a very great grief to them. They resolved to do something for other people's children. Fourteen years ago he and his wife incorporated an industrial school for orphans, to be situated on his old homestead. Now it is made public that he has endowed the school with all his ownings in his sixteen companies. The total value of the gift is put at sixty million dollars. This orphanage is open first to orphans born in the three counties close to Hershey, Dauphin, Lebanon and Lancaster, second to those born in Pennsylvania, and third to those born anywhere in the United States. Probably the vast endowment gives the school larger resources than are possessed by any other of its kind except Girard College in Philadelphia. One hundred and twenty boys are growing up in the Hershey school now. Within a few years it will accommodate a thousand. The school tries to free itself of any institutional air. New pupils begin their work in a house eight miles away from the group of school buildings, and there meet the other children and their teachers. Mr. Hershey has made a noble gift. We would not alter it. But we wish that some man or indeed many men of means might become interested in giving funds to help the finest people of our country to have larger families. After all, but few of the children who go into orphans' homes are the best human material. The man who would establish a sixty million dollar fund to increase the salaries of professors and high school teachers and ministers with the increase of the size of their families would be performing a service to which all the generations of the future would be indebted. He would help to assure a noble leadership for America in the years to come. A new Carnegie or Rockefeller will catch that vision.

THE NEW SPIRIT IN THE CHURCH OF THE BOHEMIAN BRETHREN

The Triennial Synod of the Evangelical Church of the Bohemian Brethren met last summer at Prague. The Church of the Bohemian Brethren consists of a union of the old Reformed and Lutheran churches of Bohemia. That church fellowship in Czechoslovakia is beginning to transcend local bitter jealousies was evidenced by the presence of an official delegate from the Czechoslovakian German Evangelical Church. The example of our Federal Council of Churches has had its effect in Czechoslovakia. The Synod resolved to enter into negotiations with the other Protestant churches in the republic with a view to forming a common organization for united work. It was certainly also partly due to American influence that the Synod recommended to all its congregations that they organize special committees for the study of social questions and for the practical betterment of the social organization according to the principles of the Gospel. The Synod urged ministers and elders to impress upon their congregations that the church is not merely an organization for the administering of divine services and pastoral functions, but a working body for the making real of God's kingdom on earth. In order to stimulate interest in foreign missions, the Synod made provision for foreign missionary collections and for annual missionary meetings with lectures from foreign lands.

HUS VS. THE VIRGIN MARY IN PRAGUE

A recent incident in Prague reveals the growing force of Protestant feeling in Czechoslovakia. A Roman Catholic writer was so imprudent as to declare publicly that Prague and the nation must become openly Roman Catholic again, and that the monument of John Hus, on the chief square of Prague, must disappear in order to make room for that of the Virgin Mary, the Victorious, which had been erected in the seventeenth century to commemorate the victory of Rome over Bohemia and was torn down after the revolution of 1918. The Roman Catholic's suggestion stirred up a wave of popular resentment. Not only the Protestants and the new Czechoslovakian National Church, but the sokols (the gymnastic societies), the society of teachers, and all sorts of progressive organizations, as well as the socialistic parties unanimously declared their loyalty to the great traditions of a free national and spiritual life. From all parts of the country came declarations that if the monument in Prague were removed, not only the capital but every other town and village throughout the country would erect new tokens of admiration for Hus. Thousands of people withdrew from the Roman Church and the nationalist religious movement gained new strength. The Romanist's suggestion has been buried beyond resurrection. The nation has not yet made the sixth of July, the date of Hus's martyrdom, an official holiday, but by almost unanimous consent the day is so observed. Czechoslovakia can no longer be numbered as a Roman Catholic land.

THE IDEAL THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL COURSE

The Draft Report of the Committee on Recruiting the Ministry, appointed by the Unitarian Laymen's League, which we print on page 594, is a most suggestive document. Everyone will applaud its counsel to laymen to give a more adequate support to the Church and to encourage their own sons to enter the ministry. When the whole Church thinks about ministers' salaries as do the men who made this report, ministers will no longer carry the load of anxiety which torments many of them to-day. What the report has to say in behalf of weeding out unnecessary churches is also worthy of attention. Perhaps its best suggestion is that each young man who enters the ministry should be required to serve for not less than one year as an assistant to some clergyman of ability. Just as the young physician needs to spend his year as an interne in the hospital the young minister needs to get the inspiration of seeing how some man of consecration, of force and ability does his work. Its suggestions as to the reshaping of the theological course will not command universal assent, but they are valuable as a basis of discussion. A good many critics would question how much the minister needs courses in elementary law and in international law and diplomacy although undeniably they would benefit some men. But one thing is certain, that the minister should enter deep into the spirit of Jesus Christ. He must have as the moving passion of his life the bringing of the Kingdom of God and of His righteousness on earth. Some suggestions in the course outlined in the report tie up with that passion. The authorities of our theological schools will do well to consider them carefully. If we ourselves were making suggestions to theological schools we should urge greater attention to public speaking and to the actual conduct of prayer meetings, Sunday-schools and public service. That is not to forget other needs of the minister.

Steinmetz told us that all railroads would be run by electric power one of these days. The Pennsylvania Railroad is planning to help carry out his prophecy. It is expecting to electrify the stretches of the main line through the Allegheny Mountain section on both sides of the watershed between Galitzin and Cresson. The railroad will put up power houses at the bituminous coal mines near the line.

The Reparations Commission on October 17 voted to grant Hungary a tentative moratorium for reparation payments for a period of twenty years. Hungary could receive as beneficent treatment from the League of Nations as Austria were it not that Hungary has not accepted the result of the war as a fait accompli. She still talks of the territory of which she was "robbed" and lets it be known that some day she means to get it back.

Lloyd George in America

THERE was considerable of apprehension as to just what sort of reception Lloyd George would receive in America and what impression he would make. The apprehension was banished after he had been here one day. The crowds went quite wild about him. Fifth Avenue was lined with people the whole way from the docks to the hotel, and the throngs cheered vociferously. He is evidently a popular hero. Even the Irish cheered, with the exception of the few irreconcilables, who are miserable because they have lost their grievance. After his first speech the nation took him to its heart, and he has grown more and more deeply into the affection of the people.

This is all very interesting because he was turned down by his own people, as the other two, who with him won the war, were turned down by their own people—Clemenceau and Wilson. When England was at its most critical moment he stepped in and achieved the wonderful feat of amalgamating all parties to win the war. But when the peace came he could not preserve the amalgamation and it split up into its constituent elements, and he was left without an office, although more than any other Englishman he could have solved the problems of the peace. We imagine that one reason the American people have acclaimed him here so vociferously is that they feel that if his strong hand was upon the helm again in England the European ship of state might be cleared out of the present seemingly hopeless tangle. But he is of the stuff the crowd admires. He came up from obscurity to one of the two or three most prominent positions of the world. He was, with the exception of President Wilson, the most talked of man during the war. He has a personality which has all that charm of power about it that the people admire and all of that democratic oneness with the people that they love. Whatever the British people feel about him—and there are signs of their turning to him again—the American people believe in his greatness and fundamentally democratic heart. We imagine that should Mr. Wilson go to England to-day the English people would express that same faith in him that the American people are expressing in Lloyd George, and welcome him just as vociferously. For in England they still consider Mr. Wilson the one really great American; we consider Lloyd George the one really great citizen of Britain.

Lloyd George has spoken in several of the large cities of America and it is very interesting to see the two or three things on which he has laid greatest emphasis. First of all, he has spoken in great boldness and frankness to the effect that the Ruhr invasion is threatening the peace of Europe and has all the elements of a conflagration in it. He has not minimized the obligations of Germany to pay reparations, but he has criticized in almost every speech the present policy of the French government. The English people seem to be largely with him in this feeling, and certainly if applause means anything large proportions of his American audiences shared this feeling. (It should be said that one or two "patriotic" organizations criticized his attitude in letters sent to the "New York Times" and other papers, but these same papers editorially seemed to be with Lloyd George.) Along with this he pictured the terrible and hopeless condition into which Europe is rapidly passing, and drew a darker picture than some Americans have who have made a close study of European affairs. We mention this because there has been a disposition in certain quarters to discount the stories of chaos and despair returning Americans have told of Europe. No one can paint a gloomier outlook for Europe than Lloyd George has painted, and he surely ought to know.

The second note that has run through all of his addresses is that there is no hope for the solution of the European problems, either temporarily or permanently, unless the United States associates herself in some way with the undertaking. (This runs all through the address printed in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK.) It should be through the League, but if not, in some equally effective way. At present there is a deadlock between the two great powers, Britain and France, each one standing for a different policy. If the United States were there she would be a great mediating and determining factor. We cannot see how anyone could have failed to be deeply impressed with the great statesman's constant emphasis on this point. He seemed to feel that we could do with our counsels for the present Europe what we did for the Europe of 1918 with our armies.

The third thing that Lloyd George was continually pleading for was closer and closer co-operation of the English-speaking peoples of the world. The United States and the British Empire, standing together, could secure the peace of the world and keep it—without the use of force. Not only were we one in language, tradition and democracy, but our international ideals were the same, namely, the welfare of all peoples. Lloyd George did not say out of modesty what he would say, namely, that Britain was at present the only nation which was thinking in world terms. All the official utterances that have come from France and Italy have been purely national—what is best for France or Italy. We do not recall one instance where Poincaré or Mussolini have said, We want to act for the best welfare of all Europe. Practically every utterance from Britain, in dealing with the Ruhr, Corfu and other situations has been, What is best for Europe? Lloyd George did not say this, but he knows it, for he knows his own utterances, which have all been of this nature, and he knows the utterances of his government. He knows that if the United States would be true to its fundamental instinct it would speak in world terms too. Great Britain and the United States, together, thinking and speaking in world terms, could mitigate the existing conditions at once, take steps to secure co-operation among the nations for the common good, and preserve the peace of the world.

“Blessed Be Work”

PART I.

IN the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, the third chapter, at the tenth verse, are the words often quoted: “For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, ‘If any will not work, neither let him eat.’” St. Paul evidently laid great emphasis upon this principle, that if a man will not work he shall not eat. He himself worked and earned his bread by his craft as a tentmaker, and his Lord and Master spent His time up to the age of thirty years in working as a carpenter.

But in that simpler organization of the East it was not even taken into account, with all its fruitful plenty, with its almost illimitable resources, it was not thought that there could ever be men willing to work and yet not able to find the work to do; men eager to earn their living honorably by the sweat of their brows, but kept idle by circumstances which they could not alter. Such a sight as the hunger marches through the streets of London to-day would be incredible to the contemporaries of St. Paul and of our Lord Jesus Christ. With them it was simply the problem of the idleness of men who would not work, and the problem of men who were idle when they would work never emerged. But the fact that Christ and His apostles never took into account a situation which has come to be a reality to-day, when one and a third million Englishmen are unable to find work, shows us that somehow we have deviated very widely from the intention and thought of Christ; that somehow we have ordered society, and ordered industry, and ordered the relations of people to one another in a way that is intrinsically a violation of His law. We say, truly, that our troubles at the present time are due to one single fact: that modern society has become an acquisitive society; that is to say, a society of human beings that are all engaged in getting as much as they can; they think that the primary object of life; a society in which human beings are allowed to do this without censure, to do it as a matter of course. This acquisitive society is entirely contrary to the very fundamental thought of Christ, because, in His thought, the object of society is to realize the Kingdom of God upon earth, and His intention is that every man should be engaged in seeking that Kingdom of God, and taking the pecuniary and material advantages of the earth as quite secondary, as coming in the train of obedience to the primary duty of life.

But perhaps the wearing misery of the present situation will open our eyes and teach us wisdom. Certainly the lessons are being driven home upon us—if not yet quite clearly—forcibly, and in such a commanding way that we cannot avoid them. In the situation to-day there is certainly a voice speaking, which says, “This is the way; walk ye in it,” when we are inclined to turn to the right or to the left, and if we are teachable—at any rate those of us who are teachable, God will teach. There is one minor result of the present situation which is certainly valuable and will be, namely, the dawning upon many a man to-day of the blessedness of work. There are many of us who begin to realize that the happiest condition of life, and, indeed, the only condition of life that is happy at all in the true sense of the word, is that a man should have his work and do it; that he should have work to do and be able to do it; that he should be able to do his work to earn a living and stand unshamed among his fellowmen, conscious that he serves them and helps them by the work he is doing. That, we begin to perceive, is the supreme felicity upon this planet, the only thing that any one of us may seriously desire as the condition of a good life. We are sometimes apt to read the Old Testament as if hard work on the soil was given as a penalty for the Fall. But if this is the correct reading of that early chapter of the Bible, it only shows the goodness of God, that the very punishment inflicted upon man is a blessing, even his greatest blessing; the remedy for the evil that man did was that he should find work the greatest blessing of human life. Yes, work is the greatest and most permanent blessing of life. There, amongst all the great movements of nature and of the other creatures upon earth, is man, who goeth forth to his labor in the morning, eager and resolute, and who returns from his labor in the evening, tired, but thankful. Something attempted, something done, he has earned his night’s repose; you can find nothing better on earth for a man than that. The regularity of labor calls out his faculties and employs his time. He has the sense of doing something that is valuable to others, something that contributes to the common weal; the knowledge that he, though his work may be comparatively small in the great sum of things, is really wanted and is playing a necessary part in the great whole. It is that which makes human life a fruitful seed of all blessings and a condition of permanent joy. This truth begins to dawn on many a man when he seeks right and left, near and far, and cannot find that supreme blessing of life—work by which a man can live.

In recent months millions of money have been spent in maintaining the unemployed. People say, “What a tax upon the community, what a sure way to national bankruptcy!” That, however, is to miss the point altogether. It is no great tax upon the community. We maintained more than five millions of men doing nothing—and worse than nothing—for four years, and yet never complained. It is nothing for a great nation to maintain two million persons in idleness; it does not hurt you, but, oh, how it hurts them! That is the calamity, that is the disease. What an injury to them all! The shame and the bitterness, the loss of self-respect, the sacrifice of joy and satisfaction in life, when the days pass and there is nothing to do! No one has yet been able to estimate the demoralizing effects of the past two years, but the committee of experts who inquired recently into the unemployment question in East London report that the unemployment doles are having disastrous moral results on young people of both sexes. It does not appear to be the men who receive the help from the state that are chiefly injured; it is the young people growing up, who see that it can be done—that you can live without work, that you can make the state support you. One observer makes this remark: "They are more than a danger; they are proving a curse." That curse we shall have to take to ourselves and bear the penalty. Undoubtedly the vast majority of those who are unemployed want work, not support. Support is, in their eyes, no substitute for work. Even if it were sufficient—which it never can be—this workless man, this man who cannot find work, the average man, what is he? He is a man with means, he does not so much want subsistence, or even existence, as a life—a life worth having, a sense of worth in living, a knowledge that his fellow-men rely upon him and thank him and honor him. That is what the workless people want.

It is said that there are some who are very well content to do nothing and to be supported at the expense of the community. Doubtless there are some in all classes of society, some of all descriptions, who are very well content to live that idle life, but they are not representative; they are the abnormal specimens of humanity. Among the richer classes, and among the poorer, they exist, the people who are well content to let everyone do the work for them, if only they may be spared trouble. But you do not reckon by those who are the exceptions, and, speaking broadly, it is true to say that the unemployed are men and women who want work, and they want to do their work, their share of the work of the world.

"Adsum"*

THROUGHOUT the New Testament we find how eagerly the primitive Church watched for Christ to return and finish what He had begun. In every age Christians have cherished the same quenchless hope. They know that the one thing they need supremely is the presence of the Lord himself. And the contrast between this desire and its long disappointment proves a stumbling block to many. Christ has never come again after the fashion in which His first disciples looked to behold Him before they should taste of death. Perhaps the key to the contradiction lies in our human infirmity. For we have no skill to harmonize what is temporal with what is eternal. Because of the illusion of these mortal years we are forced to think of a past and a future which find no place in God's everlasting Now. Yet in each generation men perceive the advent of Christ as they realize how His spiritual judgment is being enacted on earth already. The day of the Lord extends down through the ages. But His manifestation arrives to successive souls as they wake up to discern Him who stands at the door and says continually, "Adsum: I am here."

A volume of "Anglican Essays" has just been published which seeks to vindicate the central position of the Church of England against recent Anglo-Catholic propaganda. The essays are written with marked ability and follow a consecutive plan. The Archbishop of Armagh on "Christian Liberty" gives a powerful and sober summary of "the principles of the Anglican Communion as Catholic and Reformed." Other contributors show how decisively these principles diverge from the doctrine of the Mass and the cultus of the Virgin which belong to the Roman Church and its imitators. Dr. G. G. Coulton analyzes "Rome as Unreformed" with the courage and learning of a great scholar, and exposes the habitual dishonesty of modern Roman controversialists. We are chiefly attracted, however, by the essay on "The New Reformation," which glows and smoulders with prophetic fervor. The Rev. C. E. Raven, who is well known as a former editor of "The Challenge," understands at any rate that in days like these people simply do not care whether "Central Anglicans" are supported by representative divines from Hooker and Chillingworth down to Creighton and Benson. Mr. Raven looks away from the Christian past to the Christian future, and turns impatiently from the accessories of faith to its One Author and Finisher. We are living in the midst of an apocalyptic age. "When the world plunged into war the spirit of man recovered the atmosphere and the temper of those far-off days in Palestine, their romance and self-sacrifice, their fellowship and their hope." In a season of terror and great darkness, when men's hearts are failing them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth, the Redeemer is being revealed anew.

Moreover, the movement of thought leads on to a similar conclusion. The tyranny of materialism has been shattered, and the tendency of modern thinking is to pass from a static to a dynamic standpoint. Our best minds have come to conceive of human history, not as the record of the dead and buried past, but rather as the past existing in a creative present. In like manner the New Testament bids us conceive of Jesus Christ, not as a bygone legend, but as moving among us in all His creative power. For He is nowhere, unless He is here and now. Amid this present perplexity and distress of nations the Lord is risen indeed on mankind whom He has redeemed. To-day, as of old, He appears in strange places, He manifests Himself under unexpected forms. Each advance in scholarship, each discovery of science, signifies the advent of Him who is Himself the Truth. Christ comes to us in the guise of new duties—not least "in the distasteful duty of thinking things out." He lays His hand on us through new movements. He appeals to our hearts in fresh sympathies and claims. He gazes at us through the eyes of all the disinherited, the oppressed, the suffering, the ignorant, the unemployed. Nay, Christ is so wonderful that He is sometimes revealed afresh by those who would crucify Him afresh, He is crowned by teachers unconsciously even in their denial.

We may further illustrate this same truth from the fine sermons which Mr. Sidney Berry has just published under the title "Revealing Light"—sermons which are worthy of the high tradition of Carrs Lane pulpit. The preacher points out that the narratives of our Lord's appearances to His friends after the resurrection imply a mysterious fellowship, elusive and liable to be mistaken, and yet all the time supremely real. "Mary, with her great love quickening, as love always does, the faculties of insight, stands talking to Him and believes that she is merely speaking to a gardener." The disciples on their way towards Emmaus regard Him as a casual stranger. "How near He was to them, and yet somehow far as well." The Presence we long for may be just at hand and yet undiscerned, while the light of recognition is soon succeeded by what looks like withdrawal. Yet "the message that He is risen does not mean that He has gone away, but that He has come closer"—albeit our eyes are holden and we take Him for some fellow-pilgrim by our side. Moreover, in the Gospels the risen Lord showed Himself alive, not to the world at large, but to those men and women who had forsaken all to follow Him, and had been with Him in His temptations. In like manner He is still made manifest to those who have courage to share in the perpetual adventure of faith. Their eyes are opened to discover His advent, and they recognize Him under whatever guise He appears. The Son of man is continually coming in an hour when we look not for Him. He warns His disciples to be on the watch for these unexpected manifestations. Across the bleak wilderness of centuries the King of Love draws nigh. He is even at the doors, and we may hear His voice saying, "Adsum—I am here."

The Church has never been deserted by Him who founded it in the beginning, who remains its Builder and Restorer. Christ is in the Church, and the Church was made by Him, though at times even the Church knows Him not. Its organization and its officials obscure Him through whom and for whom they exist. We hear many bitter complaints against present-day Christianity. People point to its lethargy, its dread of new ideas, its clinging to authority and convention, its timid distrust of passionate spiritual appeal. Others warn us against the idolatry of making means into ends, of exalting by-products of Christianity into the place of Christ himself. On the other hand, we may surely rejoice because a great new instinct for reunion is drawing Christians to meet in the heart of their holy faith, which is nothing else than the living person of the Redeemer. Yet how often in our sermons and conferences we assume His real absence, we discuss Him as some one remote, we "talk of Him behind His back." Outside ecclesiastical fences multitudes of men and women are drawn irresistibly to the person of Jesus Christ, their consciences pay homage to His authority, their souls respond to His unsearchable love. Mr. Raven finds the dominant feature of the religious situation to be a concentration of interest on the Central Figure of the Gospels, a deepened reverence for His teaching and example, a fresh devotion and enthusiasm for Himself. Christ, at least, has not abandoned the congregation of His flock dispersed throughout the world. To-day He comes knocking at the church door—knocking, too, at the vestry door—with His message "Adsum." He is literally present in the midst of the humblest company of His disciples, moving and working among them though their eyes are holden. He is actually guiding the spiritual fellowship which He alone formed, which He alone sustains. Yet the Lord's advent in His Church remains mysterious and incalculable, like His manifestation to each individual soul. Our sense of Christ's awful and glorious presence remains elusive—a thing of glimpses and withdrawals. None can understand or explain the secret of His earth-visiting feet,

"The terrible, shamefast, frightened, whispered, sweet, Heart-shattering secret of His way with us."

Now, as of old, His way is in the sea and His path in the great waters. But amid storm and gloom and peril He still speaks to reassure each of our spirits, "It is I: be not afraid."

Australia: Peace Movements and Romanist-Protestant Jangling

YOU will be pleased to hear that there is to be an Australian section of the World Alliance for International Friendship. Its headquarters will be Melbourne, a fine city of 750,000—the central city of the Commonwealth of Australia.

It was my pleasure to lay the matter before the Council of Churches. The Council is purely a local body, but it is the strongest organized Protestant group in Australia. Australia has not as yet any Federal Council of Churches, but it is safe to say that she is rapidly approaching the day when a body similar to the Federal Council in America will be organized. The Council of Churches in Melbourne strongly favors the idea, but New South Wales, for some reason, is standing out.

The Council in Melbourne proved an excellent medium through which to do the work. It assembled a representative group of religious leaders. Over fifty of the most outstanding clergymen were present and several men from the university. Men said they have been in the dark as to the desperate condition of world affairs. Distances from European capitals are so enormous and cable rates so costly that news is scant and articles interpretative of the outlook for peace do not come to the Australian dailies as frequently or as fully as they do to the great newspapers of America.

The story of the development of peace movements is new to the ears of Australians, especially societies that are working through organized religion. The group in Melbourne were particularly interested in the World Alliance. Leaders of the church life speaking in favor of the resolution to form an Australian branch expressed the opinion that Australia has been waiting for just this sort of thing. The churches here have made an effort to work through the local branch of the League of Nations Union, but that body is in the main political and they have not been able to get far. They have also made an endeavor to work through the English-Speaking Union, but felt that that body was composed of Anglo-Saxons only, and while extremely important at this hour, it was not broad enough for preachers of a gospel that includes all races and nations. Consequently, they rejoiced to know that an organization was in the field for the sole purpose of building good-will into the life of all empires and republics through the churches. The churches here, like churches in other lands, have over-emphasized the question of personal salvation. They have not entered the realm of international life. There is not much attention given here to the social gospel, but there is meticulous care manifested toward the individual—drunkards, gamblers, cynics, skeptics, atheists have occupied much of their attention. Great efforts at "soul-winning" have been made, but scant care has been paid to the winning of governments and nations.

There is need for an Australian National Council of the World Alliance. The Pacific problem is always looming up. Newspapers and people are given to talk concerning the danger of the yellow races some day gobbling up the country. This gives rise to long discussions on the necessity of the Commonwealth's equipping itself so that when the day comes it may withstand the alleged menace. The Washington Treaty has not ended the constant talk about "freedom from molestation by the colored races of Asia." Papers in all the large cities urge a strong national defense against some purely hypothetical colored invasion. Conscription is here under camouflage. It is called compulsory military service. Lord Dudley, a late Governor General of Australia, on his return to England, speaking of the system in Australia, said he felt sure they would have to increase the length of training, for he did not believe that sixteen days' training in a year was sufficient, but that they were right to go slowly. "It is tactful and politic not to make the term of service too long and arduous at first, and let it grow."

A few days ago in Sydney a Liberal Prime Minister said it was impossible that a fortnight a year training could produce the military efficiency that existed, say, in Germany or Japan. It ought to be said that Lord Kitchener's recommendations have not yet been carried out in their entirety. Lord Kitchener was very strong on one point, that beside compulsory training there was to be continuous home training, with compulsory camps to test the value of the home training. The conscript system here is following along lines common to the continent of Europe. Those opposing it refer to it as "boy conscription."

The World Alliance here will endeavor to strengthen the ties of good-will between Japan, China and the United States. It will endeavor to stop the spread of military sentiment, especially as it manifests itself in conscription.

There is no noticeable co-operation here between Roman Catholics and Protestants, so that the nucleus forming the branch of the World Alliance expect little help from sources other than Protestant. Sad to say, there is much contention between Roman Catholics and Protestants here. More than in America or England elections divide up votes into the two religious parties. The struggle is bitter at times. It is not uncommon to read cutting phrases in the Protestant journals here. "Rome needs to be watched now as never before. Still waters run deep," says the Australian "Christian World," an influential weekly. Denunciations of the Woman of Babylon and all her works are frequent. The Protestant-Roman Catholic contention here has been long and bitter. It has not brought any good results. The most prominent personality among the Roman Catholics is Archbishop Mannix of Melbourne. Dr. Mannix was the outstanding opponent of conscription during the war. He made the statement, "This war is simply a sordid trade war," and was immediately pounced upon by Protestants and denounced as an Irish Romanist of the worst kind, engaged purely in political machinations. This led to the formation of the Protestant Federation, the result being that religious affiliation became the only political and social test for public office or public service. Is he a Protestant? That was the supreme question. Opposition to the Archbishop strengthened his position every time. Town halls were refused him and his party. This resulted in the building of new and beautiful halls by the Roman Catholics, the new halls coming into successful competition with the public and town halls. The Melbourne City Council prohibited a St. Patrick's Day procession. What was the result? It was a great success. The promoters were prosecuted and dismissed. An appeal to full court resulted in a declaration that whilst the Council had power to regulate, it had no power to prohibit. The Protestant Federation is now talking of appealing to the Privy Council of London.

There are, of course, extremists on both sides, but the Protestants have been badly led and have been bitter and un-Christian. I am of the opinion that if our people talked much less about "Protestantism" and started doing things, demonstrating its reasonableness, they would be much more successful.

The charge here against the Roman Church is that it has captured the Labor Party. This is a charge that is usually made against the progressive wing in political life under all circumstances. Fully seventy-five per cent of the Roman Catholics are working people. They naturally vote for the party they expect to get the most from, whatever name it may be known by.

One outstanding fact is that the Roman Catholic Church and party have strengthened under opposition. To me it is a sad fact that in this young country sectarianism should be so rampant, with all its hate and strife, and that in the face of evils so powerful and destructive. Gambling is strongly entrenched. It is estimated that it cost the public over forty million pounds last year. The drink bill ran into twenty-eight million pounds. Is there any wonder that the churches are losing their hold on the people? Religious leaders here tell me that churches are half empty, and that it is more difficult to get large audiences than before the war.

William and Mary College in Virginia recently celebrated the two hundredth anniversary of Sir Christopher Wren's birthday. Wren's only work in America was the design of the main building of the college. Cass Gilbert, the architect of the Woolworth Building in New York City, made the principal address.

On October 31 there was unveiled on the walls of the garrison church at Aldershot, England, a memorial to the one hundred and seventy British army chaplains who gave their lives in the World War. Twenty-two of our own chaplains did not return from the war. We might well put up a similar memorial to them.

President Coolidge is making known his ideas on a good many public topics. He would favor a constitutional amendment to put an end to the issuing of tax exempt securities by Federal and local governments. He would also like to see a reduction in the maximum income surtax rates. He is proving that he is not afraid to be as conservative as the multiplication table. We expect to see him prove also that he is willing, on occasion, to be as revolutionary as science.

The Polish Cabinet has approved a perpetual treaty of peace with Turkey. It was under such a peace treaty that Turkey alone of all the European nations refused to acknowledge the annihilation of Poland in 1795; until the deposition of Sultan Abdul Aziz in 1876, the Polish Ambassador was always invited to all the Turkish Court ceremonies; and during the century and a quarter when there was no Polish State, Turkey was the friend of the Pole. Indeed, many Poles settled in Turkey.

Dr. Nansen Tells His Story

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

SELDOM in my life have I listened to such a romance as when last week I heard Dr. Nansen tell the story of his work as High Commissioner of the League of Nations in repatriating the prisoners of war scattered all over Europe and Asia. To most Americans, Dr. Nansen is known chiefly as the great explorer and scientist. But his wonderful work during the last four years as general messenger of mercy and as the man who got half a million suffering, homesick, deserted prisoners safely home will be his chief claim to enduring fame.

Dr. Nansen has come to America as the guest of the Church Peace Union to plead the cause of the hungry, homeless refugees of Europe. On Monday evening Mr. Caldwell and Dr. Henry A. Atkinson invited about one hundred people to a dinner to hear Dr. Nansen tell this story of the stupendous task of returning to their homes these thousands of war prisoners, left stranded principally in Russia and Siberia. He suggested to the League of Nations that it undertake this task. The League agreed to his suggestion if he would take charge. There were about four hundred thousand war prisoners in Russia. Russia could not afford to feed them, neither could she afford to send them home. They were living in Siberia, nearly frozen and nearly starved to death. Many of them had died, but four hundred thousand were left living on one meager meal a day. Dr. Nansen had to bring them together from all sorts of remote points; then he had to get trains where there were no trains; then he had to get boats to transfer them across the Baltic Sea; then he had to get them distributed to their homes in Germany. It was one of the most wonderful feats ever accomplished by any man.

There were Turkish prisoners away up in Vladivostok, and they had to be brought clear around through the Pacific and through Suez up into Turkey, and this while Greece and Turkey were at war. There were Russian prisoners in Germany, and these had to be sent home to Russia. Dr. Nansen wished to emphasize the fact that both the Soviet government and Germany rendered every assistance possible in this work of exchange. He also went out of his way to pay high tribute to the remarkable work done for Russia by the American Relief, organized by Mr. Hoover. He did not know how hundreds of thousands of Russians could have been kept alive during the last two years if America had not rendered this great aid.

His story of how the League cared for the million Russian refugees who had escaped from the Revolution and were scattered all over Europe was another most moving tale. Thousands of them flocked to Constantinople, until the city was literally swamped by them. It could not possibly care for them. It was as though a million people suddenly swarmed to New York and became a burden on the city. For months he worked distributing these hundreds of thousands all over Europe, most of them throughout Germany.

They were getting on in Germany, but now that Germany is in a state of poverty and in the throes of internal strife, their lot is becoming critical again. Many of these Russian refugees went to Switzerland, and the Swiss have been very kind to them. Switzerland has always been a home for the exiles and refugees of the earth.

Dr. Nansen is now engaged in caring for the Greek refugees from Asia Minor. About a million suddenly fled to the little country of Greece and swamped it, taxing the government far beyond its capacity. The necessity of paying fifty million lira to Italy has made the burden harder. Dr. Nansen declares that it is a shame that this sum could not go to these refugees. The Greek government is doing everything in its power to care for this great host of refugees. The American Red Cross has helped to feed them, the Near East Relief is caring for many of the children—he praised all this—but there will be great suffering this coming winter if this country does not help on a large scale. The League is floating a great loan to help put these thousands to work in agriculture and industry and provide them with homes; the Greek government is giving land, but they must be helped by outside aid until self-supporting, which will be in a year or two. Dr. Nansen is undertaking the whole of this gigantic task, one before which any other man would stand helpless, in dismay.

I have barely hinted at his story. I wish everybody in America could hear it. It would melt a heart of stone. Neither do I see how any American, hearing it, could ever again urge his country to stand apart in these great tasks of reconstructing the world. I think that many felt as I did as Dr. Nansen went on telling all this story of marvel—one of the greatest, if not the greatest single achievement of history—all done by the League, what a strange thing it was that the League was doing this beautiful, Christlike work of mercy and we were having no share in it.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

Before ending its annual convention, the Investment Bankers' Association of America elected as its president, John W. Prentiss of New York, a partner in the firm of Hornblower and Weeks. Postmaster General New sent the bankers a message asking for their co-operation with the Government to check the sale of fraudulent securities. The Government officials estimate that during the year the American public wasted one billion dollars in mail fraud schemes. The Government is particularly directing its drive against the oil-stock promoter. In Fort Worth alone, it estimates, there are five hundred men in the oil promotion business, who have taken one hundred million dollars from the public in the last two years.

Farewell to America

By David Lloyd George

[The following is the great speech delivered by Lloyd George early this month at the New York Metropolitan Opera House, the night before he sailed on his return to Great Britain. John W. Davis, formerly our Ambassador at London presided at the meeting.]

I HAVE traveled in the course of the months I have been on this side of the Atlantic some thousands of miles in Canada and in the United States of America, and my first, and I think my deepest impression is the vastness of these two great countries, countries of infinite resources and of endless possibilities. There was an old Welsh peasant who had lived inland all his life and had a very hard time of it on his small farm, who, in his old age, came for the first time to the seaside, and when he saw the sea he said, "Thank God for something of which there seems to be plenty."

I had that feeling in crossing your plains and prairies. It is a gigantic country, with possibilities which are beyond the dreams of men. May I say that one thing has—I will not say surprised me, but has given me great delight—and that is the great beauty of your country in its autumn robes. I had heard of the grandeur of the Far West, but I had no idea that the eastern portions of Canada and of the United States of America were so beautiful as they are at this time of the year. The profuseness, the variety, the brilliance of coloring—the oak and the maple, clad in splendor, even little shrubs, the mere weeds of the wilderness, arrayed in radiant glory. I felt that the great King must be holding His autumnal court in the great forests of the West. It is a beautiful sight, and one I shall never forget.

I came here to address eight meetings—I believe this is my seventieth. It is not in mortal man to deliver seventy speeches without saying something for which he is sorry, and I have known men who were not able to deliver one speech without committing an indiscretion for which, if not they, a good many other people were sorry; and if I have said anything in the course of these numerous speeches that is apart from the strict rules, that has given offense to anyone, that has transgressed any of your party controversies—well, please put it down to my ignorance and pass it over.

I did not willingly trespass. The frontiers between parties are not always very clearly marked and I may have missed the posts now and again, but I did not deliberately introduce contretemps. I came on no mission, but being asked to speak, I have spoken frankly. I have spoken what I believe. I have spoken what I am convinced of. I have seen a suggestion that I was in collusion with Lord Curzon in something which I said. Well, I haven't the honor of having any consultation or communication or previous arrangement with Lord Curzon. I am a member of no government. I am simply a private citizen. But in the things I have said I had a certain sense of personal responsibility, having regard to the part which I had played in the war and in the making of the peace.

We have all had our responsibility—all had our responsibility. During the war I stood for the ruthless prosecution of the war to a triumphant end.

The moment the war was over I equally stood for a ruthless prosecution of peace to an even more glorious end. Those who make war, whether they are individuals or nations, cannot escape responsibility for the peace.

Europe is in a deplorable condition. Who is responsible? What is responsible? Some say it is the Treaty of Versailles. Well, I am not here to defend the Treaty of Versailles; I am quite willing, on an appropriate occasion, to do so, and to say that it was the best treaty that could be negotiated under the conditions of the time. But it is not the Treaty of Versailles! Every treaty depends not merely upon its intrinsic merits, but upon the methods and manner of its execution.

When I was driving out of Washington I noticed warnings to motorists on the roadside. Evidently motorists give some trouble in that city if in no other. The road was a winding road; it could not go absolutely straight from point to point. What road can? It had to dodge hills and difficulties; it had to cross ravines and rivers; and it was a road that was adapted, like every other road, to the configuration of the country. And motorists, evidently some, drove recklessly, drove wildly, drove injudiciously, and there was this notice on the roadside, "This road is not fool-proof."

I put that on the front page of every treaty and statute.

But the condition of Europe was not created by the Treaty of Versailles. The difficulties were not created by that treaty. They were created by the war. They were created by the completeness of the victory. It was the most complete victory that has almost ever been won in wars between great nations. Germany, Austria, were shattered, demoralized, disarmed, prostrate; we left them like broken-backed creatures on the road for any chariot to run over. We created the responsibility. Who did it? Who did it?

Who smashed Germany? Who destroyed Austria? Who created this impotence which makes it difficult to execute treaties? Well, if you had asked it on Armistice Day we all would have gently hinted that it was really done by us.

There was an old preacher in our country who, going on the Saturday night to his preaching engagement, saw on the roadside, a haystack, very neat, very well put together; it looked very firm. And he saw a farmer standing alongside it, and he said, "Who made that excellent haystack?" "Oh," he said, "I did it; I did it."

The following day there was a great storm, and on Monday morning, when the old preacher was returning that way, the haystack had been scattered all over the field in hopeless confusion. And he saw the same farmer standing there, and he said to him, "That was very badly put together; that was not very well done. Who did it?"

"Well," he said, "we did it somehow between us."

That is really true of the condition of things in Europe,—we were all responsible for the victory, we each contributed his part, we each did something toward shattering the fabric, and we have got our responsibility for what follows. It is easier to make war than to make peace. In the Civil War in America there were millions of men who were prepared to sacrifice their lives to wage successful war, but there was only one man who was prepared to risk his career to make a successful peace, and he was shot down. You say, "Yes, by an unbalanced mind." All vengeance is unbalanced. Every vindictive man or woman is partly insane.

Your chairman has referred to the great step taken recently by your government to try to restore order out of chaos in Europe. I acclaim that step with full enthusiasm. When it was first proposed a year ago I felt it was the right step to take. It is suggested that I have been using flattering words since I came here about the proposal. The moment it was published in December of last year I wrote an article supporting that proposal—I thought it was the right course to take, and I am glad that at last there is some prospect of its being acted upon.

I have only two things to say about its future course. I do not know how many ladies and gentlemen there are here who play golf. Just a few, I see. There are two principles which are constantly dinned into the ear of the golfer which I would apply to Mr. Secretary Hughes' proposal now. The first is, follow through. The second is, keep your eye on the ball. It might get lost. You are playing in rough country, full of bunkers, part of it a wilderness. There are some who might try and get the ball into the rough, and once it is there they might even substitute another. Follow through. Keep your eye on the ball, once you have begun. And if you do that I believe this great play will be won. Europe will be better for it. America will be better for it. The world will be better for it. Humanity will be better, civilization will be better for it. The world is better because America at one moment took an interest in the enforcement of right beyond its own frontiers. The world will be better tomorrow when it knows that the interest of America in human right has not weakened.

You sent millions of your most gallant young men, brave, dauntless. I saw them in France; I knew their quality. The mere sight of them gave confidence to us, who had been for three and four years going through the valley of despair. You sent millions of them to enforce justice. Justice is not sporadic. Justice is not an explosion which spends its force on a single outburst, and then vanishes into thin air. Justice is the steadfast will to see right done in the world. That is why I hail this step with acclamation, and I wish it, from my heart, success.

Your country and ours have very largely the same problems to consider and to confront. There is a natural disinclination in England to get entangled in European politics. It is traditional. We have always stood more or less by the policy of isolation. We have said, "We are an island in the Atlantic. We have got the sea between us and you," and in the past it has proved to be just as difficult to cross the Straits of Dover as to cross the Atlantic Ocean, when the British fleet is about.

So there is a very strong section, a powerful section of opinion, which pleads for leaving Europe alone. They say, "Turn your eyes away from that confusion; give your minds to developing the resources of the British Empire. Leave that turbulent continent and don't worry about it." Well, it is no use getting angry with Europe. It has passed through a terrible time.

Supposing you had had an earthquake which swept over America and either killed or crippled every young able-bodied man in the whole of the Eastern States of America, from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico; supposing you had had enormous accumulations which had been the result of the industry of generations scattered and destroyed—that will give you an idea of what Europe has passed through. Between those who have been killed and those who have been mutilated, Europe has lost over twenty million of her best young men, and the destruction of property, of wealth, of the accumulated fruits of industry has been gigantic. No wonder Europe is distracted, Europe is nerve-wracked, when she hears a rumble; no wonder she gets into a panic! Don't think harshly of Europe!

There are events in the lives of men and in the lives of nations which are like the fall of the autumn leaves. They fall by the myriad to the ground. They are swept by the breezes into unconsidered corners, where they are forgotten; they sink into the soil and form part of the earth. We cultivate, we dwell upon them, or tread upon them. Nothing more of them is heard, they are indistinguishable from others.

But once in a century there are events which are like the fall of the stars, the fragments strike the earth and send it rocking and reeling out of its course. Look at Europe before the war, study the map of Europe to-day, its geography, its frontiers, its currency, its condition, its people, its governments—study its pension lists. There were empires that were like the planets in the heavens that have been rolled down into utter, endless darkness. There were countries that were like the fixed stars in the firmament, they have crashed into atoms. The earth quivers in Europe, and no one can tell how far it has been shocked out of its course. Don't be hard on Europe.

But they say to us in Britain and they say to you here, "Keep clear of the wreckage." Yes, but there are millions underneath. There is Scriptural precept for it. It has only happened on the continent of Europe. Great nations cannot say, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Europe has played a great part. There would have been no known America had there been no Europe to find it. You have got a great, virile population. It came from Europe. You have got great names that inspire your people, and will continue to do so world without end—George Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Hamilton, Lincoln. They all sprang from European stock. Your free institutions in this country—and well you may be proud of them—the great struggle for civil and religious equality, came from the long agony of Europe. May I say with reverence, when the cross was turned out of Asia and hunted out of Africa, Europe stood by it, carried it through the Via Dolorosa of the Dark Ages, and if it is planted firmly on American soil, Europe carried it here. Don't be hard on Europe!

What is the real problem in Europe to-day? I will tell you. In spite of the war, because Europe has been left so much to herself, she still believes in force. Why?

France says: "Alsace-Lorraine was torn from our side fifty years ago. It was unjust; it was wrong; it was cruel; it was oppressive. Justice never gave it back to us. We had to lose 1,400,000 of our young men. You, in the British Empire, had to lose 900,000 of your young men. Force gave it back to us."

Poland! Poland says: "One hundred and fifty years ago our nationhood was destroyed. We were locked in the prison of great autocracies. We waited for justice. We thought we could hear possible footsteps, but they were simply the footsteps of our jailers outside. Force came at the end of one hundred and fifty years and unlocked the door."

The Russian peasant says to-day: "We never saw the light of liberty until the revolutionist came with his powder and blew our prison walls down."

What does Germany say? Germany says: "We trusted to justice. We trusted to a treaty. We are broken; we are shattered. Why? We are disarmed. We have no force."

That is why Europe believes in force.

That is why Europe believes in violence. What is the remedy? Give Europe the conviction that right is supreme over force. Who is to do it? There are only two countries on earth which can establish that conviction, and those are the United States of America and the British Empire.

Unless it is done I don't know what is going to happen. France, at the present moment—and I am sorry for it; I have always been a friend of France; I have always been a believer in French democracy; during the thirty-four years I have been in the British Parliament I have always supported France when she had few friends—at the present moment she is committed to holding the wolf by the ear. She cannot let go, but ultimately it may tear and rend her.

I heard yesterday from a man who had just returned from Germany, who met one of the officers who had been appointed at the Treaty of Versailles to break up the cannon and the machine guns and the torpedoes of Germany. He said up to the last year the German workmen, whenever he went to the workshops and arsenals, used to help him to destroy these guns and say, "For God's sake, destroy them; these are the things that brought ruin on our country." Now he says there is a change. There is a change. They say, "We cannot trust justice, we cannot trust treaties, we cannot trust the word of great nations, force is the only thing that rules in the world." Unless you stamp out that conviction, civilization is doomed on this earth. That is why I don't know.

Why do I say that these great nationalities are the only two that can provide the remedy? These two countries entered the war for no selfish purpose. You came in to redress a great wrong. So did we. I remember a few days before the war—I was Chancellor of the Exchequer—I had to deal with the great financial interests in the City of London, and of one accord they came along and said, "Keep out of this quarrel; we don't want to get mixed up in it." There was no reason why we should. We had no quarrel at that moment with Germany. Germany was our best customer on the Continent of Europe. They were giving a guarantee that they would not send their fleet even down the English Channel. But, I think it was Saturday, came the word that treaties were to be dealt with as if they were scraps of paper; that international right was to be trampled upon; that a little nation was to be destroyed purely because it was weak. From that moment the nation rose, forty-two millions, as one man, and we entered the war.

Why did we enter the war? Why did you enter the war? Why did the unanimous impulse come to you? You cannot tell, you cannot tell—mystic—the wind bloweth where it listeth, and we know not whence it cometh nor whither it goeth. It was one of those great impulses which come when a nation's sense of justice is outraged. That is why I say that nations that are moved by such incentives are the only sure guarantors of freedom and civilization in the world.

There have been times in the history of the world when you had two or three nations that for the time being have been the trustees of civilization. One after another they have failed. They have not discharged their functions, and in spite of the efforts and the power they enjoyed in the days of their might one after another they went and new nations sprang up to take their place. The commission of trusteeship for civilization does not come from kings; it does not come from rulers or princes; it does not come from senates and parliaments nor councils. It comes from on high. When it comes it does not come from the choice of the people; it comes from the will of God.

That commission—that commission is yours and ours today. The scene is a divine one. You responded to the invisible message in 1917 and we had already done so; but the commission is not fulfilled. The work is only half done. If it is not discharged fully—fully—civilization is doomed within this generation to a catastrophe such as the world has never seen. But if you here, this mighty people, if our people throughout the British Empire, resolutely, firmly, courageously, without flinching carry out the message, then I have no fear but what humanity will climb to higher altitudes of nobility, of security, of happiness, than any it has ever yet known.

Paris showed President Masaryk of Czechoslovakia much honor on the occasion of his recent visit. France looks with maternal pride at Czechoslovakia, the chief of the Little Entente, and it is probable that, partly as a result of Masaryk's visit, she will pay two hundred and fifty million francs to the Czech government as a part of the twelve hundred million francs voted by France as a loan to Poland and other members of the Little Entente. Curious that France should be able to loan other nations money when she cannot balance her own budget.

The Department of Physiology at the University of Chicago has for three years been investigating the physiological effects of prolonged fasting both on men and beasts. A fast of fifteen days for men and of thirty to forty-five days for dogs very decidedly increases the power of tissues to consume or burn food, that is, the metabolic rate, and also increases the secretion of gastric juices for many months after eating is resumed and the body has regained its normal weight. The power of the tissues to consume food is greater in the young than in the adult or aged. Of course, people ought not to undertake fasting without competent advice.

Some time ago we reported the plan of the churches in Utah to unite in supporting Westminster College at Salt Lake city, making it interdenominational. Westminster was founded and received its support from the Presbyterians. Now the Presbyterians and Methodists are planning to support Montana Wesleyan College jointly. The scheme is for the Montana Presbyterian Synod and the Montana Methodist Conference each to raise ten thousand dollars for the support of the college until the endowment shall be sufficient to maintain it. Each of the two communions will also begin to build up a permanent endowment fund. The Methodists will contribute the property of the college, valued at one hundred and fifty thousand; the Presbyterians will match this with an equal sum in cash. They already have on hand about eighty thousand dollars received from the sale of the college of Montana, of which they disposed about two years ago. The citizens of the State will be asked to subscribe one hundred and twenty thousand dollars to be used in clearing up the present outstanding bonds and indebtedness of Montana Wesleyan. The Commercial Club of Montana has approved the plan and will aid in raising the fund. Before the agreement finally goes into effect it must be ratified by the education boards of the Methodist and Presbyterian churches. It is good to see these joint enterprises increasing.

Recruiting the Ministry

Draft Report of the Committee of the Unitarian Laymen League

[A year ago last June the Unitarian Laymen's League appointed a Committee on Recruiting the Ministry. The committee consisted of twelve educators, manufacturers and lawyers. Percy W. Gardner, a Providence lawyer, was its chairman. Its secretary was Prof. Fred Merrifield of the Chicago University Theological School. Its report is of such wide general interest that we are printing it entire. We make some comments on it on page 582.]

THIS committee does not presume to give a final solution of the difficult problem of recruiting the ministry.

Its members, gathered from the far reaches of the United States, and representing a wide variety of callings, have given the problem earnest and thoughtful attention. They hope this report, from which all matters of detail are omitted, will be of value as voicing the sentiment of laymen.

We have considered, first, what the laymen feel is most needed in a minister.

Our committee is practically unanimous in the opinion that what we need primarily in a minister is spiritual counsel. The minister must understand the problems which confront laymen in the various daily walks of life and be able to advise and guide men in their human relations and in their religious aspirations. We place the ability to preach as secondary, and the capacity to organize a parish, systematize its and his own work, third.

We realize that in large city parishes there is opportunity for specialization. We believe, however, that in recruiting the ministry we should seek men who have the capacity for all-round development. We know that to-day there is a great deal of specialization in many professions, but that the great mass of the members of every profession must be general practitioners. We see no reason why general practitioners cannot be obtained for the ministry, and needed specialists developed from among our general practitioners.

It has become obvious to this committee that in order to attract men of the type needed for the ministry, and in order adequately to train them for the most essential part of their work, it is necessary to change methods which have been used in the past by theological schools.

A sub-committee has made an analysis of the curricula of twenty theological schools of various denominations and representing various sections of the country, with a view to ascertaining what is now furnished and along what lines of teaching the stress is laid. A chart giving a graphic summary of these courses is annexed to our report.

A glance at this chart shows striking uniformity in the various schools of marked stress upon the subjects of Old Testament, New Testament, Church History, Systematic Theology and in a number of cases so-called Practical Theology. This chart also demonstrates the fact that while there is a tendency in some schools towards the study of sociology and some other more practical subjects, this tendency is so limited as to make it conspicuous in the instances where it occurs.

Without unduly minimizing the desirability for a reasonable knowledge of the Old and New Testaments, we feel that in order to train a man to meet and deal with the problems of to-day the stress should rather be laid upon those practical subjects to which, up to the present, the least time has been devoted. Indeed, if modern educators had not been led by conservative theology to lay stress upon the Biblical books as especially God-given they would never think of making this literature the chief element of modern education.

We are convinced that any theological training given by any school should be in conjunction with courses given in universities of the highest type; that the main stress should be laid upon the study of sociology, political economy, political science, psychology and world history; and that the so-called biblical-theological training should supplement this work rather than make work of this nature supplement the biblical-theological training. In other words, the subjects used for a minister's training should come out of the needs of the day rather than from the conventional theological theories which the Church has inherited.

In order that we may be reasonably specific and constructive in our criticism, we give a typical required course of a theological school of recognized standing and parallel with it a suggestion of a course which it seems to us would come nearer to fitting a man for the actual needs of the day; and which we are sure would appeal more strongly to the type of young man whom we desire in the ministry than the course offered at the present time.

All of the better theological schools require a bachelor's degree from a reputable college. Very little is stated, however, concerning the particular lines of work which should be taken in the college course. As preliminary to the course which we suggest hereafter the applicant should be required to present evidence of having taken one or more courses in each of the following subjects: Psychology, philosophy, economics, history, political and social science, and of having done creditable work in at least one of the following scientific subjects: Astronomy, biology, chemistry or physics.

Course number one following is the typical required course now offered by the theological school above mentioned. Course number two is the course suggested by the committee as much more likely to meet the peculiar needs of the minister of to-day:

COURSE NO. I.

Old Testament—Beginnings of Old Testament History and Literature. History and Prophecy. History and Judaism.

New Testament—Development of Early Christianity. The Literature of the New Testament. The Religion of Jesus.

Church History—The Ancient Church. The Reformation. Modern Christianity.

Christian Theology—The Christian Idea of God. Sin, and the Person and Work of Christ. The Christian Life.

Practical Theology—The Theory of Preaching. Preparation and Delivery of Sermons. The Organization and Pastoral Care of the Church. Principles of Religious Education. Organization of Religious Education. The Church and Community.

COURSE NO. 2.

History—Survey of World History. History of Religions of the World. History of the Christian Movements.

Philosophy—History of Philosophy. Philosophy of Religion.

Social Science—Modern Social Problems, i.e., Poverty, crime and social agencies dealing with them; health, immigration, child welfare, etc. Social Institutions: Survey of fundamental social institutions, their development and present trend. Social Research, Investigation and Field Work.

Economics—Problems of Labor and Industry.

Political Science—Elementary Law. International Law and Diplomacy.

Education—History of American Education. Educational Psychology. Religious Education: Modern methods and the relation of religious education to general education.

Current Events—Newspaper reading and the writing of editorial comment and subsequent comparison with comment of leading magazines.

Courses covered in Course No. 1 combined as follows: The three courses in the Old Testament into one survey major course. The first two courses in the New Testament into one major course. The third one as at present. The three courses in Christian Theology into one course. The six courses in Practical Theology into three courses.

We have recommended the change in the emphasis on the courses of study in theological schools not alone after careful examination of the courses offered, but as a result of conferences both with experienced clergymen and with men contemplating going into the ministry. From the former we have learned that much which they obtained in theological schools immediately went into the discard as soon as they became actively engaged in their work; and what is more important, we have had many notes of regret from these same men because they now know the tremendous need for the type of preparation which we have suggested and which they did not obtain.

From the theological students themselves, as well as from college students who are considering the ministry, we have found that the type of man most desired for the clergy realizes the present-day need, feels that that need cannot be met by the courses offered, resents the necessity of devoting time and energy to such courses, and in some cases is even turned away from the ministry by this obstacle. Such a man feels that he can apply his social, literary, scientific and economic training obtained in college through other channels of activity, such as the law, medicine, teaching, social work and business, to the greater betterment of the world.

There is unquestionably an opportunity for some school to try a lively experiment along the lines suggested in this report. It seems to us that in a denomination which was born and has lived upon liberalism and forward-looking there is an especial opportunity to try this experiment.

In addition to the changes herein suggested in the school work we feel that upon completion of this course the embryo minister should, so far as possible, be required to serve for not less than one year as an assistant to some clergyman who has demonstrated his ability as a leader in the Church. The permanent committee hereinafter suggested should have the right to choose from our clergy a sufficient number of experienced men who would be asked to assume this most important work of directing the new men and we feel sure that enough leaders could be found who would be willing to assist young men to bridge the chasm between theory and practice.

We are convinced that a very large part of the past and present weakness of the ministry is directly attributable to laymen. We do not expect any material improvement in the ministry until the laymen give their personal service in the affairs of the church. By this we mean, in the first instance, that men must attend church; in the second place, that men must take the same interest in the management of their church as they do in their own business, or at least as they do in their clubs, lodges and other associations.

We believe that most churches have not offered large enough salaries and in most instances are not paying as large salaries as they are capable of paying. We do not believe that men should go into the ministry primarily for the pay received. We do believe that men of fine mental and moral ability should be able to go into the ministry with the assurance of being able to maintain financial self-respect and independence for themselves and their families. Men should expect to pay for their divinity course, just as prospective lawyers and doctors pay. They should have the same financial burdens as every other citizen. The churches should make it possible for good men to meet these obligations in a businesslike way.

While it is the duty of the laymen to see that the churches offer adequate salaries, it is equally their duty to see that ministers are obtained who are worth the amount paid. When a good man is obtained, the men of the church should be as ready voluntarily to increase his salary with his growing value to the church as they are to increase the salaries of worth-while men employed in industry. If this were done, most of the instances of one church taking a minister from a church which wished to retain his services could not occur.

The problem of the small church has given us considerable concern. Where there is more than one such church in a community, or more than one in immediately adjoining communities, we are unanimously of the opinion that these small churches should be consolidated. The persistent maintenance of unnecessary churches weakens the denomination and breeds incompetent ministers.

In new communities where there is a demand, or an opportunity, for the development of a church, we favor its establishment. We do not believe that such a church should be expected to pay the salary of a first-class clergyman. Such churches are most in need of the strongest men. We believe that it would be better policy for our denomination to employ a number of the best obtainable men and send them into the new fields, to remain for a time sufficient to develop the new churches, than to give so-called missionary support to the small church and a weak clergyman.

We know that the laity have been remiss in their home attitude towards the clergy. It has been common for our own people to discourage their children from going into the ministry. We do not see how the ministry is going to be built up of the best men when it is secretly frowned upon in our family circles.

We feel that the time is at hand when the theological school—setting aside all pride of opinion, and the men of our churches by personal service, should so work together that ministers may be developed who will meet the needs of the day, and that they may be assured of congregations of men giving their money, their presence, and their effort to make the church worth while.

It may be felt that the committee has gone largely into the question of what is needed from the clergymen and how it may be obtained, and how we can make attractive to men of the right caliber this most important of all occupations, without giving any specific recommendation as to methods of recruiting.

We feel that the entire matter of the method of preparation, the means to be used by individual churches to make the work attractive, and the specific methods of recruiting, should be placed in the hands of a general supervisory committee, not too large, representing the entire denomination, and composed of the biggest men in the denomination; that such a committee should be a permanent organization with full power to act; that it should in general do the following things:

(a) Work with the faculties of our existing theological schools, or work to establish a theological school which will give the desired preparation for the type of men needed.

(b) Procure the services of leading clergymen to act as mentors for the graduates during their first year out of theological school.

(c) Work with our existing churches to place before them the necessity for co-operation by the laymen and the importance of adequate compensation for the minister.

(d) Prepare adequate literature on the subject of the desirability and opportunity for service in such a ministry as can be developed if these recommendations are adopted.

(e) Select men of the right type in the various important college centers to place before college men the literature thus prepared and by its aid and by personal discussion present the opportunities which the ministry offers and keep in close touch with such prospective material.

(f) Pass upon the qualifications of men who desire to prepare for the ministry; that is, act as a central fellowship committee.

(g) Keep track of churches where there are vacancies, or where changes are desired, and see that proper ministers are furnished for such churches.

The Smyth-Brewster-Bainton Case

By Robert H. Gardiner

Secretary, World Conference on Faith and Order

THIS is an attempt merely to state all the facts relating to the action of the Rt. Rev. Chauncey B. Brewster, D.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Connecticut, regarding a suggestion made to him by the Rev. Newman Smyth, D.D., to give Episcopal ordination to Professor Bainton of the Yale Divinity School, who had not been ordained, but had regular standing as a licentiate in the Congregational ministry. Dr. Smyth wrote to Bishop Brewster saying that Dr. Bainton "informs me that he wishes to receive ordination," and later in his letter he said: "He will accept the obligations as stated in the terms of the Canon, I think, to your satisfaction." Bishop Brewster at once sought out Dr. Bainton. This is not an attempt to justify the Canon passed by the last General Convention of the American Episcopal Church entitled Canon II, of the Ordination of Deacons and Priests in Special Cases. While the writer cordially approves most of that Canon, there are important respects (not the provision hereinafter quoted) in which he would like to have seen it different.

Some six years ago a number of Congregationalists and Episcopalians, in each case of varying schools of thought, came together, largely at the suggestion of Dr. Newman Smyth, to try to find a way to give a commission to minister in Episcopal churches to Congregational ministers without any aspersions on the validity, regularity or efficacy of their previous ministries. A number of harmonious meetings were held and a considerable agreement reached. The Episcopalians presented that agreement to the General Convention of 1919, which, recognizing the importance and hopefulness of the matter, appointed an official commission of bishops, presbyters and laymen to continue the negotiations, making certain recommendations as to what should be included in the Canon which the commission was instructed to draw to carry out the purpose. Several meetings were held; but owing to the illness of some of the leading men no final meeting was held and the draft canon presented to the General Convention of 1922 had not received the approval of the joint body, nor even of all the Episcopalians.

The House of Bishops amended the draft by inserting, among other provisions, the following:

"That the minister desiring to be so ordained shall satisfy the bishop . . . that he will not knowingly admit to the Holy Communion any person who has not been baptized with water in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."

It was then sent down to the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, coming up for action there in the evening of the last day before final adjournment, when, on account of the great pressure of business, speeches were limited to five minutes. It seemed to the friends of the measure that it was wiser to accept the Canon as passed by the Bishops than to try to amend it, for if amendments had been made there was not time for the Bishops to consider them, and therefore no legislation would have passed.

The House of Deputies therefore concurred with the Bishops, and the Canon, as passed, is now, whether it be good or bad, the law of the Church.

[NOTE: The Journal of the General Convention is very confused, and in his statement of its action Dr. Smyth, who evidently had not had time to work his way carefully through it, confused the Canon which did pass with the amendment to the Constitution mentioned in the next paragraph, which did not pass.]

Some of the Bishops had felt that before action could be taken under the Canon it would be necessary to make changes in the Episcopal form for ordaining priests, which would require an amendment to the Constitution, and the House of Bishops adopted such an amendment. In the opinion of eminent ecclesiastical lawyers in both houses, such an amendment was not necessary, and partly in deference to that opinion and partly because, on account of the pressure of business, the importance of the matter was not recognized, the House of Deputies failed to pass the amendment.

While it is not important, it may be well to note that the statement in THE CHRISTIAN WORK for September 22, 1923, in a review of Dr. Smyth's book, "A Story of Church Unity," that the World Conference on Faith and Order grew out of the conferences on this matter, is mistaken. That World Conference was suggested in 1910, some years before the conferences on this matter of ordination began, and grew out of the World Missionary Conference held in Edinburgh in June, 1910.

In his reply to Dr. Smyth's open letter, Bishop Brewster says that Dr. Bainton never made oral or written application to him. In a letter to Dr. Smyth, Dr. Bainton says: "Bishop Brewster says that I never applied to him for ordination. I did not in my own name, but you wrote for me with my complete knowledge and consent. The Bishop says that 'I had not read the Concordat or Canon, nor understood its details' until his conference with me. I had not read them when you wrote, but I had gone over them very carefully before I saw him. Naturally, I did not understand his interpretation until after our meeting."

With the deepest respect for these two eminent divines, and the warmest sympathy with Dr. Smyth's eagerness for visible Christian unity, the writer cannot but deplore most profoundly that so important a matter was not taken up with more patience and thorough comprehension. The statement that the ordination was desired in order that Dr. Bainton might minister to a few Episcopal students in the Yale Divinity School is not within the spirit of the Canon. It does not seem an effort to meet a genuine need. There are several Episcopal ministers in New Haven who can and will minister to such students.

Nor does Dr. Bainton's objection that after ordination he would not be able to invite to the Lord's Supper "all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ" seem very carefully considered. There is nothing in the Canon prohibiting such an invitation. Nor is it any more comprehensive than the Episcopal form: "Ye who do truly and earnestly repent you of your sins, and are in love and charity with your neighbors, and intend to lead a new life, following the commandments of God and walking from henceforth in His holy ways; draw near with faith, and take this holy sacrament to your comfort; and make your humble confession to Almighty God, devoutly kneeling."

Dr. Bainton apparently did not notice that the Canon says "shall not knowingly admit any unbaptized person." No Episcopal minister would ever refuse the sacrament to anyone who presented himself at the altar, unless a notorious evil liver or blasphemer. And surely it is not unreasonable in a church to require that those who desire to partake of the supreme privilege of the Christian Church should have been admitted to membership in the manner which has been well-nigh universal since our Lord established the Church.

But however that may be, the fact remains that the Canon, good or bad, is the law of the Episcopal Church, which Bishop Brewster, in the most solemn moment of his life, promised to obey. Dr. Smyth's theory that, as a bishop of the Church Catholic, he might have disregarded that promise leads only to anarchy. Whatever may be the powers of such a bishop, it surely does not permit him to violate a solemn vow in order that he may do what seems good in his own eyes.

In Dr. Smyth's report on the matter to the Association of Congregational Ministers of Connecticut, as quoted in the New Haven "Journal and Courier" of June 13, 1923, he says: "Two of us, first having laid our hands upon him (Dr. Bainton) and with consecrating prayer, would have ordained him according to our simple Congregational usage." The writer had always understood that the Congregational requirements for ordination gave no such power merely to any two ministers without the call of a congregation or the approval and deliberate and orderly participation of a council. Dr. Smyth's first suggestion to Bishop Brewster was that "what would be necessary on our part for this end would be a certificate to you by the State Congregational Association of his regular standing as a licentiate in our ministry and of their consent to your ordaining him." Dr. Smyth seems to have failed to notice that the Canon applies to a "minister." But it is not necessary here to consider whether, in either church, a licentiate is a minister.

Dr. Smyth's statement in the same report as to Congregational ministers being "only as yet permitted to glance up at the pulpit" does great injustice to Bishop Brewster, who, on Whitsunday last year, himself conducted to the pulpit in his own cathedral the Rev. Dr. Carter, an eminent Congregational minister, who, from that pulpit, preached a sermon to the edification of all who heard him.

The editorial in THE CHRISTIAN WORK of July 7, 1923, and Dr. Smyth state the matter as if Bishop Brewster had refused the ordination. The fact is, that Dr. Bainton was not ready to accept ordination on the terms of the Canon when he knew what they were, and the writer agrees with him that he was right in so refusing, though the writer's agreement is based, not on the ground taken by Dr. Bainton, but on another provision which Dr. Bainton seems not to have noticed and which would raise special difficulties in the case of a man not ordained to the Congregational ministry, but simply a professor in a Congregational divinity school. Bishop Brewster, bound by his promise to obey the law of his church, simply said that he had no power to change the terms set forth in the Canon.

The road to that visible unity which shall manifest Christ to the world is full of difficulties. In Christian love and patience, God will show us how to overcome them, but He is a God of order and we shall only thwart and delay His will if we do not each recognize his obligations to his own church.

[NOTE: The editors of THE CHRISTIAN WORK submitted Mr. Gardiner's article to Dr. Newman Smyth and asked him if he had any comment to make upon it. Dr. Smyth's reply is subjoined.—EDITORS.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

DEAR SIR: In answer to your request for me to reply to the letter of Mr. Gardiner, I would say that it does not seem necessary or desirable for me to enter into any discussion of the details of Mr. Gardiner's statements. In ecclesiastical discussions we are too apt not to see the woods for the trees. It is due, however, to Professor Bainton to say that we both expressed our willingness for the Bishop to take all the time he might desire for such patient consideration of the important matter, which Mr. Gardiner regrets seems not to have been done. In justice to Professor Bainton, I must confirm his statement in his letter to "The Churchman" that previous to his interview with the Bishop he had carefully studied the obligations upon a Congregational minister of the Concordat, and was ready and desirous of receiving such additional orders. As a member of the two commissions, Episcopal and Congregational, who had prepared the Canon and discussed the meaning and extent of every obligation of it, I must further say that under the interpretation of it given by Bishop Brewster neither Professor Bainton nor I, nor any Congregational minister, could accept it and remain a Congregational minister.

Mr. Gardiner is probably mistaken in his statement that last year the Bishop of Connecticut himself allowed a Congregational minister to preach in his pulpit, as the Bishop correctly informed Professor Bainton that all he could do would be to grant him possibly, on special occasions, license to make addresses. If, however, Mr. Gardiner is correct in this statement that the Bishop has in this single instance, above all canonical restrictions, risen to the higher law of the Spirit wherewith Christ makes free, I certainly shall be pleased to spread such glad tidings as far as I may.

Irrespective of the case of Professor Bainton, the decision of the Bishop is that he has no power under the law to act in accordance with the agreements of the Concordat. Consequently, we must leave it to the ecclesiastical lawyers of the Episcopal Church to decide the following issues:

1. As the Canon now stands, is it a valid contractual agreement between the Episcopal Church and the ministers of other communions?

2. If so, what obligations are consequently laid upon the Bishops when applications are made to them from other churches, to act in accordance with the terms of the Canon?

And above all the ecclesiastical lawyers or partisans, may I presume to inquire what in the liberty of the higher law of the Spirit should now be done—what in the present crisis of civilization would our Christ say?

Our National Council voted, as at present advised, to lay the Concordat on the table, leaving further responsibility to act with the Episcopal Church. We also voted to lay the greater Lambeth proposals before our churches.

NEWMAN SMYTH.

How It Looks to the Younger Generation

A Personal Letter

[The following letter was written by a young married woman of Boston to her uncle, who had written his niece regarding the questions which have come to the fore in the Fosdick discussions. The uncle in his letter had enclosed one from a neighboring pastor who agreed in essence with Dr. Fosdick. The subjoined letter expresses so well the point of view of a great number of our thoughtful young people that it is well worth printing.]

DEAR UNCLE: I want to thank you most earnestly for writing me so full and beautiful a letter, for I am honored to know that you care to spend so much of your time in telling me your thoughts. You know that I think that your faith ranks to me with that of Philip's grandparents and of a very few other people I have known, as one of the most beautiful external proofs (I mean outside of one's personal conviction) of the truth of our religion. I mean that one who lacked a personal faith could go a long way toward it by thoughtful observation of such witnesses as you.

I know that you will forgive me and perhaps not even be bored if I write very fully to you of these matters which are very close to me in feeling and interest. There are not many people to whom I talk of them, but, like Mr. ———, I can always be sure of your generous sympathy, whether or not we agree, and your views have helped me greatly, so that I think the statement of mine may help me, too, and will, I hope, be understandable to you.

First, I want to say that I realize how completely you are in accord with Dr. ———, and President Faunce and Fosdick and most of the big men of the day in your regard for the spiritual rather than the material message of the Bible. There is nothing in your faith—nor, I hope, in mine—but the completest worship of a wholly spiritual Saviour and a desire to help in the establishment of His spiritual kingdom. To many of us, now, the heavy stress being laid upon the virgin birth, as an actual physical miracle, has an unpleasantly material aspect which for you it utterly lacks. And I think the reason isn't a difference of character at all, but purely a matter of education and environment. Just think of Jack and Harry and me, and thousands, of course, younger than Jack, and just beginning to face spiritual problems seriously. We came into a world infinitely more complicated in physical, mechanical and scientific knowledge and affairs than that of your youth, scientific discoveries that were unknown to you were a part of our grade school education and our daily reading; evolution came to be an accepted theory rationally taught; man's gigantic power in the physical world was being acclaimed as never before—and with all this added stress upon science there was less stress than at any time previous (in American history, at least) upon religious instruction. To most of us (I'm not thinking now so much of your sons, who were especially fortunate, but of, oh, so many of our generation) the Bible was not lovingly, thoroughly, prayerfully taught as it was to you; it was not even intelligently taught. And so when we came to read it and it did not "check up" with what we had been taught—by authorities we did not question—was the truth, many felt that it was all just "fairy tales," and many were greatly distressed and suffered great upheaval of mind and heart. The intelligent men who knew how much we needed our religion and who understood our perplexities began to point out ways whereby our faith could "check up" with the new knowledge which we knew must be the gift of God; showed us that there must be spiritual laws as mighty, though as yet undiscovered, as those whereby we are learning control of the physical world; that the unchangeable eternal truths of Christianity, the perfect life of Christ and the perfection and simplicity of His teaching are affected not at all by controversies over doctrine, dogmas, scriptural inaccuracies, and so forth. The thing we know—the example that inspired St. Francis and Jeanne D'Arc and Cardinal Newman and Edith Cavell and Lyman Abbott and Phillips Brooks—lives forever, not in a book, or collection of books, or any written words, but in men's hearts. Of course, those who did not know our Lord during His life on earth had to learn of Him through others, but they didn't all learn of Him, or learn all they could know of Him, through the King James Version!

I don't want to argue with you about the inerrancy of the Bible. I think it would be—or is—very hard for anyone of our generation to look at the Bible in any other manner than as the Quakers do—"Not as the Word of God, but containing the Word of God." I think Mr. ——— most beautifully expressed the way the thoughtfully religious young people I know feel about it; Lyman Abbott, too, wrote many times of the only attitude toward the Bible that can be accepted by young people educated as they are now, with the scientific and historical knowledge before us now. But does it really affect the quality of our Christianity? Don't you

Wheat and the American Farmer

By Rev. Edmund de S. Brunner, Ph.D.

“WHEN I came here five years ago every one of our six churches had a resident minister. Now I am the only one left and my salary has been cut twenty per cent. in this year when my two children begin their college education.”

These words from the minister of a county-seat church in the wheat belt reveal in human terms what the crisis in agriculture means. This is the fourth successive year in which the farmer and especially the wheat farmer has been in a difficult place. As “The Country Gentleman” puts it, the farmer has been too long exchanging three to four hours of his work for one hour of labor’s toil. The Illinois Manufacturers’ Association has put the matter in other terms in a recent letter to leading farmers. It says:

“It takes 63½ dozen, or 762 eggs, to pay a plasterer for one day of eight hours’ work.

“It takes 17½ bushels of corn, or a year’s receipt from half an acre, to pay a bricklayer for one day.

“It takes twenty-three chickens weighing three pounds each to pay a painter for one day in New York.

“It takes forty-two pounds of butter, or the output from fourteen cows, fed and milked for twenty-four hours, to pay a plumber $14 a day.”

A farmer-manufacturer conference is proposed as a first step to improve conditions and to break the grip of “such men as Senators Brookhart, the two Johnsons and La Follette,” none of whom are “going to fool anyone very long.” The circular credits La Follette with being the “brains” of the group.

Other capitalist and financial groups have recognized the dilemma of the farmer. The monthly reviews of the big New York banks, such as the National City and the Guaranty Trust, have discussed the situation at length. Present ills are laid at labor’s door, the obvious moral being that the farmer join the campaign for wage reduction. It is safe to say that the average farmer does not look with favor on anything that looks like higher wages in any basic industry until his return on labor and capital invested is more nearly commensurate with the wage and commodity price level. Labor, on the other hand, through the mouth of none other than Samuel Gompers, served notice at last summer’s wheat conference, that any reduction in wages meant less prosperity for the farmer.

What, then, is the solution? Many voices arise to answer the question. Some urge farmer-labor co-operation. Last summer Chicago was the scene of a conference called under the inspiration of this idea, but the net result was not of large significance from the rural point of view. Neither the more influential farm journals nor the “releases” of the large farmers’ organizations treated the gathering as of much importance. Agriculture is based upon the ownership of land, and the farmer cherishes no radicalism that strikes at his basic concept of land as property. What he does desire is the opportunity to earn a fair return upon his investment.

In the face of the meager results at Chicago, measured in terms of widespread farmer support, comes the election by Minnesota of a “dirt farmer” to the United States Senate. Labor leaders, both state and national, assisted actively in the campaign and for the second time within a year this State swept a Farmer-Labor candidate into the Senate. Senator-elect Johnson’s platform may look radical to the city voter. Actually, there appears to be no conscious philosophy of radicalism behind his demands for government control of the railroads, mines and other natural resources and for taxes which would shift a larger share of the burden to the urban and industrial taxpayer. These demands but expressed the immediate discontent of the economically disadvantaged farmer—and particularly the wheat farmer. The platform also appealed to labor, and hence the alliance was formed.

It is doubtful if the alliance can continue. Some of the farmer papers point out that many of the labor leaders who have sought farmer-labor co-operation in the political field have opposed the curtailment or control of agricultural production, on the ground that it would raise food costs to labor, while at the same time they have advocated coal and rail strikes which have raised fuel and transportation costs to the farmer, and which aim not merely at curtailed but at suspended production.

Another solution proposed is to curtail production, which was tremendously stimulated by the war under the necessity of feeding the world. Such production was averred to be a continued necessity by many a prophet in high places. This optimistic view coincided with the farmer’s desires, and wheat production remained exceptionally high. But the optimists reckoned without the economic consequences of the peace. Depreciated foreign currencies could not pay for American grain. As it became apparent to Europe that no help could be expected from the United States the farmers of a number of countries turned to wheat growing. Italy’s acreage and yield, for instance, have gone up by leaps and bounds. Production is picking up again in Ukrainia and the Balkans, while Argentina and Australia, to say nothing of Canada, have been able to sell largely abroad.

For this reason decreased yield only can produce an equilibrium of supply and demand.

Others would preface this reduction in acreage by government purchase for resale of the two hundred million surplus bushels of wheat or by such financing that twenty-five per cent. of the new crop would be held in warehouses under supervision of the Department of Agriculture. It is feared by others that either of these plans to raise the price of wheat above production costs would not effect the desired decreased production, but would rather have a contrary result.

Other authorities, especially those in the banking world, see in crop diversification the way to permanent solution of the problems of the corn, wheat and cotton belts. They forget that crop diversification, useful and necessary as it is in many regions, if made the only way of salvation, will simply result in future over-production of other crops or dairy products. At the time of the Great War it was estimated by the Department of Agriculture that the cotton belt imported half a billion dollars worth of foodstuffs each year. Naturally, if this food were raised locally it would deprive other regions of these sales. The advocates of curtailed production do not, therefore, welcome the idea of wholesale diversification.

Alliance with capital or labor, price control by the government, additional credit are all unnecessary, according to others, if the marketing of farm crops can be co-operatively organized on a commodity basis operating on a national scale. Mr. Aaron Sapiro, foremost advocate of this plan, quotes the example of the Burley tobacco growers, who received eleven cents a pound in 1921 before organizing, but twenty-one cents in 1922 and thirty cents in 1923. In this rise in price only the speculator was hurt. The aim of these commodity associations is to merchandise and not dump crops. Supply and demand are considered not only nationally, but in terms of given times and markets.

Enthusiasm for commodity marketing, Mr. Sapiro says, must be accompanied by technique to insure success. Thousands of co-operative enterprises, most of them local, some national, have failed. The methods of building a successful co-operative are now known. Organization must be on a commodity, not a local, basis. The commodity must be studied so that marketing plans fit its need. The organization must be incorporated under a definite law which sets forth the rights and obligations of co-operative marketing associations. Some States do not have adequate laws. Only farmers must be admitted to membership on the "one man, one vote" basis. The organization must be districted for directors so that no one section monopolizes control. The organization must operate on a non-profit and non-speculative basis. The co-operator, i.e., the individual member, must be bound to his organization by a definite, long-term contract which obligates him to deliver all his product to it. Sure of business and controlling a sufficient proportion of the whole crop, the co-operative organization can finance the crop by using it as collateral. It can loan to individual members.

Probably Mr. Sapiro comes nearer to being fundamentally right than any of the other doctors, though all of them have good ideas. At best, political action or economic alliances will be palliatives, not cures. Real co-operation, as Denmark has proved, is immensely valuable and has by-products of great worth. There is a dangerous tendency at present on the part of Mr. Sapiro's school to regard the product of the farmer and not the man as the chief element in the co-operatives. The spiritual elements in co-operation have been overlooked. "The Journal of Social Forces" has recently published a criticism of this movement written from this point of view by Mr. B. C. Lindeman. He feels that there are some evidences that these big co-operative machines will turn out to be merely agencies for marketing farm products and that their social values will be negligible. "There exists among co-operative organizers a theory which leaves the community emphasis until last." The farmer is first linked with the large central organization and then attention is given to the local or district groups. This, says Mr. Lindeman, "leaves the weakest point, the most vulnerable point in the entire structure, unguarded and undeveloped." The legal contract binding the farmer to deliver his products to the co-operative, which has become so popular, is in itself insufficient to produce the cohesion and loyalty necessary for a co-operative movement which will endure.

The proper way, he thinks, is that of Denmark—to secure educated loyalty in the local community groups. This means that the progress of co-operation must be slow, something that our impatient organizers cannot or will not tolerate. It would be a good thing to get the entire family definitely allied with the co-operative, in fact, "this is necessary if the movement is to exercise real social functions." "Co-operative organizations would do well to place farm women on the boards of directors in the very beginning." Again, "if the co-operative movement provides for enlarging circles of human relationships, it will indeed become a potent factor in the socialization of the farmer and his family." "The fairest fruits of the Danish co-operative system are to be found not in accumulated wealth, but rather in the social and spiritual content of rural community life."

Mr. Lindeman concludes that "if the co-operative movement is looked upon as a means of acquiring the various elements of social progress, the progress itself will never come. Economic causes do not produce social effects. The rationalistic habit of separating cause and effect, means and ends in the social progress is in itself one of the chief inhibitors of progress. It is to be hoped that the oft-betrayed farmers will be saved from this error in the present instance."

Thus there appears as yet to be no agreement, but this is certain—the American farmer must find a way out. It must be a way that will do no injustice to other groups. Whatever others have done the farmer will succeed best by seeking no class gain, but rather the larger good of America. In this situation the leadership of the country church has an opportunity for guidance never before equalled. Will the church respond?

AGRICULTURAL ORGANIZATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES, by Edward West, Ph.D., University of Kentucky. 618 pp.

This monumental work brings together into one book a concise statement of the history, organization and purposes of public and private agricultural organizations. As Professor Dwight Sanderson points out in his introduction, there is real need for such a book. The material it contains has never before been brought together. It will give to men in public life, and this includes ministers and rural social workers, information that will help them to a better understanding of our agrarian movement and its organizations. The book is inclusive. It considers public and private organizations and does not omit the social aspects of either. One-fourth of the book is given to the Department of Agriculture and its bureaus. The land grant colleges, experiment stations and extension service are described and evaluated. One chapter is devoted to agricultural education under the Smith-Hughes law and another to State departments of agriculture. The last half of the book is given over to the private organizations like the Grange, Farmers' Union and the American Farm Bureau Federation. In all the books is a most valuable compendium.

In 1926 there will be exhibited in Philadelphia, the great panorama painting of the battle of Chateau-Thierry. The French artist, Renimel, is painting this picture and in it he will portray many American officers and soldiers.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

An Introduction to the Psychology of Religion*

THIS is one of the best books on this popular and important subject that we have ever read. The author takes a large view of his theme and writes with the restraint that indicates genuine command. The book is addressed particularly to "those who wish to study the psychological terminology," but its popular form does not seem to us to limit its value in any way to amateurs. The most striking feature of Mr. Thouless' treatment is his eminently scientific spirit. He never becomes so preoccupied with one aspect of an explanation as to neglect the facts supporting another aspect. Indeed, one of the most useful qualities of the book is its skill—pointing out the incompleteness of many writers' point of view on the psychology of religion. Durkheim, Mauss, Lenba, Jung, Pratt and others are justly and fairly criticized for overemphasizing one aspect of psychology-religion and implicitly assuming, or leading the reader to assume, that this particular aspect is the whole explanation.

Probably Mr. Thouless' most valuable contribution to the present-day study of his subject is his treatment of auto and hetero suggestion and his argument that "the fact that religious beliefs are fostered by the methods of suggestion is no evidence either of their falsity or of their truth. The only real relevance of this fact to the problem of the truth of religious belief is that it makes impossible any proof of the truth of a religious doctrine from its mere existence as a belief. It still remains possible to argue that the belief has characters which give evidence that it is true." Pointing out that the "character of givenness belongs not only to perceptions of external reality, but also to any experiences which result from the passage of mental processes, from unconscious regions of the mind, to consciousness," he criticizes the limitations of the mystic's argument as a final and complete proof of religious truth and argues that this should be supplemented by the approach through metaphysics and revelation. He does, however, find that the ability of a belief to materialize experience, including subjective experience, is a criterion of the truth of a religion as it is of a scientific hypothesis. The sane and balanced conclusion reached is as follows: "If the God revealed by religious experience is found to be, in fact, the God required by the moral consciousness, and to be the God required to explain the world as we find it, and to be the God revealed in historical Christianity, then the probability that each of these largely independent lines of approach to God, is based on error, becomes small. The probability that the concordant result of all four expresses some real insight into objective reality, becomes proportionately great."

The first chapter of the book begins with certain definitions in order to delimit the field of the theme and clarify the discussions. Mr. Thouless classifies the various definitions of religion under three heads, the first describing "a mode of behavior, the second on intellectual belief or opinion, the third a system of feelings." All three of these elements he considers essential and defines religion as "a felt practical relationship with what is believed—as a super-human being or beings." The psychology of religion he describes as "an attempt to express the workings of the mind, when it is religious, in terms of the mental processes we have discovered in secular psychology." At the very beginning a warning is uttered that the power of the psychological study of religion to discover faith is exaggerated.

The great part that suggestion (defined as "a process of communication resulting in the acceptance and realization of a communicated idea in the absence of adequate grounds for its acceptance") plays in the traditional element in religion is next emphasized. That dualism is inherent in the natural element of religion is well established, despite most poets' rather one-sided stressing of the single experience of beneficence, harmony and beauty. The moral conflict in the known mind is the next element discussed and interesting illustrations are offered of opposite extremes in Bunyan and Cellini. The effective element is not very seriously treated, because "effective grounds can always be found for any opinion, and if that were the end of the matter we would have to give up writing books or delivering lectures which were anything more than a mere recitation of facts." The rational element receives greater stress because it is discovered to be rather neglected in the formation of beliefs.

Having discussed briefly the five roots of belief in God, Mr. Thouless treats of what underlies these elements, dealing especially with the unconscious, the field in which Freud has made his greatest contribution to psychology.

The chapter on instincts contains some clarifying distinctions and definitions and that on "the sex instinct and religion" is marked by a refreshing sanity. Witness the concluding sentences: "It is possible that the infantile sexuality insisted on by the Freudians is in some real sense an initial factor in religion as in all other human activities; but that this is not a fact of such importance that it dwarfs all the other factors in the building up of religion, and makes the question of the truth of its objects a trivial one. It is possible that the Freudians who insist that it is a factor of such importance are in the position of botanists who, having dug round the roots of an oak tree, have discovered the remains of an acorn from which it grew, and insist that in this, and this alone, lies all the significance of the oak; and that the other scientists who spend their lives in the investigation of the structure of the tree itself, the artists who rejoice in its beauty, and the carpenters who use its wood are all alike living in a fool's paradise, because they have not realized that the oak is a decayed acorn and nothing more."

There follows a balanced treatment of the herd-instinct in religion with abundant evidence of Mr. Thouless' judicial

The Power of the Early Church

ACTS 2:1-8:1.

"Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved."— Acts 2:21.

THE beginnings of any movement are always interesting, especially those movements that have influenced and still are influencing human life. And among these forces, working in society, none has had a more potent place and none a more significant beginning than the Christian Church. The chapters of its early life have a strong fascination. We turn to them for the historical understanding of the inception of the most powerful factor in modern civilization. When men have been discouraged with the religious life of their own day, they have turned back to the first part of the Book of Acts to study anew the power that made the early Church grow as it did.

The power of the early Church did not lie chiefly in the unusual. Were that so, we could never hope to renew it. It had the elements which are within the grasp of Christians to-day, as they have been utilized also in all periods or years which have been marked by a spiritual quickening.

1. It was the power from great convictions. The early Church was not built upon negations. It was built upon positive truths. Men want to hear what other men do believe. Better one truth of which I can say, "This I believe," than a thousand statements, "This I do not believe." The creed of the blind man was a very simple one (John 9:25), but it was positive and it came out of his own experience. One thing he knew. Paul did not go through the cities of Asia Minor and Europe preaching negations. He knew whom he had believed.

The early Christians spoke in no uncertain terms. Their convictions were definite and direct. A quotation from the prophet Joel was their evangel (Acts 2:21), "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved." The steps they deemed essential were repeatedly expressed (2:38; 3:19), repentance, baptism, spiritual quickening. Their message was centralized in one name and was exclusive of all others. "Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even in Him doth this man stand here before you whole. He is the stone which was set at nought of you the builders, which was made the head of the corner. And in none other is there salvation: for neither is there any other name under heaven, that is given among men, wherein we must be saved" (4:10-12).

2. It was the power that comes through personal testimony. Men tell one another in business what they have learned. Educators meet for conference and the interchange of their methods, as such have proven wise or unwise. Peter and John spoke of what they had seen and heard (4:20). They were witnesses of the vital facts they were proclaiming, the death and the resurrection of Jesus (2:32; 5:29-32). This was the burden of the apostles in their later missionary work. John wrote and so must have talked, out of what he had seen (John 1:14; 1 John 1:1, 2). We are asked to be witnesses of what we have found true in ourselves. Christian Science has spread because of the personal testimony of its adherents to what they believe has been done in them. They speak to others of it in conversation; they publicly testify in their Wednesday evening service. The Christian Church, because of some past and present abuses, should not neglect this power for its own growth. A suggestive word is used in Acts 2:4. It is translated "utterance"; it means to "make a sound in accordance with one's nature." The dog barks because he is a dog; the cow, the horse, the cat, the wolf, the lion—each has its distinguishing "utterance." It is what we expect from them. The Christian has been given such a distinctive sound. He can make it audible if he so wills in his speech.

3. There was the power in the early Church that came through personal devotion to God and what was believed to be His will. Obedience to Him was more vital than obedience to human commandment, even though the latter came from the highest religious tribunal among the Jews. "We must obey God rather than men," was repeated by the disciples as the reason for their conduct (4:19, 20; 5:29). This exalted conception of duty has been the dynamic of all genuine Christian progress. It led John Wycliffe and William Tyndale to proceed with their translations of the Bible for their fellow countrymen, though human ecclesiastical authorities sought to prohibit their work. It inspired Martin Luther to defy edicts of emperors and popes. It is more essential in any day for the Church to seek to know and to obey the will of God than to know and follow current popular opinion.

This early devotion was marked, even to the enemies of the Church, by a loyalty to Jesus and imitation of His spirit and ways (4:13). The disciples were not illiterate men. Such an inference is not intended by the record. They had not had the education of the more advanced schools. They were, however, animated by the passion for Christ. Suffering for Him was counted a joy; teaching and preaching Him was a privilege (5:41, 42).

4. There was in the apostolic church a tactful and wise leadership. Officers of the modern church as well as leaders of the Jerusalem church have a peculiar burden laid upon them which demands the purest of motives and the finest insight into human nature, as they lead in solving the problems of the denomination or the local church. Spiritual progress is hindered or aided by the wisdom with which the temporal and financial aspects of church life are met.

5. There was power in a real fellowship. There was an absence of unselfishness. If any had need, the lack was met by those who had houses and lands (4:32-37). Jesus had given mutual love as the distinctive sign of discipleship. The first Christians showed their love for one another. Communion may not be needed to-day. Christian sympathy and helpfulness, Christian sharing of material blessings, are needed. And while this was the outer expression of the fellowship, the inner vitality of it was in the wholesome joy in religious things (2:46, 47). The bond that can never be broken between men is the bond that is cemented by a common love for the one Lord and Christ. And when this radiates joy in each professing Christian life, then others are led to seek and to find for themselves the source of this happiness.

We can never inspire others to seek what we have unless they see that our possession is of supreme and vital moment to us. "We would see Jesus" once was spoken by a company of Greeks to the recognized disciples of our Lord. Words such as these will be spoken to-day, as they were of old, to those whom the seekers rightly judge know Him best.

CLARENCE WELLS DUNHAM.

To return for just a moment to the virgin birth. To you it destroys Christ's divinity to give Him two human parents. To us it does not seem to add to His divinity to give Him a human mother but a divine Father; we cannot see why God should set aside His own law when it was the life that Jesus led, anyway, that proved His divinity, that proclaimed Him as "proceeding from the Father." To us it seems that no story of a miraculous birth can add to our belief in Christ's Sonship; His whole ministry showed Him to be what He declared Himself. That's why, to us, it doesn't seem "essential." I'm sure that's what Dr. ——— and Dr. Faunce and the others have in mind. They have no doubt—nor have we!—of Christ's divinity. They simply think His divinity better proved by other things than by the virgin birth.

You have read, have you not, Dr. Abbott's "What Christianity Means to Me"? That wonderful book affected me profoundly, and I was much struck by the similarity of Dr. ———'s ideas to Dr. Abbott's, particularly on the subject of the atonement—the significance of Christ's sacrifice. It has been the greatest possible comfort to me to have the guidance of Dr. Abbott's wisdom about this question, and I'm sure he helped thousands like me through the same problem.

The finest thing Dr. ——— wrote to you, I think, was, "I may not put all my faith in the terms used in the past, but the truths in which I believe are the truths of Christ which have been proclaimed through all ages." That is just what I have been trying to say at such length. We can't tell just how our children will state their faith in these same truths; the "terms" may change greatly even in one more generation, but we can believe that these truths will prevail, that the "faith of thy Grandmother Lois" will endure from father to son, forever.

I think Dr. ——— is great. Dean Rousmaniere at St. Paul's in Boston is the only man I know of here who dares say what we really want to hear. Of course, there must be many others, but we just don't happen to know them. The pastor of the little Presbyterian church where we go with comparative regularity is very, very good and kind and friendly, but painfully conservative. So we get most of our inspiration from reading.

Very lovingly,

ANNE.

Secretary of the Treasury Mellon estimates that the Government will have a surplus of five hundred million dollars this year. In view of this surplus Senator Smoot proposes a reduction of the income taxes. He would exempt all incomes of three thousand dollars and less; scale off one hundred million dollars of taxes on incomes from three thousand to six thousand dollars; scale off another one hundred million dollars of taxes on incomes from six thousand to ten thousand dollars; reduce maximum surtaxes to thirty-three and one-third per cent., and abolish the tax on candy, jewelry, and so on.

INTERNATIONAL GOLDEN RULE SUNDAY

BY CHARLES V. VICKREY

President of International Near East Association

ALL CHRISTIANS, in theory at least, accept the Golden Rule as a guide in life. Do we practice it? Would not our lives be richer spiritually, our churches stronger, and our nation a greater force for international righteousness if we lived as we profess the Golden Rule?

The observance of Golden Rule Sunday, December 2d, is intended as a spiritual exercise for the prosperous, as a source of food supply for the homeless and starving, and as a tangible expression of international fellowship and good-will.

On this date all persons who are disposed to make a practical application of the Golden Rule are requested to provide for their Sunday dinner the same menu that is approved and used for at least fifty thousand of the orphans of the Near East, and to contribute the difference between the cost of the usual Sunday dinner and the simpler, less expensive orphanage menus as a thank offering for the purchase of food for the orphans of the Near East.

Sunday has been chosen because it is a day when all the family are at home with a greater regularity of attendance at the dinner table and when there is usually less haste with more opportunity for self-examination and review of our stewardship of life and money.

The Sunday following Thanksgiving is especially appropriate in America, as the Golden Rule dinner will present the contrast between the unprecedented prosperity, tranquillity and good fortune of America and the poverty and suffering of misery-ridden lands across the sea.

If rightly observed, this Golden Rule Sunday should have a spiritual value in the lives of our American churches that will far transcend in importance any possible material comfort that may flow from it to orphans of Christian martyrs of Bible lands.

Luxurious living and self-indulgence may be as injurious to the prosperous as undernourishment and starvation are to the less fortunate. In saving these thousands of children and training them for future usefulness we may find that we are saving our own souls and our own country from moral decadence.

It is a notable fact that this day is being observed internationally and should be an important contribution to international co-operation and world peace.

When people break bread together they become friends. On this International Golden Rule Sunday the people of all nations, figuratively, at least, will gather around the same table, partaking of the same food and in some measure thinking the same thoughts.

These tens of thousands of orphan children in considerable measure hold the future of the Near East, and by the international application of the principles of the Golden Rule, in dealing with them, we may be able to avoid international strife and disastrous warfare in the next generation.

Certainly if, through no fault of ours, it had been our lot to die in the late war, and if our children had been left not only without parents or responsible relatives, but also without a country, we would hope that some co-religionist or other philanthropist would provide for our children at least the necessities of life and opportunity for attaining self-support. "Whatsoever you would that others should do unto you (or unto your children thus left desolate), do ye even so unto them."

disposition in the consideration of religious revivals. The chapter on Worship and Prayer enters into a careful review of the Nancy School of autosuggestion, draws an interesting parallel between certain Hindu and Roman Catholic practises, and utters a fine warning to the present age in saying: "Clearly, the abandonment of effort is a dangerous formula if it is taken as a complete guide to life. It may be important to know when to abandon voluntary effort, but it is surely even more important for effective action of any kind to know when voluntary effort is required."

The subject of conversion is cautiously dealt with under two groupings: Adult conversion, and mystical and adolescent conversion. A number of particular instances are described and interpreted, such as Paul, Augustine, Pascal, William Booth.

Two chapters on mysticism conclude the book (aside from a chapter on general considerations which has been already cited above). For purposes of delimitation a mystic is taken to be "a person who experiences a particular kind of mental power." Introversion and extroversion are most clearly described, and a new word is hesitantly but effectively coined for the process of the greater mystics—deoverion. This chapter gives an able outline of the phenomena of religious mysticism and the schemes of classification for them. It is followed by a short summary of the observations and conclusions of Flournoy on a modern mystic, Mlle. Vê. This is a most illuminating history, which unfortunately was ended by the death of the observer at a most interesting point, and is here made available for the first time, we understand, for English readers.

The book is well written, and despite Mr. Thouless's warning that its brevity necessitated dogmatism, maintains a fine scientific spirit in simple language throughout.

A CHICAGO INSTITUTE FOR CHURCH WORKERS

The University of Chicago is conducting an Institute for Church Workers on Thursday evenings from November 1 to December 13. In addition to the University Public Lectures, open to all, there will be a course on "The Teachings of Paul," by Dean Mathews, showing how Paul applied the Christian gospel to problems of his own day; class work, by Miss Chamberlin, on "The Bible in the Religious Education of Kindergarten and Primary Grades"; "The Religions of Other Peoples," by Professor Baker; and "Modern Methods in Church Work," by Professor Holman.

INDIAN WOMEN AT WORK

In Vengurla the Indian Christian women have organized a society to evangelize their neighbors and aid the local church as much as possible. The six teams of the society reached nearly two thousand women in a recent campaign and sold over four hundred portions of the Gospel and hymn-books. For women in India to undertake such work is a long step away from their old ideas.

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. The Response to the Appeal for the Japanese Churches

To the Readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

DEAR FRIENDS: The response to our appeal for the re-building of the Japanese Churches has been very generous but most of the contributions being made by the American people are being made for the Churches of the various Mission Boards.

There are, however, the independent Churches and they must look to subscriptions from independent sources. They are in a pitiable plight and yet they are strategic centers and powerful influences. They do not know where to turn.

I am writing this second letter to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, sincerely hoping that if you have not already contributed through your Church to the Mission Churches of your denomination, and have not answered my first appeal, you will send something even though it be little, at once. They are waiting upon us.

A letter from one of the native pastors reads:

"Your remittance has brought new faith and hope to us. We did not know where to turn in our dire distress. We sat in despair. Now we begin again. What America is doing for Japan is making all Japanese love her."

Please do not trouble to answer this appeal if you have already contributed to the Church Fund, but if you have not, may we not ask that you will put some investments into these permanent memorials of mercy and good-will?

In my previous letter I said I hoped to be able "to say that every reader of THE CHRISTIAN WORK had put some investment into these Churches." Judging from the response to our appeal and from the letters from readers saying that they had contributed through their own Church Mission Board, I should judge that about two-thirds of the readers have answered.

If every one of the one-third who has not answered would send one dollar or more we would be assured of ten thousand dollars more, which would practically rebuild three Japanese Churches.

You do not want to let this opportunity go by, do you? It is doubtful if your money can do as much permanent good anywhere else. Here it becomes like a stone in the temple, permanent, enduring. I am sure you wish to send something, but have simply overlooked it.

Yours sincerely,

FREDERICK LYNCH, Treas.

THE EDITOR OF LIFE ON READING THE BIBLE

In a running race to see who can mispronounce the greatest number of Biblical names in a given time, I'll take my chances with anybody. That was what kept me from reading the Bible at all in the beginning. I was afraid that I might get talking about it inadvertently to some one, and he would know more about it than I did. Then I got reckless, and began to read it for pleasure, just as if I didn't care how little I could learn from it. I discovered that the Bible has several good points, which should appeal to practical and ignorant people like myself.

It is the most economical book in the world, for it renders all other books superfluous.

You can get it in almost any size you want. It comes so small it will fit into a waistcoat pocket. If you want something to carry around for exercise, it comes up to ten or fifteen pounds.

So far as I have been able to discover, there isn't a single word in it that you cannot understand as soon as you look at it.

You don't have to read it through. You can pick it up anywhere.

Any part of it gets better every time you read it.

My principal discovery about the Bible indeed, as far as I am concerned, is that the only way to read it is without any system.

When I found I could read the Bible according to my own lights, I found I had an occupation that created more new values for me than anything I had ever tried. Perhaps the principal difficulty one meets in reading it at first is the fact that it is so closely written. A modern writer (just as I am doing now, shame on me), is always at some pains to explain his idea. This is, of course, due to competition, the one who succeeds in making it easiest or most obvious for the reader being the one who has the greatest number of readers. But the Bible is not competing with any other book. It is the bed-rock foundation of all our literature, and therefore if you want to know anything, the Bible is where you must go to find it. It contains all the latest news. No newspaper man, no sage or scientist, no philosopher or statesman has ever been able to get up early enough in the morning to get ahead of the Bible. Being so compactly written, without a superfluous word, no word in it can therefore be overlooked, and that is why it must be read without any ambition, that is, any thought that one may acquire a reputation as an authority for having read it; and that is why it can never be read by any method or system. It is too big for systems; it comprehends man himself and all his thoughts. It is in reality a great gallery of superb human portraits.—Thomas L. Masson in "The Christian Herald."

A WISE MOTHER

A woman to whom four healthy boy babies were born, only to die of stomach trouble in their second year, brought with infinite care a fifth boy past the danger point and into his eighth year. Then he began to go to school, but became at once subject to attacks that no tonic or diet could help.

Finally, the mother, who had weak eyes herself, conceived the idea that her boy might be similarly affected. Her friends ridiculed the idea, but the mother, knowing something of the subtle relation of the eyes to the rest of the body, took her son to a specialist in the nearest city.

The first day he wore glasses he said, wonderingly: "Why, Mother! Print is black, isn't it?"

Yes, dear, what did you think it was?"

"Why, grey, and sort of mixed like, and besides, the letters look straight up and down now."

The child had a complicated defect which made it difficult for him to see things near at hand, although the eyes themselves did not seem to feel the strain. The stomach trouble vanished as if by magic.

The moral of this story is obvious. Never leave a "stone unturned" until you have discovered the cure for your child's backwardness. Very often it is defective vision.

From Rev. Paul R. Hickok, D.D., Pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Troy, N.Y.: "We are making a much larger use of RESPONSIVE SCRIPTURES than was possible with anything else that had been available. We use it regularly in both services of public worship, and also the Sunday School and Midweek Services. The young people also use it. We like the wide range of subjects developed, and it is extremely helpful to have the themes developed as themes, with all sentences bearing directly on the subject. The work is a real and rich addition to our services of devotion, and in the public worship of the congregation." THE DEARTH OF INVITATIONS TO TAKE A DRINK

A former resident of Kansas who is a wide traveler and a keen observer, in a letter to the "Manufacturers Record," discussing the enforcement of the Prohibition law, writes:

"In a general way I might say that, in so far as I am able to judge, invitations to take a drink are practically never encountered in public places now. Along with increasing compliance with the law, good liquor is scarce. I have heard that doctors have ceased to prescribe whiskey because of the quality of the stuff that now remains in the drug stores. No person as good as half-witted thinks of drinking 'uncertified' stuff. Governor Pinchot declared the United States is dry and steadily getting dryer, and he is right. The old drinking places have vanished from every city; the old crowd of drinkers is scattered to the winds—many dead, the others mostly dry.

"I lived in Kansas during the beginning of prohibition in that state. The same backwash of protest and defiance was present there as in the larger cities of the country now. The tumult and the shouting died when the captains and the kings of liquor-dom departed, as they at last had to do. Then the frivolous of both sexes, who at first thought it smart to feast on forbidden fruit, settled down, sobered up, or flickered out, finding the game not worth the candle, and to-day drunkenness is hardly more common in Kansas than adultery or murder.

"Eliminate the liquor interests and the bankers who are identified with them, and I don't believe there would remain anything like a formidable opposition to the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act."

WOMAN'S HAIR

Even the "New York American" stands sometimes on the side of the angels. It recently printed the following editorial:

"Most mere men have an idea that woman is most beautiful as God made her.

"The efforts of most beauty experts and their feminine victims to beautify themselves by subjecting their hair to artificial processes have been regarded dubiously by the ordinary man.

"A number of men will take comfort in the statement of Penrhyn Stanlaws, a well-known artist, who was one of the judges of the Beauty Contest at Atlantic City. When Mr. Stanlaws was asked what qualifications were lacking in the girls who entered the contest, a part of his reply was as follows:

"Well, for one thing, they don't know how to do their hair. Some of them look like Zulus. You know, the fuzzy-wuzzy kind. And then there's far too much of this permanent wave stuff. Too artificial. Not enough naturalness.

"The only reason the writer of these lines dares to have them published is that they are anonymous. As it is, he puts them forth with fear and trembling. Still he believes Stanlaws was right."

Senator Oscar W. Underwood of Alabama, who is under full sail as candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1924, issued through his political manager a statement to the effect that although North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas and Texas have thirty-seven per cent. of the country's farms and twenty-five per cent. of the country's population, in one hundred and thirty-five years these Southern States have not had a President, and only two Vice-Presidents—John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, Vice-President under President John Quincy Adams, and William R. King, also of North Carolina, Vice-President under President Pierce.

The World of To-day

THE PRESIDENT'S THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION

By the President of the United States of America: :

A PROCLAMATION

The American people, from their earliest days, have observed the wise custom of acknowledging each year the bounty with which Divine Providence has favored them. In the beginning this acknowledgment was a voluntary return of thanks by the community for the fruitfulness of the harvest. Though our mode of life has greatly changed, this custom has always survived. It has made Thanksgiving Day not only one of the oldest, but one of the most characteristic observances of our country. On that day, in home and church, in family and in public gatherings, the whole nation has for generations paid the tribute due from grateful hearts for blessings bestowed.

To center our thought in this way upon the favor which we have been shown has been altogether wise and desirable. It has given opportunity justly to balance the good and evil which we have experienced. In that we have never failed to find reasons for being grateful to God for a generous preponderance of the good. Even in the least propitious times, a broad contemplation of our whole position has never failed to disclose overwhelming reasons for thankfulness. Thus viewing our situation, we have found warrant for a more hopeful and confident attitude toward the future.

In this current year, we now approach the time which has been accepted by custom as most fitting for the calm survey of our estate and the return of thanks. We shall the more keenly realize our good fortune, if we will, in deep sincerity, give to it due thought and more especially if we will compare it with that of any other community in the world.

The year has brought to our people two tragic experiences which have deeply affected them. One was the death of our beloved President Harding, which has been mourned wherever there is a realization of the worth of high ideals, noble purpose and unselfish service, carried even to the end of supreme sacrifice. His loss recalled the nation to a less capitious and more charitable attitude. It sobered the whole thought of the country. A little later came the unparalleled disaster to the friendly people of Japan. This called forth from the people of the United States a demonstration of deep and humane feeling. It was wrought into the substance of good works. It created new evidence of our international friendship which is a guarantee of world peace. It replenished the charitable impulse of the country.

By experiences such as these, men and nations are tested and refined. We have been blessed with much of material prosperity. We shall be better able to appreciate it if we remember the privations others have suffered, and we shall be the more worthy of it if we use it for their relief. We will do well, then, to render thanks for the good that has come to us and show by our actions that we have become stronger, wiser and truer by the chastenings which have been imposed upon us. We will thus prepare ourselves for the part we must have in a world which forever needs the full measure of service. We have been a most favored people. We ought to be a most generous people. We have been a most blessed people. We ought to be a most thankful people.

Wherefore, I, Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States, do hereby fix and designate Thursday, the 29th day of November, as Thanksgiving Day and recommend its general observance throughout the land. It is urged that the people gather in their homes and their usual places of worship, give expression to their gratitude for the benefits and blessings that a gracious Providence has bestowed upon them, and seek the guidance of Almighty God that they may deserve a continuance of His favor.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the Great Seal of the United States.

Done at the City of Washington this 5th day of November, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and forty-eighth.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE FORTHCOMING BRITISH ELECTION

Bonar Law, while Prime Minister, had given his promise that he would not undertake any serious change in British policy without a mandate from the people. His successor, Stanley Baldwin, naturally is bound by the same promise. Faced with the fact that over a million men are receiving unemployment doles in Great Britain, Mr. Baldwin has turned to a tariff as the only means that he can see for increasing the amount of work to be done in Great Britain. He proposes a limited imperial preferential tariff. The new duties, as he outlined them, would apply primarily to manufactured articles, in order to protect the domestic market. Wheat and meat would remain on the free list and Mr. Baldwin would reduce the present duties on tea and sugar, an attempt to please the workingman. By this tariff the Prime Minister would hope to improve agriculture and to expand cotton growing within the empire. The country will pass on the Prime Minister's program in a parliamentary election December 6th. The proposition of a tariff has brought together the two wings of the Liberal Party, led by Herbert Asquith and Lloyd George. They and the Labor Party will fight the tariff tooth and nail. The Labor Party will also oppose the Conservatives' foreign policy. Members of Parliament are in general much put out at having to go through a new election so soon after the old. The last time that the Conservatives, led by Joseph Chamberlain, undertook to advocate a protective policy they met the severest defeat within the present century. That was in 1905, when Campbell Bannerman became the new Premier.

REDUCING COAL PRICES TO THE CONSUMER

How shall the high cost of the distribution of coal be lowered? Not through the Federal Government, answers the National Coal Commission. The Commission maintains that reducing the costs of distribution is a problem for the local communities through co-operating purchasing societies, municipal fuel yards or some other kind of community action. At least two instances of this local action are already in existence. The Cleveland Co-operative Coal Company has been organized by the Co-operative Dairy Company of that city to purchase bituminous coal directly from the mines and sell it to the consumers without the intervention of middlemen, either wholesalers or retailers. It is expected that the new arrangement will effect a saving of forty per cent. in the price paid by the users of coal. The new organization is an example of consumers' co-operation and will be managed on co-operative principles. The second instance illustrates action, not by the consumers, but by public authority. Governor Charles W. Bryan of Nebraska is purchasing millions of tons of soft coal and selling it to consumers through municipal coal yards, farm and labor organizations, and public-spirited citizens. As a consequence, the retail price of coal throughout Nebraska has been reduced approximately $3.50 per ton. While there is no law in the State of Nebraska authorizing the Governor to engage in the coal business, Mr. Bryan is using the prestige of his office to do what he would be unable to accomplish in his private capacity. The actual costs of carriage, handling, shrinkage and local delivery are, of course, added to the mine price of the coal. What Governor Bryan is doing would seem to be within the power of any other Governor who is equally public-spirited and aggressive. Moreover, the State legislatures ought to enact laws authorizing the governors to engage in this work as agents of the State. Undoubtedly the Cleveland method of co-operative purchase and distribution by the consumers is the more democratic, but it is also more difficult and much slower. Indeed, a combination of the two methods seems to be the most practicable arrangement: State purchase with distribution through the local co-operative societies. In the opinion of Governor Bryan, "The way to put a monopoly in the necessities of life out of business is to provide competition—by the State if no other method is available." This statement recalls the declaration in the Program of Social Reconstruction, put out by the Roman Catholic Bishops: "Government competition with monopolies that cannot be effectively restrained by the ordinary anti-trust laws deserves more serious consideration than it has yet received."

POPULAR INTEREST IN THE AMERICAN PEACE AWARD

The American Peace Award created by Edward W. Bok received 22,165 plans by the closing date of the contest, November 15. These are all supposed to be practicable plans by which the United States may co-operate with other nations to achieve and preserve the peace of the world. Plans came from Europe, Asia, and South America, as well as from Canada and the United States, although only American citizens are eligible for the prize. People even telegraphed and cabled abbreviated plans. The Jury of Award hopes to select the winning plan by January 1. Then it will submit it for an informal referendum. The idea is that the daily papers which carry the text of the winning plan will also print ballots, which should be returned directly to the American Peace Award office. In addition eighty-eight organizations which are co-operating with the Jury will circularize their members with the plan and a ballot. These eighty-eight organizations boast a combined membership of forty-three million.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

The whole conduct of the contest is proof not only that Edward W. Bok is doing a great work for peace, but that he understands how to reach the public.

A PERMANENT CHINA FAMINE FUND

The China Famine Fund some time since sent out its final report, showing that the fund received a total income of $4,776,487.84, of which it used in China $3,631,605.30. The expenses of the fund amounted to $227,408.41. It is interesting to note that a little less than $60,000 of this sum went for salaries, $50,000 for publicity, and $10,000 for postage. The fund ended its existence with a balance of $917,474.13. The committee in charge of it has worked out a plan for the use of this sum in a way to help permanently against any recurrence of famines in China. It has established a trust under which the trustees will hold approximately $675,000 for the account of Nanking University and $225,000 for the account of Peking University, the income of the funds to be used for the study and investigation of famine causes and relief and the education of the Chinese in agriculture and forestry. Expenditures from the principal of either sum may be made only with the approval of a China Famine Fund Committee to be composed of five American residents in China, serving without pay, two to be selected by the American Minister to China, and two by the Committee of Reference and Counsel of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America. These four are to select the fifth. The committee has reserved from these two grants in trust for five years an emergency fund of $100,000 for use as a nucleus to start a national campaign in the United States for famine relief in China should such a campaign be necessary. At the end of ten years the committee, created by the trust, may direct the trustee finally to surrender control of the funds to the two universities, or if the administration by the universities has not been satisfactory it may withdraw them entirely and direct the trustee to apply them to other uses within the purpose of the plan. The plan is a stroke of real genius. The $900,000 surplus from the China Famine Fund should prove a far greater blessing than the sums used in direct relief. The people of this country who gave it can feel that they accomplished not only a work for the needy at the time, but a work which will help China for all time to come.

THE LIMITATION OF CROPS

Leaders of the farmers of the United States are turning in great numbers to the idea that the way for the farmer to get better prices and so to escape his present difficult position is to limit his crops. The farmer, too, is realizing that his alliance with labor is not wholly a natural one. "Wallace's Farmer" recently said: "All of these increases in wages of city labor would not hurt the farmer at all if both the farmer and the laborer were selling on the same kind of a market. In that case, the high wages in the cities would be promptly reflected back in the form of high prices for farm products. Unfortunately, however, we have such a surplus of farm products that their price is conditioned more on the wages of impoverished European laborers than on the high wages of the exceedingly prosperous American laborers. This applies particularly, of course, to wheat and pork, but it applies indirectly to all farm products. . . . Not until farm products are quite generally off of the European market and we are consuming nearly all of our food at home, will it be possible for the farmer to obtain a price for his products as far above pre-war as prices generally and as the wages of city labor. When that day comes it will be impossible for labor to profiteer any longer at the expense of the farmer. Farmer and laboring man may then possibly be able to sit down and counsel together. For the next five or ten years, however, it would seem that organized labor is chiefly interested in using farmers to pull its political chestnuts out of the fire. Labor has no intention of foregoing any part of its present temporary economic advantage at the expense of the farmer. It is as hopeless to expect that laborers will give up their profiteering advantage as it would have been to expect the farmers to give up their temporary profiteering advantage which they had back in 1917 and 1918. . . . For the time being, the one thing for organized farmers to remember is that high wages cannot hurt them if they restrict their production to a point where there is very little surplus to put on an impoverished European market. Once farm production is brought down to this point it will be possible for farm products to rise in line with the wages of union labor, no matter if farmers are not organized. In fact, in our opinion, the most important thing with farmers is not so much organization to control the distribution as it is organization to control the production." But are the people of Europe going to be able to maintain themselves at full efficiency without the crops from the United States? Must we not in some way reorganize the economic life so that the people who need food can get it, even though the sellers of the food have to wait to receive their money?

THE STORY OF THE PRYING STENOGRAPHER

Something over three years ago a middle aged woman applied for a position as a stenographer with the Baptist Foreign Mission Society. Her name was Bertha D. Henshaw. For eight years she had been a missionary in China under the Christian Alliance Board. Family reasons prevented her return to the mission field and she went to work as a stenographer in New York. As such she secured a position with the Baptist Foreign Mission Society, doing most of her work for Dr. James H. Franklin, one of the secretaries. She was an intense "Fundamentalist." It became evident to her, from some of the letters that passed through her hands, that some of the men on the foreign mission field saw Christianity in a different light from what she did. They were interested in helping to rebuild the Kingdom of God on earth as well as in bringing individuals into "the captivity of Christ." Such ideas did not fit in with her understanding of religion. She proceeded to note down instances of the expression of what she would have called "modernism." Then she resigned and took it upon herself to go to her former chief, Dr. Franklin, and ask to appear before the Baptist Foreign Mission Board with members of the Executive Committee of the Fundamentalist League, in order to accuse some of the missionaries and perhaps Dr. Franklin himself of holding "modern" views. The Fundamentalist League is what its name implies, a propaganda organization for "Fundamentalism." It is headed by the noisy Fundamentalist, John Roach Straton. Dr. Franklin asked Miss Henshaw to put her charges in writing. Miss Henshaw straightway went to Dr. Straton. Dr. Straton's conscience does not seem to have been troubled by the fact that Miss Henshaw had secured her information by what was little short of a criminal act. Anything was grist for his mill. So he and a committee of thirty of his fellows approached the Officers' Council of the Foreign Mission Society with the request that they be allowed to see some of the letters in the Society's files. The Officers' Council referred their petition to the Board of Managers. Straton and his fellows did not have a particularly pleasant three hours with the managers. To their minds, Mornay Williams, the distinguished vice chairman, who presided, had a "prejudiced and sarcastic attitude." No wonder! The Board of Managers insisted that the complainants put their charges in writing. Dr. Straton and the others have promised to do so, but they have not as yet. That is not wholly unnatural. If, without authorization of the Society they publish any part of the letters which Miss Henshaw reports, they will break the law. So nearly do their proceedings verge on the criminal. But putting aside the legal aspects of the case, how dignified is the position of these self-appointed judges, raising the wind on the basis of the tittle tattle of a stenographer! We trust that the Baptist Foreign Mission Society will fight this thing through. Above all, we trust that Dr. Franklin may not be moved by the threats of the Fundamentalists to give up his position with the Society. He is proving himself one of the foreign mission statesmen of the country. He is coming to rate with such men as Dr. Speer of the Presbyterian Board, Dr. Barton of the American Board, Dr. Frank Mason North of the Methodist Board. May the Baptist Foreign Mission Society have more Christian courage than did the Southern Methodist University in Texas. The Texas college finally yielded to the attack against Professor Rice, led by Frank Norris, the Dallas Fundamentalist. It is hard to believe that that is the way for a denomination, a college or a missionary society to stand out for the best in the world. May the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society continue to stand valiantly for the liberty of the Baptist tradition, and not be afraid, if necessary, to suffer for righteousness sake. Ultimately that will be the course most successful financially as well as spiritually.

ARE BAPTISTS UNWELCOME IN SWEDEN?

SOME time since THE CHRISTIAN WORK implied to some of its readers that non-Lutheran churches were not quite welcome in Scandinavia, indeed, that they were looked upon as interlopers. The experience of the American delegates at the recent World Conference of the Baptists in Stockholm would suggest that as a matter of fact the Swedes felt very cordially toward the representatives of that communion. One of the American delegates, Dr. Harry S. Myers, a Secretary of the Board of Promotion of the Northern Baptist Convention, writes:

"When I reached Stockholm I had a very sore infected finger that I had brought from England. As soon as I had finished some necessary business I asked for a doctor. After several telephone calls I was taken to the hospital by a Swede whom I had met an hour before and was immediately attended by a doctor. I was asked to return the next day, and I went daily until it was well. I had learned a Swedish phrase which meant 'Many thanks,' and this was all they would accept. I was a guest of the city.

"The Prince, the Prime Minister, and many ministers attended the sessions of the Baptist Congress and expressed the most friendly interest in its sessions. The policemen are fine, upstanding fellows, such as one expects in a great city in these latter days, and they were so courteous to help us get where we needed to go. They were never too busy to look at our maps and hear our English (our American dialect, as one poor Englishman called it) and point and tell the way, and frequently they would go part of the journey. Street car conductors carry a little bag for the money and are so polite that you just naturally went to absorb a little yourself.

"The Swedish Baptists held a convention celebrating their seventy-fifth anniversary just before the World Congress. A church of another communion was offered for the largest session, which was the one commissioning seven new missionaries, and twenty-six hundred people crowded in to see and hear. Another church which was not Baptist was offered for the Congress sessions, and a beautiful Lutheran state church was offered for the great Swedish concert. The Archbishop (he is now in America) invited Dr. Shakespeare, of London, the European secretary of the Alliance, to preach in the Cathedral at Upsala, and it was a memorable occasion. There was nothing that the Swedish people did not do for us that has yet been thought of. The Congress was the largest international gathering ever held in Sweden, and it made a deep impression on all Scandinavia. The Congress was invited on Wednesday afternoon to visit Drottningholm (some called it the Windsor Castle of Sweden). When we alighted after a heavy rain the tables were spread with good things to eat and many guides were there to pilot us through the castle and grounds.

"The Congress marched in a long procession to the great church to lay a wreath at the tomb of Gustavus Adolphus. By special courtesy permission was given to photograph the service, a privilege extremely unusual. The courtesy was so genuine, so extremely unaffected that it can only incite courtesy and Christian fellowship on the part of all who participated in it.

"One day one of us needed some money and had a New York check. He went to the bank where he had been introduced and had cashed other forms of exchange. This was a different type and he was asked if he knew Dr. Bystrum. Of course he did, he was the chairman of several sessions of the Congress, the editor of the Swedish Baptist paper, and for seventeen years a member of the Parliament. If he would endorse it no one would ever ask any questions. He was as gracious in his endorsement as the bank had been in its dealings.

"The daily papers of Stockholm gave much space to the Congress and published many pages in English. May we be as courteous to the foreigners who come to visit us!"

Bishop Edwin M. Hughes believes in being ready to put on the shoe where it pinches. Ever since 1872 the law of the Methodist Church has required that members attending the theater or horse races, dancing or patronizing dancing schools be expelled from the church. But Bishop Hughes proceeds to point out that the law has never been obeyed in the church and that to keep it there while the membership, ministers as well as laymen, violate it makes the church guilty of the same sin the church criticizes in the public for repudiating the national prohibitory law. It is much better spiritual exercise to see one's own faults than to see the other man's.

"Some hae meat but canna' eat,
And some can eat but hae nae meat;
But we hae meat and we can eat,
And sae the Lord be thankit."

Archbishop Soderblom said the other day in his farewell words to America that the leavings on our plates every day would keep a whole nation in Europe—Germany, Russia, perhaps Armenia—alive for one day. Still we have a right to thank God for our own daily bread as we have a right to ask for it. As for President Coolidge, it is too soon to know whether to be thankful for him or not. Time will tell. Everybody is waiting for his first message to Congress. There is fear in some quarters that he will be cautious and conservative, whereas just what is needed now in the White House is a vigorous, robust, resonant voice—a policy of clear, positive, ringing nature. For instance, it is to be hoped that President Coolidge will say with all the certainty of one of the Ten Commandments: "Go into the World Court or keep out of it." There would be a man for whom we could be thankful. But if he simply talks about it, "if this and if that," then all hope of gratitude will be gone. (If Mr. Coolidge only knew it, all hope of his getting the nomination will be gone, also, for getting elected, if he gets the nomination, unless he speaks positively.)

We can be thankful that there has been a growing prosperity during the last year along industrial lines, where the products are for home consumption. The exporting industries have suffered because the buying power of Europe is steadily declining. The farmers are suffering terribly because England, Germany and France, especially Germany (once a great consumer), have no money wherewith to buy, and this condition is of course going from worse to worse. Some day our farmers are going to see this and then there will be no more question about America's endeavor to save Europe. Sometimes people who will not heed the will of God will heed the will of Mammon.

There are one or two things, however, for which all lovers of mankind can be really thankful. Chief of these is President Harding's request that America enter the World Court with the other nations of the world. The President apparently did not think he was going to stir up any trouble, but to his surprise some of the old Republican war-horses scented danger. Had not the League of Nations said something about a court? Was it that this Court was the one the League was setting up? If so, it was tainted and we must have nothing to do with it. They rushed to the White House and laid their troubles at President Harding's feet. For a while, unfortunately, he listened to them and both moderated his zeal and qualified his utterance. He and Mr. Hughes began telling the country that it was not even a back door or cellar door into the League. But the President recovered from this chill and on the tour which took him from us he spoke with something of the old enthusiasm. His last word was a plea that we enter, and for that let us be extremely thankful. No doubt that "Morgue of International Relationships," as John Hay called the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, will try to kill it. Whether President Coolidge has any zeal for it or not no one knows. It behooves all good Christians to write him and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate at once.

Likewise, we can all be thankful that at last Mr. Hughes awoke to the fact that the United States had interests at

Let Us Give Thanks

AT JUST this time there comes to every editor the challenge to write a Thanksgiving editorial. Thousands of editors are combing their minds to remember something for which to be thankful. Some will be thankful that the Lord raised up Gifford Pinchot just in time to save out a little coal for us for this winter. It was refreshing to find one man in office who had the grit to take both operators and miners, both of whom had "the public be damned" attitude, and lock them up until they came to some sort of agreement. Others will give thanks in this connection that the same Governor, when he got through with the coal people, turned upon the lawbreakers—the first official, really, who dared do it—and spoke his mind with great boldness and plainness on the connivance between government and violators of the prohibition amendment. It seemed for a moment as if the shade of Theodore Roosevelt was revisiting the earth. It was wonderfully refreshing after the inertia of the last few years. Some will give thanks that Lord Robert Cecil, Lloyd George and Archbishop Soderblom have gone home—all that large group which, believing that national isolation and selfishness is the true policy for America, have been uncomfortable while these ardent prophets of international co-operation have been with us. Others will give thanks that while the other peoples of the world are starving to death we have plenty. These thanks are in the spirit of that quaint but rather heathen old grace: stake in Europe and finally offered, in a blind and halting way, to help solve the critical problem facing the world in the Ruhr. We would be more thankful had the offer been made from desire to serve the world. But it is encouraging to see our Government officials beginning to see that we have even remotest interest in what is happening in the rest of the world; that the state of Europe or Asia affects to some extent our welfare or discomfort. Anyhow, at last Mr. Hughes realized that the Ruhr problem had world implications and sent a message offering to help. But he attached a condition which gave France an opportunity to attach another. It now looks as though our kindly efforts had failed, but at least it showed that we were not utterly a provincial people, for which we may be thankful.

Above all, we can be thankful that God still reigns, although clouds and dust we make hide Him for a time. It is His world, and although we wonder He does not get utterly discouraged over the mess we are making of it, we cannot believe that after He has spent so many aeons getting it thus far, He is going to let it go to ruins. There is a remnant of the faithful as of old, and from this remnant He will make some time a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

Our Pomp of Yesterday

"My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen."—II Kings 2:12.

ON the eve of his departure for Europe, General John J. Pershing, in a statement warning us against unpreparedness, says: "Preparation in time of peace is insurance against disaster in time of war." How familiar was this slogan in pre-war days. Americans and freemen the world around have great reason to honor General Pershing. All liberty-loving peoples are under heavy debt to him for his wisdom, his courage, his devotion to high ideals, during the war. He helped largely to win the war, and if we are to remain in this world-war business the warning which he sounds is doubtless timely. But why tread the winepress forever?

Seventeen years before the beginning of the World War a young man watched the pageant of royalty, its pomp and display, as it was unfolded during the elaborate celebration of the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria. He saw the gorgeous splendor of it all—the processions, the bands, the guns—as a passing show. The feelings of this young writer of barrack-room ballads, as he looked on, are revealed to us in the stirring lines which he set down:

"Far-called our navies melt away,
On dune and headland sinks the fire;
Lo, all our pomp of yesterday
Is one with Nineveh and Tyre!
Judge of the nations, spare us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget!"

What about this warning of the Dreamer of Burwash in English Sussex? The lines were written a quarter of a century ago, but they have never been pondered seriously by the world.

Many years before Victoria's time a young prophet about to assume large responsibilities among his countrymen saw where a nation's real strength lay. The defense of the country, Israel had said, was in her chariots and her horsemen. Had not her shield and her sword brought victory to her standards? Israel's army, with its pomp and its power, was the protecting arm, the military party of Elijah's day declared. But Elisha, with his penetrating insight, saw more deeply into the problem. In Elijah, who had just been caught away from him in the whirlwind, he saw the real protector of Israel—"My father, the chariot of Israel and the horsemen!" The man of God is a country's strongest defense. The spiritual forces of a nation are the hope of the nation. General Pershing, who now in time of peace, urges preparation in arms for emergency needs, during the war, emphasized the inferior place which physical force must play in winning the war. He said that the war would not be won by the massed strength of men or arms, but by the spirit in which the men adjusted themselves to the task—a re-echo of the words once uttered in the ancient Hebrew state:—"Not by an army, nor by power, but by my spirit." General Smuts, Premier of South Africa, is right when, in a recent speech in London, he appealed for faith and good-will in the reconstruction of Europe. The sword and the 75's will not promote peace, nor will these instruments bring prosperity. They are the weapons of an old order. The new day requires spiritual agencies—brotherhood, co-operation, good-will. These are our chariots and our horsemen.

And why cannot America put her moral strength back of these elements which the world so desperately needs? The past five years have seen great changes. With all his blood-stained impedimenta, the Turk is back in Constantinople, while the Armenian has no place to lay his head. And because of what we have done for her, Armenia is the spiritual ward of America. But we have acquired oil wells and we must needs attend to them. Europe is full of hatreds and jealousies and quarrels. Her wounds have not been healed. Her ills have grown worse. They might have been mollified had a Good Samaritan happened along the road. We have heard Europe's cry, but we have great interests at home that have demanded our attention. Why should we sacrifice these for Europe's woe? Let Europe heal herself. Thus we have mused during the years that have slipped away.

But Christ was never a mere onlooker in the midst of human woe. In the picture of the Judgment scene which He gave us, where were gathered the nations of the world, He identified Himself with the needy and distressed. We do not follow Christ—we who hand out our dole at arm's length. We must identify ourselves with mankind in its distress. In the war for justice and peace America gave to the world the flower of her youth. We fought "not for the glory of America, but to end war." We did not move our armies until the issue was clear—not until the conscience of America was moved. Our men fought as in a dream to put an end to war. The war became a crusade. Thousands of American boys fell, broken, upon the field of honor. They cry out to us, that we unselfishly work to the same end for which they gave the last full measure of devotion. They were unafraid of responsibility. During that stirring era America was unafraid to mingle with other nations and throw her might on the side of right. Old Glory was carried on the same field where were unfurled the colors of other free peo—ples. The war was won. The Armistice came. We withdrew from the scenes of trouble and turned again to our own affairs. "America first," we said. But our mission was unfinished—is still unfinished. Perhaps Browning's "Lost Leader" puts the case too strongly:

"Just for a handful of silver he left us,
Just for a riband to stick in his coat—
Found the one gift of which fortune bereft us,
Lost all the others she lets us devote.

We that had loved him so, followed him, honored him,

Made him our pattern to live and to die."

This is doubtless too harsh an arraignment to apply to our policy of aloofness. But this much is true, America is "The Lost Leader," and she has gone her own way upon the road while others suffered. Throughout wide areas of the world life is filled with hopelessness and despair. There is a return to the "pomp of yesterday."

When Jesus came the heralds of the new epoch sang of peace on earth and good-will among men. The carrying out of "The Heavenly Mandate" to-day rests more with America than with any other nation. We can lead the world through the gates into the Golden Age if we will.

Is not this the day of the Lord? And is not the Master waiting for the nations to take their places on His right hand or on His left—on the side of those who care for the needy, the distressed, those who hunger for peace and good-will in the world; or on the side of those whose selfish interests promote indifference to responsibility for the world's ills.

Will next Armistice Day set up another marker back toward the yesterdays with their pomp and pride of power? What has "The Lost Leader" to say? Has America seen the vision of Elisha?

"The tumult and the shouting dies,
The captains and the kings depart,
Still stands thine ancient sacrifice
An humble and a contrite heart."

"Blessed Be Work"

PART II.

IF the condition of things to-day were in any sense likely to be permanent; if it were not the result of the dislocation of the war—that inexhaustible source of misery and ruin; if the condition of things to-day were likely to last, or if we are going to permit it to last, it certainly spells the ruin of our country. You may remember that the symptoms of the fall of Rome was that vast mob, gathered in the streets of Rome, of men who simply demanded panem et circenses; that is, a free dole of bread and a perpetual supply of theatrical amusement, and it was because Rome found no remedy for that canker at its heart that the Roman state came to an end. Depend upon it, unless we can find a remedy for this vast army of unemployed; if we are to maintain indefinitely millions of people doing nothing, the end of this country is at hand. It is impossible to maintain a great state on such terms.

It shows us, then, that something is wrong; something is wrong in our system, our industrial order. Some element has been omitted. Unemployment is not the first cause. We have not recognized the cause. So far as it is a result of the war, unemployment on this exceptional scale is explained. It is true that the industrial paralysis of our chief customers makes it impossible for them to demand the products of our industry, and therefore our mills are silent and our workers are not wanted. But apart from that cause, which was exceptional, there has been a cause at work which everyone must recognize, a paramount cause—that there are men out of employment to an extent beyond our power to prevent. We have to inquire into that. It seems that production on a large scale by means of machinery and world-wide commerce—two things which naturally should produce illimitable wealth and therefore general prosperity—may have another effect, and has another effect, at this moment; it may throw men out of employment just because production is so rapid and so great. It may be possible to produce more than the world wants, and yet not to give those who want it the possibility of getting it. It may be that some shifting of circumstance or trade or fashion may throw men out of employment. A new invention may dispense with men, and the workers are left unemployed. The failure of the cotton crop in America to-day may throw all the operatives of Lancashire out of work in a few weeks, and they will be facing unemployment and starvation. The workers, or large bodies of them, may find themselves not wanted. Their reserves may be quickly exhausted, and, through no fault of their own, large bodies of men and women may be in those pitiful squadrons of the unemployed, miserable and disheartened, because there is nothing for them to do.

This is a situation which has not been faced hitherto frankly and fully by the community, and the one good thing in the present extremity of distress is that it is forcing the community to face the situation, and to consider it not only as an exceptional result of war, but as a permanent and necessary result of the conditions and the practices of our industrial life. Let us assume, then, that henceforth the community that is our country will take it as a first duty to remedy all this unemployment evil; that it will find out why production on a large scale and the international relations of commerce lead to the great evil of unemployment. If the community sets to work to find this out, depend upon it the discovery will be made. There are causes for these things; though the ignorant or the careless actually do not inquire or discover, the cause can be found. It is not God's will that things should be as they are to-day; it is only the result of human selfishness, chiefly ignorance and the selfishness which is the very worst form of ignorance.

If the governments are interested in facing this problem, the Church of Christ is also interested in it. Not that it is the specific duty of the Church to solve the great economic question; that must necessarily be the work of experts and students. But the Church of Christ is vitally interested in a question which means so much for the moral and physical, as well as the spiritual, welfare of men; the Church has brain, and, as far as it has brain, it will work to find out the cause and the remedy of the disastrous situation. We must express the hope that the present disastrous situation will hasten on that conversion of the whole industrial outlook. It is a conversion to which the noblest thinkers for more than a generation have been pointing. It was the great message of John Ruskin, especially in his prime of life, when he wrote, for instance, "The Crown of Wild Olives," or "Munera Pulveris;" it was his great contention. His voice was then like a voice crying in the wilderness, but it is no longer alone. He has round him now a great body of men and women who have imbibed his thought and are working on his lines. The economists themselves recognize the truth of his general position. For what was the idea in John Ruskin's work? It was that, whereas the community makes it its first object to produce wealth, it ought to make it its first object to produce and to keep happy, healthy and useful men and women. That was the conversion he demanded, and it is that conversion that may be forced upon us now by our present miseries. To produce wealth—"wealth of nations," as Adam Smith called it—to preserve property, to keep the sacredness of property, to secure for everyone what was his, that was the great object of the state. Thinkers and writers advocated these as the main and necessary objects of a community. But a conversion has to take place as to what is the first object of the state. The first object of a state's existence, and the primary interest of those who profess to govern it, should be to give to all the people who form that state a perfectly unimpeded opportunity of honest work, of education that prepares them for it, and conditions of life that give them joy in it. That is the first object of the state. That is what a benevolent despot would try to secure for his people, and how much more should a free country, a country of intelligent citizens, make that a primary object of its existence? Its primary object should be to get for every human being within the community of Great Britain a clear, unimpeded opportunity of honest work; a security that each one who shall work according to his ability shall find the opportunity of developing his powers to the utmost and reap the fruits of his industry, not as the main object, but as an incidental result of a wisely ordered commonwealth. We have to see that that is the object, the main object. Bills should be brought into Parliament, and discussions in Parliament should turn upon that. Instead of appointing ministers for the conduct of war and outside affairs, the first thought of government should be to appoint ministries of public service, which might secure those primary ends—the opportunity of life for everyone, the guarantee of an honest living, for everyone who is honest and who wishes to live honestly on the fruit of labor and the results of labor, in the happiness which comes from good and honest work and the peace of heart and joy which results in being useful to our fellow-men.

We seem to hear even now voices in the air which are calling us to a new and better order. Thinking at present is confused, and those who try to lead are often absolutely ignorant and blind and stupid. There lies the difficulty, but we are working our way towards the light. We are, by earnest thought and eager enterprise of the brain, backed up by the pity of the heart, finding out the way in which a state can order its life so that there shall be no workless people among us, but everyone who is willing to work shall work, and everyone who is not willing to work shall starve. That is the ideal. Again we hear the voice of Christ saying to us, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" and we hear, echoing again down the years, through Ruskin's voice, the words of Christ, "I will give unto this last, even as unto the first."

THE OBSERVER

Two Significant Conferences in Philadelphia

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

IN the summer of 1920 a group of fifty or sixty delegates from the various communions of Protestant Christendom met in Geneva upon the call of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to consider the advisability of calling a universal conference of the churches to consider their life and work in their largest aspects. There had been in Nicea an ecumenical council of the Church Universal on the matter of doctrine. The point was frequently made at Geneva that this council should be for the work of the Church what Nicea had been for doctrine. Especially it was hoped that this council might express the voice of the Church Universal on the great social, economic and international problems facing the world. The hope was also frequently expressed that perhaps a permanent international council might grow out of the conference, which could speak at any time for the Universal Church on the great problems of the day. The Geneva meeting revealed that there was a real conviction that such a conference was greatly needed. There was no unanimous voice of the Church Universal, if even there was a common conviction. One instance was frequently referred to, namely, what had the Church Universal got to say on the question of war.

The Geneva meeting resulted in the setting up of a large international committee with Archbishop Soderblom as chairman and Drs. Macfarland and Lynch as secretaries, with the understanding that there should be set up large national committees, officially appointed by the various communions when possible. This has been done, and now each country, or in some cases groups of countries, has its own committee. The American committee is a large, strong committee, with Dr. Arthur J. Brown as chairman and Dr. Henry A. Atkinson as secretary, and it assembled at Philadelphia last week to hear reports of its commissions and some addresses from distinguished guests from abroad. The meeting was intensely interesting. It is a vast undertaking to bring all the Protestant churches of the world together. But the Conference made it plain that the movement was commanding the deep interest of the churches and that the ecumenical conference in Stockholm in 1925 would be really representative of Protestant Christendom. The Swedish Church is quite overjoyed in being privileged to be the host to the delegates of all the communions and nations of the world. The Swedish Government is also anxious to share in the hospitality and, I understand, is making preparations to entertain the Conference royally, even to invite it to use the houses of Parliament for its sessions.

The second Conference was on a much larger scale and was open to the public. It was the annual meeting of the American Council of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, and it brought to Philadelphia several hundred delegates from all over the United States to meet in the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel for November 13, 14 and 15. It seemed wise this year to make the annual meeting not simply a business meeting, but a "Congress on America and the Permanent Court of International Justice," and the Conference was called under that heading. But the meetings, quite without exception, took a much larger range, and the one note which was sounded in every address was America's participation in world affairs. Addresses were made by such men as Drs. Merrill, Gulick, William Adams Brown, Arthur J. Brown, Nightingale (of London), Bishops Soderblom and Cannon, Presidents Lowell and Wooley, Hon. Oscar S. Straus, Mrs. James Lee Laidlaw, Mrs. Frank F. Williams and Mrs. Edgerton Parsons, Prof. Manley O. Hudson, Messrs. Fred B. Smith, Will Irwin, Raymond Fosdick, Governor Sweet and Dr. Nansen. As I said, the one note struck in every speech was that America should take her place among the nations of the world, recognize that she belongs to the world family and not only participate in solving the great world problems, but, because of her resources, her youth and her idealism, take the lead. Of course, she must go into the World Court. That was taken for granted; but she must do much more: she must realize that all of the problems now vexing Europe—the Ruhr, Italy and Greece, Greece and Turkey, Russia, Poland—all of them are just as much her concern as they are England's. This note always stirred the audiences, which were large, and unless I am mistaken the pleas made by many of the speakers that America belonged in the League of Nations elicited the heartiest applause. Is there a new interest in America's participation in the League rising in the minds and hearts of the American people? I am inclined to think from my own observations that this is the case. I have spoken before many audiences this fall and the one thing that always brought spontaneous applause was mention of America's participation in the League of Nations.

Of course, these audiences were largely composed of church people, and the audiences at Philadelphia wholly of church people. But there are a good many church people in the United States and it would seem that if a great majority of them favor America's entrance into the League, this would be of some influence upon the Administration and the Senate. But it seems not. The great task now, as Dr. Hutton pointed out last year in England, is to find some way to bridge the chasm between the Christian people and the Government; to translate public sentiment into senatorial action. When President Wooley of Mt. Holyoke told the audience gathered at the great banquet at the Bellevue-Stratford that had it not been for the League, Italy's action in Corfu would have precipitated another war and that the League could prevent wars in the future and in the same way, the audience broke into applause; but the growing public sentiment seems to produce no effect whatever on Congress or the Administration.

The general theme, as I said, was America's participation in the World Court. The general impression that had been gained by all the speakers as they had studied the many audiences they have addressed in recent months was that there is practically no sympathy in the churches with the attitude of Senator Johnson and others, that the United States should live an isolated life and have nothing to do with Europe. The churches are too Christian to share that view. With them "brotherhood does not stop at the shores of the two oceans." The feeling is universal that the United States belongs to the family of nations and should take active part in helping to solve the problems harassing the world and should help to lift Europe out of the chaos and slough of despair into which she has fallen. It is the question of method that perplexes the churches. Two methods are now before them—the League of Nations and the World Court (whether Mr. Bok would produce a third remained to be seen), and toward the World Court the attitude is as follows: There is practical unanimity but not great enthusiasm because the Court is not broad enough in its scope and power. There would have been more zeal manifested had it been made obligatory upon every participating nation to take all of its international disputes before the Court for settlement. Then there would have been something definite and decisive. With voluntary use of the Court, while people feel that it is a great step toward international co-operation and world peace, and while they will support it, they feel at the same time that it falls far short of an effective tribunal.

The task before the World Alliance is to arouse enthusiasm over the Court as it is, because it is a first step toward the substitution of processes of law for processes of war in the settlement of international disputes, and can be further developed in time. Several speakers emphasized what some people forget, namely, that the mere fact that the Court is in existence, ready to hear cases, is going to have a deterrent effect upon nations between whom a quarrel has arisen. They are going to hesitate about going to war when they know that the whole world expects them to use the Court. And the people are more and more going to expect them to use it as the years go by.

The Congress was very successful from the point of view of numbers and of the kind of men present. There were many leaders of the churches and many forward-looking young men and women. They surely represent a much larger group. As Dr. Boynton said, "We have got to look largely to the youth." Many of the old are too deeply rooted in the old philosophies of force, militarism, nationalism and individualism. The coming youth are going to build their civilization more on the social basis with co-operation, community, internationalism, as the law of life for both men and nations.

It would be invidious to single out single addresses; all were so good, from Dr. Atkinson's and Dr. Gulick's at the beginning, to Dr. Nansen's and Mr. Fosdick's at the close. THE CHRISTIAN WORK will print two of these delivered by our distinguished visitors from abroad, namely, the striking message of the Archbishop of Upsala and the remarkable story told by Dr. Nansen. These two men are among the six most outstanding men in Europe to-day.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Thanksgiving Day

By Rev. George Albert Getty, D.D.

Pastor Zion Lutheran Church, York, Pa.

And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.

And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully:

And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits?

And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods.

And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry.

But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided?

So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God.—Luke 12:15-21.

IN our Common Service Book the gospel assigned for our meditation in connection with the Festival of the Harvest is the Parable of the Rich Fool. It is likewise appropriate for our consideration on this national Thanksgiving Day, when the abundant harvests of another year have been gathered into the granaries of our country, and when the prosperity that has come to us as a people has caused the President of the United States to follow a custom of long standing and issue a proclamation calling upon the citizens of this favored land to acknowledge the goodness of God and to render thanksgivings and praises unto Him.

There is always a danger that in the contemplation of material things we lose sight of the higher and more important things of the Spirit, and the Parable of the Rich Fool was spoken by our Lord to warn men against the dangers of materialism. During the last year of His earthly life Jesus was in the country of Perea, and as usual He was teaching the throngs of people who gathered around Him, when one day a man burst into His presence with an unmannerly request that disturbed the tranquil atmosphere of the occasion. Sometimes, when older people are in the midst of some important and interesting discussion a little child will interrupt the conversation with some petty complaint or trifling request which to the mind of the little one seems for the moment of far more consequence than any of the things which are occupying the attention of its elders. In a similar spirit of childishness a man who considered the proper division of a legacy between his brother and himself as of more consequence than all the teachings of Jesus Christ concerning the spiritual life and the kingdom of heaven, interrupted Him in His discourse with the request, "Master, speak to my brother that he divide the inheritance with me." It is a significant fact that Jesus denied the request point blank, and with an apparent show of feeling. I have often thought of His action in the past few years when certain zealous advocates of a "socialized gospel" were insisting that it was the business of the Christian Church to investigate the points in dispute between capital and labor and other public questions of a similar nature, and act as self-appointed arbiter between the disputants. Our Lord Jesus Christ, although directly appealed to to act as umpire between these two brothers, indignantly refused to do so, and said, "Who made Me a judge or a divider over you?" and then, taking the incident as a text, He preached a sermon upon covetousness which was applicable to both of the brothers alike. "Take heed and beware of covetousness," He says to the man who is asking for a division of the estate. "Take heed and beware of covetousness," He says to the man who refuses to divide the property. "Take heed and beware of covetousness," He says to all within the range of His voice. He speaks the same message of warning to-day to all who may be tempted to look upon money as the all-important consideration in this life—to the man who labors with his hands and who fears that he will not receive sufficient wages for his work, and to the employer who works with his brain and who fears that his profits will not be as large as they ought to be—to rich and poor, manufacturer, merchant, banker, professional man, artisan, mechanic, clerk, day laborer—to all in any station of life and whatever their occupation the message of Jesus is a direct and a personal one—"Take heed and beware of covetousness."

Our Lord gives the reason for His admonition: "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." Material possessions will not prolong a man's life. The rich die as surely and as quickly as the poor, and they take none of their material possessions with them into the life beyond. Material possessions do not bring freedom from labor and anxiety, but often just the reverse.

Jesus emphasized this truth and then in order to drive it more closely home to the hearts of those who heard Him, He related the parable which forms our text this morning. He told of a man who prospered abundantly. His fields brought forth rich harvest, so rich, in fact, that his barns would not contain the stores of golden grain. His heart exulted within him at all this wealth and at the thought that it was all his. In the exuberance of his greedy joy he said: "I will pull down my barns and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods; and I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry." This man reckoned altogether without God. And God, who had caused the harvests to ripen and the man's wealth to increase, was not well pleased with the manner in which His bounteous gifts had been received, and God said: "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" Jesus concludes the parable by saying "So is he that layeth up treasures for himself, and is not rich toward God," or, so is he that magnifies the importance of material things to the exclusion of the more important things of the spiritual life and the spiritual world.

With this parable and its teaching before us this morning as the basis of our thought, let us take as our subject, "True and False Conceptions of Our Temporal Blessings."

I. FALSE CONCEPTIONS OF MATERIAL POSSESSIONS AND PROSPERITY.

It is a mistake to look upon our temporal blessings as of supreme importance. There are other things more important than the material things that have come to us during the past year. This is true of the individual, and it is true of the nation.

So far as the individual is concerned the most precious thing that has been given to us is the holy light of divine truth as that light has shined upon us through the life and teaching of our incarnate Lord, through the inspiring pages of the inspired Bible, and through the fellowship and influence of the Christian Church. More precious than silver or gold has been the faith begotten and developed within us by the Holy Spirit, the hope which has filled our hearts and turned sorrow into joy, and the sweet and comforting assurance of our heavenly Father's presence with us in every circumstance and condition of life. While the harvests have been ripening in the fields there has been another harvest maturing in the experience of every child of God, and of the two the latter is by far the more important.

If a man is rich in material things and poor in soul, he is not to be envied. If a man has been successful in secular pursuits, but has made no progress in the spiritual life, his success is not a thing to be desired. The rich fool of the parable had much wealth at his command in the morning, as men count wealth, but that night he entered into the presence of God poorer than the beggar who had appealed to his generosity in vain. I do not counsel indifference to-day to the temporal and material blessings that may have come to us during the year that is gone, but I do insist that these are not the chief things for which we should give thanks to God on this day.

At the present time our own nation is counted as the richest in the world. Reports from the various sections of our own country indicate that the crops have been unusually large. So plentiful is corn that many farmers are using the cereal as fuel. The immense wealth of our mines has not been appreciably affected by the vast quantities of coal and metal taken from them. The country as a whole has probably never been in better condition so far as its material resources or the volume of its wealth is concerned, and this in spite of the immense debt incurred during the war and the industrial depression which has followed in the wake of the world conflict.

But while these things are true, and while it is proper that we should acknowledge with gratitude these evidences of material prosperity, it is not of them that we are especially proud this morning or for them that we return our most fervent thanksgiving to our God. There are things more important to the nation than mere material prosperity, and chief among them are the high spiritual ideals toward which the American people are striving, and which constitute the peculiar glory of our nation at the present time. To see what our eyes saw in the Washington Conference would cause many an ancient prophet and seer to rejoice. To behold assembled in the capital city of this western republic the representatives of the foremost nations of the world, gathered in response to an invitation from the President of the United States for the purpose of working out, under the leadership of our own American statesmen, a program of constructive measures for the promotion of the peace and welfare of the world, was a sight surpassing the dreams of the most sanguine and visionary thinker of the past—a sight that thrilled the hearts of us all as from day to day the reports came of the substantial progress made toward the realization of the lofty purpose in the mind of our President and his able Secretary of State. Would that this next year might see a conference of like spirit meet to consider the economic needs of the world.

If the late war has taught us anything, it has certainly made clear the fact that materialism is a poor foundation upon which to build hopes of national prosperity. During the course of the great world struggle, when the hearts of all of us were stirred and when I was seeking for light as to the underlying causes of the mad frenzy of destruction which threatened our modern civilization, I read that book of the German militarist, Van Bernhardt, and was utterly shocked by the bald statements of the materialistic philosophy that underlay his entire volume. Since the close of the war General Ludendorff has written a book in similar strain. What these two men, eminent in the counsels of the German Empire before its collapse, have to say may be taken as representative of the thought of the ruling classes of Germany before the war. They boldly declare that "might makes right;" that the only foundation for national prosperity is material wealth and physical strength. Their philosophy is utterly godless and altogether anti-Christian. It is not surprising that an empire built upon such foundations should collapse. It is not surprising that a mighty people numbering over sixty millions, guided by such a false philosophy of life, should be the means of bringing upon the world such an era of frightfulness and suffering as has never been known in the history of the past. Gross materialism, the placing of a higher valuation upon material things than upon spiritual ideals, produced its harvest of disaster and woe. Therefore, this morning I do not place the emphasis upon the material and temporal riches that have come to us as a nation, but rather seek to remind you of the ideals of freedom, and of righteousness, of sacrifice and of service, in the pursuit of which we have come to our present position of power and prestige, and which are still the beacons of progress for the American people.

It is a mistake for any man or people to receive temporal blessings in a narrow, selfish, self-satisfied frame of mind. The rich fool of the parable did that, and many another to-day has done likewise.

The Scriptures teach that we owe all our possessions to the favor of God. He has created them. The most of them were in the world before we came into it and will be here after we have gone. He has made it possible for us to acquire temporary possession of these things. He has endowed us with physical strength and intellectual ability and placed us where we could use these endowments to advantage. He has opened to us doors of opportunity without which we could not have succeeded. He has blessed our efforts and caused the work of our hands and our brains to prosper. In the hour of our success, when we have gathered round us our stores of wealth, He wants us to do three things: acknowledge our indebtedness to Him; enjoy with thankful hearts the blessings He has bestowed upon us, and share our prosperity with the poor and needy. He who in the spirit of the rich fool forgets God, hoards his treasure after the manner of the miser, or turns unseeing eyes and deaf ears to the misery of his fellow-men, is unworthy of God's rich and gracious gifts and will never be truly blessed in them.

II. TRUE CONCEPTIONS OF OUR TEMPORAL BLESSINGS.

It is not necessary for me to say much upon this phase of our subject. In calling your attention to some of the mistaken conceptions I have already pointed out the truth. Though our temporal blessings are not the chief thing for which to thank God this morning, they are nevertheless to be clearly recognized, and, further, they are to be regarded as a sacred trust. We hear much in these days upon the subject of stewardship. It deserves continuous emphasis among Christian people. The Bible teaches us that God places in our hands our magnificent heritage of material wealth, intellectual culture and spiritual ideals, to be kept and used for His glory and according to His will. In the parable of The Talents, the wicked servant who was punished and whose one talent was taken from him, did not presume to look upon that talent as his own, as many men regard their temporal possessions to-day. He merely neglected to make good use of that which his Lord had entrusted to his keeping, and was punished in consequence. He was a steward and had failed in his stewardship. The bounteous gifts that we have received in our individual lives and in our national existence should awaken within us a sense of our responsibility to God and our obligation to use these evidences of His loving favor according to His own holy will.

I rejoice that in our own land there has been a widespread demonstration of the spirit of stewardship during the past few years. The appeals of the Red Cross and similar organizations of mercy, the cries of distress from the nations stricken by famine, pestilence and the cruel aftermath of the World War, as well as the urgent calls of the Church for enlarged gifts toward the program of world evangelization, have found quick, cheerful and generous responses on the part of all our citizenship. The spectacle of a war-weary world, groaning beneath its burden of human suffering and the crushing weight of military and naval armaments, has challenged the best statesmanship of the world and led to sincere and earnest efforts on the part of our nation's leaders to use the prestige and power of the United States Government for the amelioration of existing conditions and the inauguration of a new era in which peace and good-will shall take the place of greed and hate, and in which the lofty ideals of Jesus Christ shall rule the world. Let us rejoice in all God's gifts to us personally and nationally, and ever use these things for His glory. Then shall His blessing continue to abide upon us and His kingdom extend to the hearts of all men. Amen.

Europe's Need—America's Opportunity

By Nathan Soderblom

Archbishop of Upsala, Sweden

[This most interesting address was delivered before the Congress of the World Alliance for International Friendship, held in Philadelphia, November 13, 14 and 15. It attracted great attention and the paragraphs referring to the "baby" which the United States gave to Europe went through the press of the country.]

ALTHOUGH discovered anew and described anew every month by a thousand explorers from Europe, and although being, through recent origin and steady influx, in its dominating blood and principles and traditions, European, America and the American mind seem to me to be to-day a secret and a wonder to Europe. It is no unusual thing that children grow much bigger and stronger and happier than their parents.

The elderly Swedish student who is asked to speak to you to-day was invited in 1890 to attend a student meeting in New England, where he made life-friends, such as John Mott, A. A. Stagg and Wilfred Monod, and where he was deeply impressed both by the fundamental thoroughness of American hospitality, and by American religion in its most moving freshness in those heroes of revivalism, Dwight L. Moody and Ira D. Sankey. Since those memorable summer days I have had a definite idea of the United States' unique mission in history and of the might of the faithful Christian will of America, which is, humanly speaking, alone capable of giving our torn civilization the strong lift it needs to-day.

A friend who wrote a book on your nation in the making called the book "Dynamis," the Greek word for strength. Here we experience strength in prodigious things already accomplished, but you have a still more powerful impression of strength in the feeling that it is by no means exhausted from what it has done. It suggests to you that it is able to accomplish much more. One had that feeling here, you can imagine, when he felt the heart of this enormous organism beating.

One is aware of the huge possibilities of your new world. Strength of will and character needs a material for its manifestation; in the empty or emptied room every movement is paralyzed. Here you feel air under the wings, if you have any.

You are the country of plenteousness, of abundance, of liberality, of a loyal, sometimes lavish, generosity. You have plenty of food. You cannot imagine the starvation in some parts of Europe. What you leave on your plates at each meal would be sufficient to feed one of the starving nations of Europe. There are millions of innocent children who scarcely know what milk is. There are men with glorious names in the history of research and humble servants of society, priests and deaconesses and laborers who never, or very, very rarely, see such luxuries as butter, cheese, milk or meat. Some groups of the population in Central Europe earn much money and spend much money. But those who chiefly bear up the intellectual and ethical ideals of a nation live under hardships that no one can imagine who has not seen them. Such people do not exhibit themselves. They hide their misery. Priests and professors take on hard manual labor in order to get food for their families and in order to be able to carry on their spiritual vocation in the hours left them. But not all have the physical strength. It is no uncommon thing that a member of the highly educated class is found in his bed dead from starvation. He saved for his old age. But there to save is to waste, because money loses its value. When everything was sold he hid himself and his emaciated body from human eye.

And there are many, many students at the universities of Austria, Germany and Russia who never eat but a single meal a day, and then a meal that you in this country, and we in Sweden, certainly would not call food for a human being. Still they are working hard, some of them with wonderful pluck.

We in Europe are close to this misery. And our neutral peoples cannot see such misery without helping, yea, without making real sacrifices. The last years have meant for my country a serious economic crisis, with unemployment and bankruptcy. But nevertheless relief work has been continued. And, as ever in real charity, the small people, not the millionaires, are the ones who accomplish the most. Since the Armistice, Sweden has contributed more than ten million dollars for relief work in Russia and other parts of Eastern Europe, in Central Europe and Belgium and France. And the other small neutral countries in Europe have made analogous sacrifices. You must remember that such a sum constitutes in reality more than twenty million dollars from your standpoint. Because you are the favored part of humanity at present in that respect also, you are handicapping us with the value of your money. Sweden has the most expensive money in our civilization to-day. But you get for one dollar in Sweden more than for two dollars in the United States. And you earn two dollars in the United States more easily than one dollar in Sweden.

For a European who has, during the past seven weeks, been spoiled by magnificent hospitality in your country, it has been, therefore, a great comfort to read and hear how President Coolidge intends to continue the great Samaritan work of America for the starving people in Europe. Such generosity already accomplished or still at work and continued heals wounds and augments the moral trust of our menaced civilization.

I read the other day in an English paper what Signor Guglielmo Ferrero, the great Italian historian, has written:

There has never been so much money in the world, and the world has never felt so miserable. The goods of this world have never been so capriciously divided for the torment of rich and poor alike, for the unfortunate and fortunate. There are at the same time nations choked with abundance, and others dying of hunger. On the one side there are men despairing at their incapacity to buy, and, on the other, those who despair at being unable to sell. The price of corn has gone down, and famine is ravaging Russia.

Yes, indeed, if Europe had peace and was allowed to work for normal conditions, it would be necessary to put on the menus on the dining cars, "Eat more wheat." Ferrero continues:

Not only the yellow races, but even the black people demand to be recognized and treated like the sons of God, and to be put on equality with the other members of the human family. All nations and classes appeal to Right and Justice, as if they all spoke the same language, but no one understands the others. . . .

Just now Europe is very like an inflamed appendix of big Asia. Enormous microbes ravage it. Desperate hearts ask, Will an operation be necessary?

Do you remember another small organism in history which never came to any harmony, but which developed, in its different individual entities—towns and states—a brilliancy of human intellectuality, beauty and culture which has never been equalled? I mean Greece of antiquity. Dreams of peaceful settlements were never realized.

One of those Greek states, Macedonia, became, by and by, world-embracing, very much like the British Empire, if we carry the comparison so far. And further, we might in the same way compare Sparta with Berlin, and Athens with Paris. Sparta and Athens never became reliable friends; we hope that Paris-Athens and Berlin-Sparta will be wiser.

But pious emigrants and bold adventurers went westward and founded in Rome a new commonwealth of their own, which knew later, it is true, an old indigenous culture, the Etruscan one, just as European emigrants and conquerors came into contact with old autochthonous civilizations in Central and South America. But as a whole Rome was, for a long time, a kind of colony of Greek civilization before acquiring a power that at the end even controlled the glorious seats of ancient Greek splendor. Has not the Rome of antiquity its analogy in your United States in our present epoch? The sense of law and order, the development of the art of ruling and other qualities invite comparison.

If I take only the contribution given to this nation in the making by my own people, I find Swedish yeomen, of our best nobility, leaving their sometimes wealthy homesteads for no other reason than the old, wistful, Viking mood, that wants to see what is beyond and perhaps the dream of a fresh Canaan for their piety; and I find poor men seeking greater possibilities, and I see lots of adventurers who had little to lose and much to gain.

History never repeats itself exactly, and I do not at all like to prophesy the future. We are always tempted to make too sweeping inferences from facts that overcome us suddenly and cover the horizon.

Harald Hjarne, the late great Swedish historian, in Upsala, foretold, in an article written in 1902 not only the supremacy of the United States, but even the role of your Union in the World War and in peace. He wrote: "America is a rejuvenated Europe, which, with its united force, pushes our old divided continent into the shade."

I think there is a very general sentiment in all Europe that America is part of the same civilization, and that America has proved its solidarity in many ways, especially by participating in the last war. Only short sight can cut off the stem on which one has come into existence. With splendid, frank readiness your young men went into the war because of idealistic motives. The same idealism is obvious in the urgency with which Christian opinion in this country pleads solidarity in the actual complicated hardships of our western world, as too profound for you to withdraw yourselves from the subsequent crisis of western civilization. Will it be possible for this great continent to put the last ten years of its history into parenthesis? "The Atlantic has shrunk! It is not longer such a vast ocean as it used to be."

I find that when you go still farther west than San Francisco, you say that you come to the East, to the Orient. I have been comforted by hearing that you thus include yourselves in our common European civilization and do not wholly and piously despise our wicked, sinful old Europe.

In 1887 I heard in the Aula, the auditorium of the University of Upsala, the great Norwegian writer, Bjornstjerne Bjornson, say: "If Europe continues with wars (by the way, Sweden has had no war since Russia, in the midst of peace, went into Finland one hundred and fifteen years ago and took it), they will telephone from America, 'Keep still, down there in the nursery!" He might rather have said, "Keep order, please in 'the old folks' home'!" Since that time the United States have had too many wars themselves for such a message. Nothing is more dangerous for a great and bold conception than to be hampered at its very start by weakness or any other kind of shallowness. America graciously gave to the European world, in the peace of Versailles, the League of Nations. Shall I say that it was a gracious gift? Is it not truer to say that it was a "cadeau" urged upon somewhat reluctant recipients? Many of us in Europe hailed it, though, as the dawn of a new day. It seems to us that such a gift implies a certain responsibility on the part of the giver. Through its withdrawal from the society it has itself founded the generous giver has risked the future of the great idea itself. The last years have corroborated such a view in a way disastrous to mankind. It is not the fault of the idea itself, that the League of Nations is too weak to-day. It ought to have been stronger.

Lord Robert Cecil, the noble statesman, who more than anybody else incarnates the idea of the League of Nations, said, in the words of the man in the Gospel: "I believe, help my unbelief." No Christian believer can abandon the hope for a better and higher international policy than the actual one. But for such a goal the big, hearty, good, strong will of America is urgently needed. In one form or another, such a co-operation will be able to give to western civilization a somewhat safer future.

Before the war I saw in the "Simplicissimus" a cartoon representing two farmers, one French, one German, laboring in the sweat of their brow, in the ground on each side of a river. They looked rather exhausted, each carrying on his back a soldier in his whole warrior's array—a heavy burden, indeed. Suddenly one of the farmers asks the other, "Why do we carry these two on our backs; is not our work heavy enough without them?" The other answers, "People say that if we get rid of them, we two, you and I, shall kill each other."

The calamity happened in spite of that costly preventive machinery. The calamity was not ended by peace. I was struck last year by a sentence in St. Augustine's "De Civitate Dei" "Pax cum bello de crudelitate certavit ac vicit." Seeing the unrest and ravage and curse of so-called peace, we must not forget any who labored that bloodshed might cease.

Last year, an American, a professor of political economy, told us at the International Church meeting of the World Alliance in Copenhagen, that there are to-day in our western world about one million soldiers more than before the war, although the powers are disarmed.

Bayonets may be necessary in this wicked world and useful at some turns of history, but Lasalle, the labor leader, said to Bismarck: "Bayonets may be good for many things, but you cannot be seated on them."

The safety of the world must be founded on sincerity and confidence, not on arms. Am I right when I experience here in this New World a greater, more generous trust both in the individual man, in other peoples and in the future of mankind than is to be found generally in the Old World, to which I belong with all my heart?

It is no exaggeration to state that of all the political conferences held after the war the only one which inspired some hope to mankind and to the Christians, who believe in the brotherhood of nations as well as of individuals, was the Washington Conference. The world needs more initiative of that kind.

Nationalism has proved to be too much of a heathen. The Church of God has here a heavy responsibility. It has not as a whole carried nationalism to the baptismal font, although there have been many magnificent efforts made by individual Christians and by groups of Christians.

I am no cosmopolitist. I believe in concrete and blood-rich life, not in pale abstractions. I think that every nation, being a person, a servant, a necessary participant in God's plan with the world, has to keep faithful to its own soul. Mankind thus becomes richer. But patriotism must become baptized. It must not imply the presumed right and duty of a nation to do any harm to others for the benefit of narrow-minded and mistaken selfish interests, as President Butler said in his searching speech the other day. Christianized patriotism means that. Feeling, as did Christ and St. Paul, the most intimate solidarity with my nation, I put before it the highest ideals that can be cherished by any nation on earth. Searching prophets, whose truths were disagreeable to their nation while it was drunk with nationalism, and who, perhaps, suffered opposition, yea, persecution, constitute by and by the honor and the glory of their nations.

Have you heard about an accident which happened some years ago in Europe? Usually your papers give plenty of space to accidents. A child was born, a child with prodigious possibilities and a great soul. But it was a cripple child even at birth, and it was repudiated by its own father. The mother is left alone with the sick child, which she never really wanted. Whose duty is it to take care of a cripple child? Its father's, I should think. But, alas, it is no uncommon thing that a father denies paternity.

The name of that child is the League of Nations. Who is the father? The answer is obvious. The father of that child is the United States of America. But the father turns a deaf ear to the crying infant. Europe, the poor mother, is left alone with the child.

Now the question is urgent. There are only two alternatives. Shall that child be left to die and make room for another stronger child with the same prodigious calling? Or will the father recognize his duties and help to bring up the child?

Here in this country I have found that some of the best men of your nation—best, also, because they are thoroughly American to the very core of their being, not in any way half-hearted—among such men who approach nearest, as far as I can see, the American ideal, I have found the most convinced and solid champions of America's solidarity with Europe.

Here the question is needed, Do you believe in the federalist principle, in a super-state in one form or another, in a wider, organized federation for peace? Or do you share the views of those who, one hundred and more years ago, found it absurd and unpatriotic to say that Virginia and Massachusetts should belong to the same union? Your momentous commonwealth of states constitutes the greatest application in history of the federalist principle. And nothing grander has been achieved in the domain of politics, during several centuries, for the sacred cause of peace, than this Union of States. Why should not the federalist principle be applied in one form or another to a larger part of humanity? Guglielmo Ferrero sees in the United States of Europe the only salvation of our doomed, or at least thunder-riven, old European world. And he sees that America has its hour as never before in history. Here the Church of Christ is concerned. Because the Bible is the document on real peace and on world peace. The Bible teaches peace through right and law, instead of war. Many of us in Europe have praised God during the last few years for the admirable efforts made by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to promote the entrance of the United States into the League of Nations.

Here the task of the Church comes in. A commonwealth of nations, to be realized in the improvement and growth of the actual League of Nations or in new shape, must have a Christian soul. Without a soul, without a generous inspiration in the hearts of the nations in it—in spite of all cleverness—a dead body, a machine. And if it does not get a Christian soul, it easily becomes a devil.

We witness in some quarters of Europe a spiritual renewal, a keen sense of the craving for the Master, a resolute, yea, heroic following of the Master, in material poverty and in mental richness worthy of the Gospel. And those who go deep into the secret of a Christ-like life beneath the surface of worldliness and private or collective selfishness feel keener than others the folly of our divisions, of the lack of organization and common action in evangelic Christendom. We must have clear and common principles as to the application of the Christian spirit to international and national life.

No one has better defined our scope on international life than your late lamented President Harding on his western trip while stopping at Colorado Springs: "I tell you, my countrymen, the world needs more of the Christ, the world needs more of the Man of Nazareth, and if we could bring into the relationships of humanity, among ourselves and among the nations of the world the brotherhood that was taught by the Christ we would have a restored world, we would have little or none of war, and would have a new hope for humanity throughout the earth."

And your President Coolidge, lately in Washington speaking on national life, said: "But certainly it has a need of a greater practical application of the truths of religion. It is only in that direction that there is hope of solution of our economic and social problems."

It is no chance that such words are spoken by these men and by earlier Presidents of the United States. It is characteristic of the role played by religion in this country and of its wonderful destiny in the world.

Need I emphasize those points where much is lacking in our international and national life. In my recent book on Christian Fellowship I have tried to elucidate the whole historic and practical problem of a united hope and work of Christendom.

1. The brotherhood of nations has not as yet its due place in the teachings of the Church. The Church should not only teach and preach against private selfishness, but even against collective selfishness, nationalism, in catechism and school. Jesus, in His little story, lets a Samaritan be the only helping man, a Samaritan who was despised and hated by the Israelites. In the same way would Jesus have said in Paris, that the French député and the French lady passed by, but a German workman helped the Frenchman in distress. Likewise, German children should be taught that first came a German professor and he passed by, and then came a priest and he passed by, and likewise a business man, but then came a French officer, and he helped the robbed and sick Teuton. In Sweden, Jesus might have taken a Russian illustration, and here in this country, a black man or a Japanese.

There is a good way of learning to know a foreign country. When you come to a foreign country read the text-books on history in its schools. You will find the same event described and the same man judged in quite different ways in different countries. Is not truth everywhere the same? We ought everywhere to use text-books that teach the truth, and nothing else.

But take the actual text-books after the war. I dare not tell you the horrors that I have seen. But I have also seen honest efforts to be truthful and to kill in the hearts of children thoughts of revenge and to sow the seed for a better future, for a real peace.

We have already begun that comparative study. And the world will be able to see, and judge, what children are taught in different countries. Because this is a matter which concerns mankind. Poison must not be allowed to spread freely.

2. The Church must recognize its task and its duties also in the sphere of economic and social life. At present reigns a chaos in that respect in the Church. One priest says, "A true Christian must be a socialist." And another says, "A Christian must oppose socialism, because private property is necessary for the development of character and responsibility." A third says, "The Church has nothing to do whatever with economics." Of course that is all wrong. Christ himself talked and taught much about Mammon. The Church cannot commit herself to an economic theory. But Christendom must get a common vision on those things—a common voice for its conscience and a common hand for its action in national and in international life.

I could mention other problems. Religious minorities are oppressed in several places. Our World Alliance is doing a splendid work. But more is needed. Starvation and privation ravage large parts of our civilization. Splendid relief work has been done. But more is needed, joint action is needed.

Nearly sixteen hundred years ago, in Nicea, was held the Council on Dogmatics. It formulated a creed for the whole future of the Church. Now we need a Nicea on ethics, on life and work.

The recent election in New York indicates a good deal of dissatisfaction with the State Assembly for repealing the Mullan-Gage Law, the State enforcement code of the Eighteenth Amendment. An independent woman running as a "dry" in New York City itself, with no party affiliation, received eleven hundred votes. Everyone who voted for her had to write her name in, instead of merely making a mark. That is one straw. The up-State Assemblyman whose vote decided the repeal of the Mullan-Gage Law lost fifteen hundred of his plurality, although generally the Republican vote in his county increased. There were other like facts. The people of this country generally want prohibition.

Charles Catlett, of Staunton, Virginia, at a recent district Rotary Conference, told of a young lawyer who had negotiated a contract of which he was rather proud. He took it to an old and wise counselor for his examination, expecting his commendation. To his surprise, the old man as he read it slowly shook his head. "That's a great contract, John. It is most skillfully drawn," he remarked, as he handed it back. "But, John, you have forgotten the other fellow. No contract is sound which neglects the rights or the equities of any party to it." The Golden Rule is good law as well as good economics.

The three thousand women students of the University of Wisconsin have voted unanimously at a recent meeting in disapproval of drinking and in behalf of an appeal to the Government to enforce the liquor law in the city of Madison. The young women did not adopt a motion against associating with any men who drink. "How can we tell whether they do or not?" they asked. But the women can let the men know that they think drinking is cheap and bad form.

The Problem of Turkey

By Rev. James L. Barton, D.D.

Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions

IN TWO PARTS.—PART I.

[This statement was written by Dr. Barton, following many conversations and conferences that he has held throughout America since the first Lausanne Conference. It is an official expression of the views of the Congregational Mission Boards.]

THE last ten years span a series of tragedies in the Near East unparalleled in modern history. This covers the period of the Great War, of which five battle fronts were in Turkey. Nearly every part of Turkey at one time or another was an area of conflict or was a base for preparation. Amid the horrors of war there ran the tragedy of the deportations of Armenians and Greeks. Mission work in all departments was interfered with, while many missionaries gave themselves to an attempt to salvage the shattered remnant of the stricken peoples. Mission buildings were requisitioned by the Turkish military, while others were used for orphans and helpless refugees. When the war ended, mission properties taken for military purposes were returned, but conditions were too confused in nearly all parts of the country to permit the missionaries to resume normal operations.

After the Smyrna tragedy and when Constantinople had been saved from a similar fate, hope centered in the conference called at Lausanne to establish peace between Greece and Turkey, and to settle the status of the Near East. The resulting treaty, as signed, is very far from what the world had hoped. The Greeks are to be expelled from the country, except from Constantinople, while the Turks are left in supreme control, with most of the former restraints, embodied in treaties and capitulations, removed.

As a result, Armenian and Greek pupils of mission schools throughout the country outside of Constantinople have departed. As these constituted the bulk of students in all schools, and in some were the only students, the entire character of all educational work has met with a startling change.

The mission churches throughout Turkey were, with few exceptions, composed of Armenian and Greek members. These have all fled the country except those in Constantinople, and many of the church buildings have been ruined. In a word, the people among whom and for whom the missionaries had been chiefly working for the last century have left Turkey under compulsion, including the membership of the Protestant churches and the pupils in the mission schools. So heavy has been the blow, and so staggering the result, that the statement has been made that the work of a century has been destroyed, and one hears the question raised as to whether any attempt should be made to continue missionary work in Turkey. But let us not confuse disaster with destruction.

There is a deep-seated conviction, I believe, among the constituency and friends of the Board, as well as among those who have contributed liberally for the care of orphans and refugees, that these peoples must not now be abandoned by the American board and its missionaries. While it is impossible to continue systematic missionary work among a moving refugee population, the missionaries have followed them as they were able into Syria, the Transcaucasus and Greece with a considerable body of native preachers and teachers, and are doing what they can to comfort and to aid.

In the instructions given to the first missionaries appointed by the American Board to Turkey, the following commission was given:

"The two grand inquiries ever present in your minds will be, 'What good can be done? And by what means?' What can be done for the Jews? What for the pagans? What for the Mohammedans? What for the Christians?"

This shows that the original purpose of the Board in entering Turkey was to reach all the peoples, races, and religions in the country, and that has been the policy consistently followed since. While the more responsive and alert Christian races have commanded the chief attention of the Board and its missions, there has been no abandonment of the original purpose to secure an approach to the Mohammedans, as the reports from Turkey will show, especially in the earlier and in the later periods of missionary work there.

The persistent and deadly persecution of all Turks who turned towards Christianity, and the eagerness of the Armenians to patronize the schools and their readiness to accept evangelical ideas, led the missionaries to move along the lines of least resistance and to devote themselves to building up among the Armenians, and to a far less degree among the Greeks, a strong, educated, evangelical community. The responsiveness of the Armenians, and their liberality in supporting their own institutions of education and religion, made the work most attractive and rewarding. These conditions have given the false impression to many that the mission of the American Board in Turkey was to the Armenians alone.

At the same time, while no missionaries have been appointed to the Kurds, who dwell in large numbers in the eastern and central part of Turkey, their language has been studied and the New Testament has been translated into it. The American Board and its missionaries have always maintained a hope that work more directly for this interesting people might be inaugurated. Repeatedly the Kurds have urged that this be done.

After Syria had been transferred to the Presbyterian Board in 1870, there remained but a small and scattered number of Jews in the American Board's field, and as there were many societies, especially in Europe, organized exclusively for work among them, no special effort was made by our missionaries to reach that race.

These facts should be sufficient to show that from the inception of its work in Turkey the missionaries of the Board have had in mind, and as the end of their endeavors, the reaching of all the races and religions in the country. The goal has always been kept before the Armenian Protestant Church and educated Armenian leaders that one of the great missions of the Protestant Church in Turkey was to present, by precept and example, the gospel to Mohammedans. Many Armenian preachers and colporters, as opportunity has offered, have presented to them the claims of the gospel. Large numbers of Armenians have agreed, and still agree, with the missionaries in their desire and purpose to carry on Christian work among and for the persecutors of their people.

The whole gospel to all the people of Turkey has been from the first the one purpose of the American Board, its missionaries and the membership of the Protestant churches of the country.

The Turkey now in the public eye and under consideration covers all of Asia Minor from Smyrna on the west across Anatolia, to the western borders of the Russian Caucasus and Persia, and from the Black Sea on the north to the northern borders of Syria and Mesopotamia. It also includes Constantinople and Eastern Thrace, of which Adrianople is the capital. Within these boundaries there are at the present time half a million or more Greeks and Armenians, mostly in Constantinople, more than two million Kurds and Circassians, and about six million Turks. All these populations are classed as Moslems, except the Greeks and Armenians. A century ago the American Board sent its first missionaries into this country, where they began planting Christian institutions and producing a Christian literature for all the races and religions there represented. At that time there were probably from two and a half to three million Armenians, and perhaps as many Greeks.

Within that entire area the only missionary organizations now in the country and equipped to operate for its Christianization are the American Board, and the institutions growing out of the work of the Board. During the century, by common consent, the entire area outlined above has been regarded as American Board territory. It is true that prior to the war a German society opened a limited work in Van, Mezereh, and Marash; the United Presbyterians had a small work in Mersine, a port in Cilicia on the Mediterranean coast; the American Mennonites had co-operated with us for a few years in work in Hadjin, and there have been a few isolated cases of temporary missionary efforts by American and European sects in various parts of Turkey. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the entire area was generally regarded as the unique and almost exclusive field of the American Board.

The Board, recognizing its great responsibility, put special emphasis upon its Turkey missions. The large cities and centers of population were occupied by missionaries and native workers, and missionary institutions—churches, hospitals, dispensaries, and schools of all grades—were planted and sustained. For a generation and more, approximately one-third of the American Board missionaries were located in the four Turkey missions, which up to 1912 included the Balkan States. The number of trained native leaders at the head of the churches and other Christian enterprises were in about the same proportion.

There gradually emerged, as the direct result of this missionary work, great Christian educational institutions, some of them now independent, such as Robert College, the University of Beirut, Euphrates, Anatolia, Central Turkey, International, Sivas, Marash, Constantinople and Van Colleges, and St. Paul's Institute at Tarsus. These institutions were open to students of all races and religions.

Because of the thoroughness of occupation by the Board and by these various institutions, other missionary societies turned their attention to other countries and entrusted to the American Board the responsibility of Christianizing the varied and mixed populations of the entire country. In a word, the American Board seemed to hold a mandate from the foreign missionary societies of the world to provide for the people of Turkey an adequate opportunity to know Jesus Christ, and to become His followers. The training of leaders, the organization of necessary institutions, and the maintenance of all forms of missionary operations in the country thus became an emphasized responsibility, since, if we did not do what ought to be done, no one else would step in to help out. Turkey became our sole responsibility when Syria, Palestine and Mesopotamia passed out of Turkish control. Every Board in America and Europe is taxed to the limit of its capacity, and beyond, to keep up its regular and expanding work in other parts of the world, and none stands ready to take new responsibilities in Turkey. The sole responsibility for keeping Christian work and Christian institutions alive in Turkey to-day rests upon the American Board, and the institutions it has been instrumental in planting in that country.

We have a large force of experienced missionaries now on the ground, with a knowledge of the Turkish language, competent and ready to prosecute the work. These include business men, doctors, teachers, writers, both men and women, and ordained men, now occupying Constantinople, Smyrna, Brousa, Marsovan, Talas, Tarsus, Adana, Marash, Aintab, with others ready to go back into the interior as soon as the Government gives the necessary permission. There are missionaries in the Russian Caucasus who will be able to go into Turkey if the Soviet Government denies them permission to continue work among the Armenians there.

The American Board plants, such as missionary residences, school buildings, hospitals, dispensaries, etc., are practically intact. The exceptions are the station at Van, which in the early stages of the war was completely destroyed; the school building and teachers' residence at Hadjin, which were burned when the city was wiped out; and the Collegiate Institute for Girls at Smyrna, which was burned when the Christian quarters of that city were laid in ruin last September. While in many places, because of lack of repairs and adequate care, there has been a deterioration in values, the fact remains that the mission plants, with the above exceptions, are either now occupied or are ready for occupation. None of the properties of the American Board have been taken permanently by the Turkish Government. This is also true of the various independent colleges and institutions.

For the American Board to continue its work in Turkey will require the opening of no new stations, nor the erection of new buildings, but simply the continuation of work in places it now owns. It will mean going on as before, but with a changed or partially changed constituency. It is evident that to continue work in Turkey will not involve large or extraordinary expense. It will mean that missionaries now supported by the Board must adapt themselves to the new conditions which confront them in the old stations. Some former expenditures will be diminished, while others will be increased, such as the engagement of missionaries in operations which under the old order were performed by Armenian and Greek associates. The income of schools, for a time at least, will greatly fall off because of the smaller number of pupils. There will necessarily be a marked change in the character of the work done, but undoubtedly the training of able native assistants will present a paramount claim upon the time and strength of the missionaries, together with the creation and production of an adequate educational and Christian literature in the Turkish language.

All this calls for no ostentatious announcements or spectacular demonstrations, but merely the quiet continuation in some of the old places by the former missionaries, re-enforced, from time to time, by new appointees, of a work begun long ago and going on in spite of the changes in populations. The American Board has as an asset of supreme value the experience of a hundred years. It has seasoned missionaries already at the task. It has a home constituency who know Turkey and have studied its problems, prayed for and supported its work and honored and loved its missionaries for generations. The very presence of the latter in Turkey now is a token and evidence of the faith and sacrifice of the Congregational churches of America for the last half century. The hundreds of missionary graves, stretching across the country and consecrating every mission station, proclaim a missionary daring and purpose that is an inheritance of priceless value to our generation.

It Is Finished

By Rev. Charles Edward Macartney, D.D

Minister of the Arch Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia

[Dr. Macartney's name has become familiar as the conservative leader of the Philadelphia Presbytery. He is a man in the prime of life, a vigorous preacher with a fine family background, as his reminiscences in this article attest. Dr. Macartney has just accepted a call to the great pulpit of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., the church of the Presidents—when the President happens to be a Presbyterian.]

THIS will be my last Sabbath in the old home. Years ago I used to try to imagine what it would be like, when father and mother were gone to their long home, the children scattered far abroad and living in homes of their own, and the homestead fallen into the hands of aliens from its rich memories. Now, what then was only in a dreamy, vague-like way foreseen, has come to pass. The final Sabbath has dawned. I say "Sabbath" because this was a religious home, and Sabbath fits it more than Sunday. The home has been consecrated by the prayers of religious parents, and almost every window opened towards Jerusalem.

Strange, is it not, how brick, stone, timber, things made with hands, as well as growing and living things, take hold upon one's life and seem to become a part of it. Yet so it is, and even in its semi-swept-and-garnished state, the house is redolent with memories and every room and window and door has some story to tell. This house has known life's winter and summer, its seed-time and harvest, its "each perplexing path." It has been decorated with orange blossoms and with the ensign of death. Children's feet have raced over its floors, and aged weary feet have gone slowly through its halls. Its history is a cross-section from life. Sorrow, affliction, sickness, death, anxiety and perplexity this home has known; but the darkest shadow, the shadows of dishonor and disgrace, thank God, it has never known. Now that the book is closing, there is no chapter that we dare not open.

I was an infant when our family moved into what was then a new home. The denominational college in which my father taught science had moved to this place from the little hamlet in western Ohio, where we were all born in a pretty cottage on the brow of the only hill in the village. The site was chosen by my father for the sake of mother, whom he had brought as a bride from Scotland, and whose heart pined for the lochs and hills of her native Bute. It must have been a big adventure for the family, that trek, not westward, but eastward. On the summit of a high hill overlooking the valley through which flowed the river stood the new college building, built of the rock taken from the hillside. About the college clustered a few houses of the professors, of which ours was the most pretentious and the most picturesque in its location. It stood on the cliff overlooking the river, with deep woods to the east and a pleasant meadow to the north. Here we came, a family of seven, with two maids, "Alabama" Mary and Henrietta, and a salary of nine hundred dollars a year!

About by earliest recollection is that of seeing my father, then a man in the early fifties, with the two older brothers, running towards the college, books under their arms, as the great bell in the tower rang for the chapel exercises. For more than forty years now that bell has rung out its call to the young men and young women to go up the hill of high thinking. All the early faculty who built the college and placed the bell in its tower are now gone; the generations of students have come and listened to its vibrant, earnest voice for four years, and then carried its music with them into the world; missionaries, ministers, doctors, lawyers, judges, teachers, a goodly company have gone out into all parts of the earth, and with them the music of that bell. "There is no speech nor language where its voice is not heard." Yet still the bell rings every morning at eight o'clock, its deep, solemn, insistent tones seeming to speak of those great duties which must be performed and those high enterprises of the human spirit which must be pushed forward no matter who falls out of the ranks.

To the children one of the glories of this house was the great attic, with four immense rooms and deep and dark recesses which the youngest dare not explore. It was our gymnasium, athletic field, and library. In one room were the overflow books from my father's library. In dismantling the house my brother and I went recently over all these books, throwing most of them away, but a few we kept for the sake of that bright yesterday. Many of them were text books in science, out of date even when the college came from Ohio. This part of the house spoke more of my father than any other, not excepting his own study. We came upon a bag of stones, some geological collection he had made. Startling, almost alarming, to realize how a bag of rocks would thus long survive the hands which collected them and the brain which catalogued them.

Among these attic books was that book which made the deepest impression upon my childish mind—and on the minds of thousands of other children throughout the world—Fox's "Book of Martyrs." How I devoured those terrible pages! I can see the old illustrations now as I write, the piles of blazing faggots, the naked men being dragged at the horse's heels, the cauldrons of pitch or boiling water and the trembling wretches about to be cast into them, the struggling martyrs on the edge of the precipice, about to be hurled head long, and most dreadful of all in its horror, the man being buried alive, with the agony of beseechment and appeal on his face. They talk much to-day about church unity, especially a unity between Romanists and Protestants. But the obstacles are greater than some easy writers suppose. They are the difficulties rising out of the heart and conscience of men and women, or the descendants of men and women, who read in childhood the pages of Fox's "Book of Martyrs."

In another part of the attic were the old copies of "The Youth's Companion." Long hours of a rainy day have I lain flat on the floor reading the tales of Indian fights and massacres, storms at sea, adventures with wild animals, and about the rustic youth who came from the hamlet to the city and was soon sucked down by its cruel undertow of unrighteousness. The old square cradle which rocked us all to sleep is still in the attic, empty, pathetic, as if asking for another child to rock and soothe. The vast spaces of the attic were also the practising ground for the older brothers when they were preparing for debates or orations at the college. Then one of my brothers became a minister, and to this day I can hear him walking to and fro, in solemn undertone repeating his sermon, in which there was a description of an unhappy wretch being swept over Niagara. This must have made a great impression upon the minds of his three younger brothers, for they all followed him into the Presbyterian ministry.

Our young hearts were light in those days, as young hearts generally are, but a reading of the old letters and old diaries shows that father and mother had their days of deep concern and their nights of anxious care. Yet if we had had that sufficiency for which they must have longed at times the history of our family would have been far different, perhaps less creditable. One of Aaron Burr's uncles speaks of Burr when he was a child being under a "maple sugar government." We had maple sugar now and then, indeed, tapped a tree or two ourselves, but no maple sugar government. My father was a grave, reserved man, somewhat apart from the tides of life, but ever kind to his children. When we were ill or fretful he used to carry us in his arms up and down the long hallway leading from his study to the head of the stairs, singing for us an old Scottish ballad, "All the blue bonnets are over the border." And after supper on a winter's night we were in the seventh heaven of delight when, with tables and chairs pushed into a corner, father let us tie the bandage about his eyes and the grand game of Blind Man's Buff was on. These were the gleams of soft light in his reserved, calm, silent nature. He was a preacher as well as a teacher, one of those preacher-teachers to whom religion and education owe so much in this country, and in the pulpit he made a fine appearance, with his hand thrust into the breast of his Prince Albert, his splendid head, deep-set blue eyes, and gray beard. He lived to be four-score and two, and saw his children's children upon his knees. I sat by his side when his soul quit the body just as the evening bell at the college was commencing to ring, a fitting requiem for him, here, and no doubt all the trumpets sounding for him on the other side.

Our mother was ten years his junior, of strong mind and great affection and untiring energy. Well educated in Europe, she frequently took my father's classes at the college when he was absent. Her translation from a home of luxury and beauty in Scotland to rather primitive conditions in this country, with never at any time many who were of her world socially or intellectually, must have been trying for her; indeed, from her diaries I now know the struggles through which she passed. But her magnificent courage and her great faith carried her through triumphantly. Although faith always was victorious, she had her deep questions and moments of darkness. This made her earnest in prayer, prayer for herself and prayer for her children. "She fought her doubts and gathered strength," strength for herself and for her children. I used to wonder when I came in from play on the hillside, or from school, and saw her on her knees in the drawing room, for she had a set time and a set place. But now I understand. When she lay quiet and calm and still and silent in the sitting room it fell to me to stand just outside the room where she had prayed for us and speak in faltering accents the gratitude of her children and how her sons rise up and call her blessed.

This evening I walked by myself out to the ravine and then up the steep hill on the top of which father and mother lie buried. On the face of the great stone over their grave are cut the words of St. Paul, often quoted by my father in his public prayers, "Who shall separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus?" On the other side of the stone there is cut out a seat, and on this seat I sat down to rest, and to think, and to pray. Before me there was spread out the whole panorama of the theater of their labors and care and hope and ambitions. Far in the distance was the tower of the college they had helped to build. Firm, unshaken, imperturbable stood the gray old building, looming up through the evening shadows, a fit symbol of the things which cannot be shaken. And near the college the house which they built, and where they died, and where they taught their children to fear God and love their fellow man. Now the builders are dust beneath this granite stone! Yet their work abides, yea, and shall abide. Half-way down the hill was the country road along which, with the high carriage and the gray horse and the black dog, we had driven on many a happy day, and just where the road emerged from the culvert under the railroad the little brook that came down through a lovely glen which made my mother think of Scotland, and where we often went on a Saturday afternoon picnic. Far to the right was the red brick school house where we had our first schooling, and where mother used to pick us up on an autumn afternoon and drive us into the country. At the foot of the mountain was the river, with the sweeping, beautiful bend around which we used to row the boat, still flowing swiftly and silently away, like the river of a man's life. Sitting there over the dust of my parents I lived it all over again. Finished for this world at least were all their cares, struggles and anxious economies; concluded were all their sacrifices of love and prayer for their children. It is finished! Yes, well finished. Dear father and mother, bowing here by your grave, I give thanks to God for such parents. For all your labors, for all your kisses and caresses, for all your tears and sighs, for all your solemn counsels and earnest prayers, for your high example of clean hands and a pure heart take now the gratitude of your youngest child. And if in that world into which you have entered it is permitted to the inhabitants to remember their friends upon earth and to make intercession for them, then, dear father, dear mother, pray for thy children, that they may keep the narrow way that leads at length to Everlasting Life and Light—and, yes, sitting even on the grave stone will I believe it and rejoice in it, unto thee.

Church Union in Australia

By Edward S. Kiek

Parkin College, Adelaide

FOR many years the Methodist, Congregational and Presbyterian churches in Australia have been considering action with a view to the formation of a "United Church of Australia." If the union had been consummated, it would have resulted in a Church which would have been an exceedingly strong factor in the religious life of the Commonwealth. Many very able men have devoted their time and energy to the perfecting of the negotiations and to the task of propaganda in the churches. The basis finally evolved proved to be thoroughly connexional, and included a doctrinal schedule which was to be in substance binding on the ministers of the United Church.

The Methodists accepted the basis without much trouble. Among Congregationalists there was considerable opposition—partly from sturdy "independents" who thought the proposed basis far too connexional, partly from a "liberal" section who feared lest the twenty-one articles of the doctrinal schedule might prove a serious hindrance to liberty of theological thought. But the majority of Congregationalists, judging from the action of their representative assemblies, thought the object in view was such as to justify even the great sacrifices that were demanded. The really formidable opposition proved to be that of the Presbyterians, which is rather extraordinary in view of the fact that it was the Presbyterian Church which initiated the whole discussion. The Presbyterian opposition was largely composed of "hard-shell" people of an extremely conservative type of mind. These were critical of both the proposed polity and the proposed doctrinal schedule; the latter was bitterly attacked as not sufficiently conserving the hereditary dogmas of Scottish Calvinism. This section found strange allies among the more "liberal" Presbyterians, who gravely apprehended that in the proposed United Church they would have less freedom than they enjoy as things are. Another factor in the situation was that the standards of ordination in the Presbyterian Church have been, and to some extent still are, considerably higher from an educational point of view than those enforced by the other negotiating churches. Men who had taken a full arts course at a university, followed by three or four years of training in a first-class theological college, were not enthusiastic over admitting to equal status with themselves men who might have taken no course at all, or at best only a very brief and inadequate course. The influence of this factor must not be exaggerated, but it is fair to say that it entered in. Anyhow, when it came to a final vote the basis was thrown out in Western Australia, South Australia, and, above all, in Victoria, while in New South Wales it was only carried by a small majority in the Assembly. Hence, the whole scheme may now be regarded as dead, though it is quite likely to be revived in another form after the lapse of a few years. In view of the collapse of organic union, efforts are being made to revive the idea of interdenominational co-operation, to which all parties are theoretically committed.

Meantime, protracted negotiations have been going on between the non-episcopal churches and the Anglicans, inspired, of course, by the resolutions of the Lambeth Conference. In Australia we are not hampered by the existence of an established church, so one very difficult problem is out of the way. It must be said also that many Anglicans have shown a spirit of real keenness about the matter of reunion. They have taken the subject seriously, put their best brains into the study of it, and shown a genuine desire to understand the position and ideals of their non-episcopal brethren. No end of conferences have been held, which have had the good effect of bringing people together and promoting kindly feeling as well as mutual knowledge. But we have come to much the same impasse as in England. The Anglicans cannot drop the demand for "reordination"—or something, in high Anglican judgment, equivalent thereto—without splitting their Church from top to bottom, which they are naturally unwilling to do. On the other hand, the non-episcopal churches will not look at reordination or anything that colorably resembles it. Of course, there are possibly other and even greater difficulties in the background, but it is this difficulty that continually emerges in discussion and stops any real progress.

On Friday, June 12, an incident occurred in Adelaide which is likely still further to prejudice further negotiations between the non-episcopal churches and the Anglicans. Dr. F. B. Meyer was out here on a mission for the deepening of the spiritual life. He was doing an excellent work, and his meetings were attracting great crowds. It should be added that Dr. Meyer showed his wisdom by concentrating on his own special task and avoiding all controversy, theological or otherwise. During his visit to Adelaide it occurred to the evangelical rector of Holy Trinity Church that it would be an admirable thing to invite Dr. Meyer to preach from his pulpit. This Rev. F. Webb accordingly did, never dreaming but that his action would be approved by the Bishop of Adelaide. The Bishop (Dr. Nutter Thomas) has been apparently very keen on reunion discussions and recently created considerable annoyance among the Anglo-Catholic section of the Anglican Church by inviting a number of Free Church laymen to give occasional addresses in the cathedral at Sunday evening worship. Under these circumstances the rector of Holy Trinity naturally thought there could be no possible objection to an eminent Free Church divine occupying the pulpit of an Anglican church on a week night. Dr. Meyer promptly accepted the invitation, and the whole thing was extensively advertised. Then the Bishop stepped in with an abrupt inhibition, alleging that the time was not yet ripe for anything in the way of pulpit interchange. This plea seems rather extraordinary, not only in view of numerous precedents in England and Australia, but also in view of the precedent set by the Bishop himself. However, the worthy rector was compelled to amend his invitation, with the result that Dr. Meyer preached to a crowded assemblage in Holy Trinity schoolroom, in which unconsecrated place no harm could ensue.

Needless to say, opinion in Adelaide was very excited about the affront that had been offered to a distinguished visitor, whose venerable age, unimpeachable orthodoxy and saintly character might have been expected to insure him very different treatment. The unanimous opinion of the non-episcopal churches is being strongly reinforced by broad-minded Anglicans who have hastened to disavow and condemn the action of the Bishop. On the Sunday following the inhibition two thousand people crowded to hear Dr. Meyer in the Pirie Street Methodist Church, and as many more were reluctantly turned away. This may fairly be regarded, not only as a tribute to Dr. Meyer, but as a striking demonstration of popular feeling in regard to the controversy. The press was flooded with letters, of which the great majority were vigorously condemnatory of the action of the Bishop and dismissed with scorn the excuses made for it. Certain it is that the action of Dr. Thomas will do much to check the growth of good-will between the episcopal and the non-episcopal churches. To some of us it seems clear that between the sacerdotalist conception of Christianity and the evangelical conception there is a gulf fixed that no discussions are likely to bridge and which this incident has served to emphasize in a fashion not likely to be forgotten by the religious public of Australia.

Egypt Slipping

I HAVE not had time to study into the Egyptian situation very much; in fact, it is not possible to do so without knowing Arabic pretty well, and I do not pretend to be an Arabic student. If one relies altogether on what he finds in English, one of course gets only the British side of the question, and whatever the other side may be, the British side is always a selfish view of the question, for they are not in Egypt for the good of Egypt, but for the good of the British Empire, whatever they may have to say on the matter.

During the past eighteen months the British have been gradually withdrawing from the government posts. The first to go were the highly paid officials, who were as a rule figureheads rather than helpful servants of the country. Their places were at once filled with Egyptians. The advisers to the various ministries, who had under the supervision of the British High Commissioner been the directors rather than the advisers of the various departments of the government, were also withdrawn, and the Egyptian ministers began to exercise very largely the power which, in theory, had been theirs in years gone by. Another type of official who was sent back to England was the newer official who had not been in the country long enough to be of much value. All the above mentioned were given compensation for withdrawing, the excuse for demanding this compensation being the fact that, having come to Egypt and begun a career, they could not leave without its ruining their chance to begin an official career in some other colony.

Some of these indemnities were quite large. One official was given unified bonds the interest on which amounts to about six thousand dollars annually. Within a few weeks he had a new position in Palestine which netted him another six thousand dollars or more.

Between the two extremes—those who occupied the “soft seats” at the top and those who were still “tenderfeet”—were a number of British officials who had been rendering valuable service to the country for a considerable number of years. For many of these men it was a real hardship to have to begin life anew either in the British Isles or in another colony, while on the other hand the Egyptians, many of them, realized that they were needed still to keep the government running smoothly, so they did much to discourage their leaving.

These men, however, soon found themselves in a rather difficult situation. In the past they had had British advisers above them, and had absolute power over those who worked under them. Now they found themselves with Egyptian superiors, who were often jealous, and who were sure to have numerous friends who wanted the position occupied by the Britisher. The result was much Oriental intrigue from above, and at the same time those native officials who were under him and over whom he had in the past had absolute control, now became a source of a tremendous amount of intrigue also. Any complaint that he wished to make was taken to the highest native official, who was usually willing to intercede in his behalf when a sufficient amount of pressure was brought to bear on him.

The result was that most of this class of British officials were forced to leave the country also. There are left in the country two types of such officials, so far as I can observe, one type which is willing to meet Oriental intrigue with a sort of orientalized British intrigue and thus continue to yield a large amount of influence still, and perhaps if the natives make a mess of things, be here on the ground floor when the British come back to take charge again. The other type is the man who has enough love for the country and his work to be willing to put up with a rather unpleasant situation rather than leave.

In the meantime some departments of the government have come back entirely into native hands. The results seem to be very much what the Europeans generally predicted, namely, that efficiency has decreased very much, even in a few months' time.

The condition in the Ministry of Education is a good example. After four years of primary education the pupils must take a government examination, which, if passed, admits them to the secondary schools. After two years of secondary work another government examination is given admitting the pupils to the third year of the secondary schools. At the end of the fourth year of the secondary school a third examination is given. Pupils who pass the primary examination are also eligible for certain government posts, and likewise the two secondary examinations are civil service examinations for still higher posts.

There was a time when the British had to pay the Egyptians to go to school in order to educate enough men to do the clerical work in the government offices, but soon there came a time when the highest ambition of the Egyptian youth was to get a government post. The result was the demand for education increased very rapidly, and to-day there are far more would-be scholars than schools to accommodate them. Not only that, but there are far more scholars than government posts, so the brakes had to be applied some way. The method used was to make government examinations increasingly harder as the number of pupils increased.

In the past where a pupil failed in only one subject he was allowed, under certain conditions, to take a second examination. This summer those who failed in the higher secondary examination petitioned to be allowed to take a second examination, even if they had failed in two subjects. After considerable pressure had been brought to bear upon the Ministry this was granted. Then those who had failed in three subjects asked for a second examination, and the Ministry, rather than get the reputation of being unjust, granted this petition also. Then came a great stream of petitions, which resulted in the giving of examination in September for any who had failed, no difference how badly, in any of the three spring examinations.

The second examinations being given at about the time when school was to have opened, made it necessary to delay the opening of school until October 13th, or until the examination papers could be graded, and the lists be checked over to see who could be accepted into the various classes.

Similar weakness on the part of the government is seen in other departments. The other day an express agent in one of the government railway offices offered to weigh my baggage and then deduct about twenty per cent. from its weight if I would agree to pass over to him a few piasters. I never heard of anything like this while the British controlled the railways.

During the past few years, while they have been fighting Great Britain, the Coptic Christians and the Moslems have talked much about their being brothers, and have stated very frequently that they, after all, had one God, and that there was little essential difference, after all, in their religions. Now, however, that the natives, nine-tenths of whom are Mohammedans, are in power some of the Copts are beginning to feel that there is not absolute unity between the two sects. The report comes from Upper Egypt that the Copts and other Christians who own large estates are not able to collect their rents. The reason, of course, is that in case the Copt were to try to collect through the courts his case would be sure to come up before a Moslem judge, and the renter, especially if he were a Moslem, would win the case.

Coptic land owners and many European land owners would like to sell their estates, but there are none wishing to buy who are willing to pay cash, and of course for a Christian to sell to a Moslem and take paper of any kind as pay would be the same as making him a present of the land. The result is that land has become very cheap.

A Jewish friend remarked to me some time ago, that in their struggle for independence the Egyptians are morally right, but from a practical viewpoint they are extremely foolish, for they are not ready either morally or in their general education to begin to fully govern themselves. Morally, the British have no right here, and the average Britisher, I think, will admit it, but they feel that they have a practical excuse for staying, not that they may make Egypt a prosperous nation, nor yet that they may "hog" Egyptian trade, but that they may be able to protect the Suez Canal.

The Harding Memorial Association, composed of the old President's entire Cabinet, President Coolidge and more than a dozen other prominent citizens, has asked that people give toward the Harding Memorial Fund, especially during the week of December 9th to 16th. President Harding was sincerely interested in the Church. His sense of the necessity for men's understanding one another evidenced that he had considerable of the Christian vision. It is interesting, also, to recall that he provided a pension for the minister of his Marion church when ill health incapacitated the latter for preaching. He continued the salary of this pastor emeritus to the end of the latter's days, less than two weeks before Mr. Harding's own death.

This summer for the first time in history the Chinese sent out an athletic team for a series of international games. The team has been playing soccer in Australia for the last two months. Of the sixteen actual players, ten were business men from Hong Kong, young, of course; three were students in the same city; and three were Christian students from Shanghai. The Shanghai students had to talk with the rest of the team in English, so different are the dialects spoken in Hong Kong and Shanghai. At Hong Kong the Chinese "rooters" for the team, in two gaily beflagged tugs, escorted the ship on which the players sailed down the bay. The air was full of popping firecrackers and the water behind the tugs actually showed a red streak where crackers had not exploded.

It is repeating what everybody knows, to say that the Volstead Act has been hard on the jail and the almshouse business. In Massachusetts, seven jails and nine almshouses have been closed in the last four years for lack of inmates. Probation Officer Edward Hall of Springfield, Massachusetts, says that the orphan asylums and the home for deserted children which formerly were overcrowded are now scarcely half filled. The population of the Bridgewater (Massachusetts) State Reformatory has fallen from a minimum of twenty-three hundred men and women in the "liberal" old days to three hundred to-day. In those good old times of beer and light wines—as well as whisky—about a fourth of the inmates of the Bridgewater Reformatory were women. To-day that percentage has been cut down very materially, just why we do not know.

"They" love to tell us that we drink more in these balmy days of prohibition than we ever did in the sad old days of license. But the United States Statistical Abstract for 1916 shows that the per capita consumption of liquor in those "dry" days was twenty gallons a year. If New Yorkers were drinking at the same rate to-day the ten million of them would consume two hundred million gallons of liquor in this present year of grace. If half of that liquor was smuggled in across the Canadian border, it would take 3,166,666 automobile loads, allowing thirty gallons to every tonneau. Over ten thousand Cadillacs et al. would be crossing from Canada every day, rain or shine, drought or tempest. The people who say that New York is drinking as much as it did ten years ago are talking out of sheer ignorance. Verbum sap!

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

A Credible Christ*

THE Bishop of Gloucester has published the first part of a study of the life of Jesus. It reaches as far as the Transfiguration, and apparently is to be completed. What Dr. Headlam has in view is to show that the traditional account of Jesus in the Gospels is credible; that, after making due allowance for the prepossessions of the evangelists and for the literary phenomena of their records, the life and teaching of Jesus must be held to form a coherent and consistent whole. Nearly sixty years ago, when "Ecce Homo" appeared, Dean Church pointed out that the author as a historian had detected one truth in the New Testament, viz., that "the Gospels bring before us the visible and distinct outlines of a life which, after all efforts to alter the idea of it, remains still the same; they present certain clusters of leading ideas and facts so embedded in their substance that no criticism of detail can possibly get rid of them, without absolutely obliterating the whole record." Dr. Headlam's aim is similar. But, while Sir John Seeley succeeded in showing the continuity between the teaching of Jesus and the best impulses of the Christian Church, Dr. Headlam has to demonstrate the inner consistency of the teaching of Jesus against some modern attempts to suggest that the synoptic Gospels reveal tendencies in the apostolic Church rather than what Jesus taught, and that the latter can only be recovered by disentangling it from later accretions. Dr. Foakes Jackson and Dr. Kirsopp Lake observe that Mark's Gospel "is far more a primary authority for the thought of the apostolic age than for the life of Jesus." Dr. Headlam fastens on this unlucky lapse, and, believing that this kind of criticism impresses people in some quarters, sets himself to write a survey of the Gospels which will prove "that the teaching of Jesus as contained in the Gospels is not a collection of different opinions held by various individuals during a period of from fifty to seventy years, but a homogeneous whole coming from one teacher of intense spiritual power." The book is written with a business-like, plain energy. Dr. Headlam defends what he believes to be the common faith of the Church with common sense. It is a relief to read a writer upon the life of Jesus who is not an impressionist, and at the same time one who knows what the problems of that life are.

The outward setting of the life of Jesus means less to Dr. Headlam than His teaching, but he brings out certain points.

*The Life and Teaching of Jesus the Christ. By the Rt. Rev. A. C. Headlam, Ch., D.D., Bishop of Gloucester. John Murray. 12s. net.

Jesus was forty years old when He was crucified. His birth is placed in 8 or 7 B.C., and the crucifixion is dated in 33 A.D. Rightly, as most critics will agree, three years are left for the ministry. This involves that Jesus was in middle life when He entered upon His public mission. Neither He nor His leading disciples were young men, as is often imagined. Neither, as Dr. Headlam hints, were they poor. The first group of His followers were men of substance and position. "Externally, Jesus lived, as a boy and young man, the ordinary life of an artisan in simple surroundings, but not in poverty, and it may be noted that He always seems to speak of the poor from outside." The problem of the virgin birth is left unsolved. That the brothers of Jesus were his real brothers Dr. Headlam feels quite sure. "There seems to me no reason (except a dogmatic one) for adopting the conjecture of Jerome that they were cousins, and no evidence in favor of the Epiphanian theory that they were half-brothers against the Helvidian that they were the sons of Mary. The reasons against the latter view are not derived from history. The two sons of Zebedee were probably cousins of Jesus."

The test question of the miraculous element is answered in the following way. Dr. Headlam objects to ruling out the miracles on any a priori ground. He stresses the fact that "these miracles of the Gospel harmonize with the rest of the picture of the work of Christ. They are restrained; they are beneficent; they are not made the main purpose of the ministry; they rather take their place as something characteristic but subordinate; they exhibit the same spiritual authority and power as the words and work of Jesus." So he leaves it to each reader to decide what he must do with them. As for a story like that of the Transfiguration, for example, he sees "nothing in the story, as we have it, that might not have been told by the disciples as a truthful description of what they believed had happened." Most historical critics would grant as much. What we obtain in this book is not an explanation of the miracles, but a plea for caution in estimating them, a plea for suspense of judgment. "We are still, I think, left in the position of either refusing to accept what appears to be quite good evidence, or of accepting phenomena which are inconsistent with ordinary experience."

Dr. Headlam properly brings out the fact that Jesus was

ACTS 8:1-15:35.

"Ye shall be witnesses unto me . . . unto the uttermost part of the earth."—Acts 1:8.

WE HAVE here no continuous history in the Book of Acts. The author took snapshots of those scenes which bore directly on the development of this theme, "The Power of the Spirit of Jesus in History." He leaps from place to place and from man to man. He drops one thread to take up another.

In this chapter he first describes the work in Samaria to the north of Jerusalem. "Multitudes gave heed to the things which were spoken by Philip. From many the unclean spirits came out. Many that were palsied or lame were healed. And there was great joy in that city." Then the author drops this thread and turns his face in the opposite direction; he looks toward "the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza." There came a messenger of the Lord who spake to Philip, saying, "Arise, and go toward the south. He arose and went, and, behold, a man of Ethiopia!"

The gospel was to go out in every direction and teach all nations. In early times it achieved its largest success in roving north and west. Samaria and Damascus, Antioch and Ephesus, Macedonia, Greece and Rome, these are the mile-stones in its progress! But the author here balances his account by showing a similar gospel movement toward the south. The message Christ brought was no exotic capable only of a local, provincial development. It could live and grow anywhere. On the day of Pentecost it converted men "from every nation under heaven," and it will not tarry until all the kingdoms of this world are enlisted in the service of its Lord.

This initial effort toward the south was prophetic. How mighty became the movement toward the south in later times! What a Christian center was the city of Alexandria for years—Origen was born there. Augustine, who molded the thinking of the Latin Church, was from Numidia. Athanasius, who saved the day at the Nicene Council by his sturdy defense of the divinity of our Lord, was an Alexandrian. The angel of the Lord looked upon that warmer climate, seeing there the promise of spiritual harvests which would enrich the Church of the future. Therefore, Philip is sent in the early springtime to sow the good seed in the heart of an Ethiopian.

The lesson is a story of personal work. The apostles were fishers of men, working sometimes with the drag-net, but more often with the hand-line. The drag-net takes of every kind—it was used on the day of Pentecost when three thousand were gathered into the church, Ananias and Sapphira among the number. The drag-net method in Samaria brought Simon the Sorcerer into the number of baptized believers along with those from whom the unclean spirits had gone out.

This man Philip was a successful evangelist—he had been preaching Christ in Samaria with such effect that "multitudes gave heed." The short-sighted would insist on having such a man kept in the cities, casting his net in the largest halls to be had. But there are choice souls who do not live in cities, and there are many who are repelled rather than won by the methods of the monster meeting in the Big Tabernacle. The successful evangelist was here taken from the city crowds and sent into a desert to preach the gospel to a solitary man.

"He arose and went: and, behold, a man of Ethiopia!" The Ethiopian was a man of wealth—traveling in his own chariot. He was a man of high position—treasurer of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians. He was a man of serious mind—he was reading the Hebrew Scriptures as he rode along. He was reading aloud as a true Oriental, for Philip "heard him reading Isaiah." He had been to Jerusalem to worship—a man whose soul was in quest of light and peace. He had not found what he sought—he was returning with an unsatisfied heart, but an undiscouraged will.

What an opportunity! "Understandest thou what thou readeest?" "How can I," the Ethiopian replied, "except some one guide me?" He was a man in authority, engrossed in business affairs, and he felt the need of expert knowledge for his spiritual guidance. And what is still more important, the man of affairs was ready to be advised.

When their conference was finished the Ethiopian was convinced—he believed on Jesus Christ. He was ready to confess his faith in baptism. He would not hide his new-found trust behind the door; he would not steal away in silent fashion, afraid or ashamed to declare it in the appointed way; he believed and he would be baptized that he might be "saved."

When he had been baptized "the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip and the eunuch saw him no more. But he went on his way rejoicing." His quest for truth and peace at last successful! His unsatisfied heart and undiscouraged will had found what they sought in vain at Jerusalem. He felt himself "a new man in Christ Jesus." He never appears again upon the pages of Scripture.

The kingdom of God is larger every way than our little human records. Men and women who never find their way into earthly fame are sufficiently precious for heaven to take thought on their behalf. The messengers of God are commissioned to meet them and teach them as they travel through the desert toward a land of promise. In the light of God's estimate upon quiet work like this, count no effort too costly if you in turn may instruct, convince and convert some soul whose presence beside you in the great day will prove that your place is with the children of light.

This simple occurrence has a very direct bearing upon one of the most serious problems confronting this nation. "Arise and go toward the south and behold a man of Ethiopia!" He is there "in force," as military men would say, on the other side of Mason and Dixon's line. He is waiting for some one to guide him as to the meaning of what he reads, of what he does, of what he is. He has a just claim upon the Christian forces of this land for competent guidance.

We were mourning recently the death of a man who, though he was born a slave, had become the Black Prince in industrial, educational and moral leadership. The work of Booker Washington marked an epoch in the history of his race. Let Hampton and Tuskegee, with all the splendid schools sustained by our own American Missionary Association, undertake to raise up regiments of men and women who having caught the vision are imbued with the same spirit!

RACE RELATIONS SUNDAY

The Federal Council Commission on the Church and Race Relations suggests that February 10, 1924, be observed in the churches as Race Relations Sunday. The Commission is publishing a booklet, which suggests programs, topics and materials suited to the occasion. It is not too early for everyone interested, whether pastor, missionary leader, Sunday school or young people's worker, to write for further information to the Commission on the Church and Race Relations, 105 East Twenty-second street, New York City. Christianity, as has been so often said, has the only answer to all humanity's problems and needs, but the answer must be diligently sought and applied. And this can be done only through the efforts of Christian leaders working along practical lines. The suggestions for Race Relations Sunday have the merits of being practical.

Mr. Lloyd George, when his attention was called to a statement made by Col. Dupont, French Military Attaché, at a meeting of the Reserve Officers' Association, "May the Lord protect us from our friends. . . . To-morrow you are going to hear from one of our friends," said: "I sincerely wish that the gallant officer had not used that phrase. I never heard that prayer between 1914 and 1918. But I shall never forget the agonized prayer of the French Ambassador to his friends in England to come to the help of France. We went within twenty-four to forty-eight hours. Why, nine hundred thousand dead from the British Empire are scattered widely through military graveyards all over France and Flanders in evidence of England's friendship for France, and one million three hundred thousand of our best working men are now eating the bread of charity in England because we went to the aid of France in her hour of agony." that bishop who is also a prophet—tells of a sermon he preached twenty years ago on covetousness, which greatly pleased a multi-millionaire who happened to be in the audience. "I didn't see anything in the sermon to please this particular auditor and could not refrain from expressing some surprise at his praise. His comment was very edifying to me. It seemed that I had kept the discussion on a lofty plane of general principles; that my utterance had a noble dignity derived from the heights on which it moved; that I had not marred the aesthetic effect of a well-balanced sermonic creation by descending to commonplace, or market-place, matters. If I have said things since then plain to the point of ugliness, it has been due to my desire to escape the paganism of putting the abstract or the aesthetic above the moral." The bishop, it may be added, calls a spade a spade in the great article above announced.

BISHOP McCONNELL'S article will be followed by others just as arresting by such men as: Charles A. Ellwood, Albion W. Small, Edward Alsworth Ross, Harry F. Ward, Samuel Z. Batten, Arthur E. Holt, Ross L. Finney, Alva W. Taylor, etc., etc. Every writer is a recognized authority. All agree in the conclusion that our workaday life and our public life have yet to be brought under the influence of the mind of Jesus. It is vain, they hold, to ask men to be Christians in a private corner of their lives while they accept pagan ideals and motives and methods as rules of action in business and public affairs. If these pagan rules and principles remain unrevolutionized, says Professor Albion W. Small, "the goodly fellowship of the Apostles could not operate our present industrial system and make its working just." These expressions of positive conviction are indicative of the slowly forming social conscience of the modern church.

These articles promise to be the outstanding event of religious discussion during the present season. Thoughtful leaders, lay and clerical, inside and outside the churches, will wish to follow so brilliant and creative a contribution.

INTERNATIONAL GOLDEN RULE SUNDAY

Bread of Life for Orphan Children of Bible Lands

OUTDOOR DINING ROOM AT ANTILYAS DURING THE SETTLING DOWN
FOLLOWING THE GREAT EXODUS FROM TURKEY INTO SYRIA

Practical Application of the Golden Rule

As a practical application of the Golden Rule, as a spiritual exercise for the prosperous, as a source of food supply for the homeless and the starving, as an expression of international fellowship and good-will, an International Golden Rule Sunday is proposed for December 2, 1923.

(a) On this date all persons who are disposed to make a practical application of the Golden Rule are requested to provide for their Sunday dinner the same menu that is approved and used for at least 50,000 of the orphans of the Near East. *

There will still in many cases be a marked difference between the dinner as served in the prosperous home and that served in the orphanage, in that in the European or American home there need be no limitation as to quantity or as to attractive forms of service and comfortable or luxurious surroundings, whereas in the orphanages the portions are necessarily limited, the room is bare, the service is without table linen or silverware and frequently on floors without tables or chairs. Moreover, the average European and American enjoys the novelty of a Golden Rule dinner but once in the year and has 1,094 other meals during the year with a more attractive bill of fare. The orphan, on the other hand, must content himself with the same more or less monotonous menu for 365 days in the year, never once knowing the taste of cake, sweets, candies, ices and other luxuries of every-day European and American life.

(b) The difference between the cost of the usual Sunday dinner and the simpler, less expensive orphanage menus is to be made as a contribution and thank offering for the purchase of food for the orphans of the Near East.

The Response to the Appeal for the Japanese Churches

To the Readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

DEAR FRIENDS: The response to our appeal for the re-building of the Japanese Churches has been very generous but most of the contributions being made by the American people are being made for the Churches of the various Mission Boards.

There are, however, the independent Churches and they must look to subscriptions from independent sources. They are in a pitiable plight and yet they are strategic centers and powerful influences. They do not know where to turn.

I am writing this second letter to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, sincerely hoping that if you have not already contributed through your Church to the Mission Churches of your denomination, and have not answered my first appeal, you will send something even though it be little, at once. They are waiting upon us.

A letter from one of the native pastors reads:

"Your remittance has brought new faith and hope to us. We did not know where to turn in our dire distress. We sat in despair. Now we begin again. What America is doing for Japan is making all Japanese love her."

Please do not trouble to answer this appeal if you have already contributed to the Church Fund, but if you have not, may we not ask that you will put some investments into these permanent memorials of mercy and good-will?

In my previous letter I said I hoped to be able "to say that every reader of THE CHRISTIAN WORK had put some investment into these Churches." Judging from the response to our appeal and from the letters from readers saying that they had contributed through their own Church Mission Board, I should judge that about two-thirds of the readers have answered.

If every one of the one-third who has not answered would send one dollar or more we would be assured of ten thousand dollars more, which would practically rebuild three Japanese Churches.

You do not want to let this opportunity go by, do you? It is doubtful if your money can do as much permanent good anywhere else. Here it becomes like a stone in the temple, permanent, enduring. I am sure you wish to send something, but have simply overlooked it.

Yours sincerely,

FREDERICK LYNCH, Treas.

conscious of fulfilling in the highest sense the vocation of the Servant of the Lord. This is one of the clues to His consciousness of having to suffer in order to carry out the Divine purpose, and in interpreting the scene at Cæsarea Philippi our author uses it freely. On the other hand, he hardly does justice to the eschatological element in the teaching. He protests against its exaggeration by some scholars who have allowed themselves to be over-powered by it in estimating the ethics of Jesus. This is true. But the element is there, and when Dr. Headlam has to explain some of the relevant passages—like the saying that some of those who heard Jesus would not see death till they had seen the Kingdom coming in power—the explanation is unsatisfactory. Some explanation has to be offered of the presence of such an element in the Gospels. It is not impossible to indicate its coherence with the teaching and mission of Jesus. But that requires methods rather less dogmatic than those followed in this book. Again, not all readers will agree with Dr. Headlam when he declares that "there is no evidence for any dogmatic purpose, deliberate or even unconscious, in the alterations" made by Matthew in handling the Gospel of Mark. There are other instances of a decisiveness which is more refreshing than convincing. Still, Dr. Headlam knows his own mind, and he does not hesitate to challenge contemporary opinion. More than once he makes a good case against the destructive critics whom he is always opposing; and even where he does no more than succeed in demanding a rehearing of the evidence, this is something. What he has done, and done vigorously, in his book is to assert that the life and teaching of Jesus form too real a fact to be dissolved in any criticism of the apostolic Church. From time to time books of this kind are required, books that are critical of criticism without being reactionary. No one nation has a monopoly of them. We have similar volumes in French and German, for example. But the English temperament, if it is less imaginative and less speculative, has a saving instinct for what is real and sensible in evidence, and this is the quality which distinguishes the Bishop's book on Jesus.

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. Jesus made the Church; this was the effect, the impression produced by "Ecce Homo." Nowadays it is suggested that the early Church made Jesus; in other words, that we owe our picture of Jesus to a variety of tendencies in primitive Christianity. Dr. Headlam's volume has the merit of asserting that whatever else this theory may be, it is not historical.

FILMS FOR CHILDREN AND MOTHERS

The Better Films Association is bringing out a series of weekly films which it considers to be particularly adapted to children and mothers. Some of the stories are taken from the world's great classics, including the Bible. According to its own statement, the purpose is to give inspiration to children for the right kind of living and the proper development of character. The Association rents these films to schools and churches at reduced prices.

The Association is also trying to foster a love for genuine music, and has put Professor Gustave Hinrichs, for years connected with the Metropolitan Opera Company and a lecturer in the music department of Columbia University, in charge of its music department. It furnishes complete musical scores with each of its special releases. Among the organizations represented on the Advisory Board of the Association are the Boy Scouts, the Girl Scouts, the Salvation Army, the National Association for the Advancement of Music, the American Society for Psychical Research, and the Educators' Association.

A NEGRO SERMON ON CREATION

["The Truth Seeker" quotes the following from a sermon on creation given by a colored preacher some years ago. It is as profound truth as we can find.]

God didn't make things as a carpenter does, nor as a blacksmith does. He made them as a God makes things. You see the dirt all around you. Can you make anything out of it that will last over night? God made a man out of it that lived over nine hundred years. He made everything out of dirt and divinity. God got down into the dirt and mixed himself up in it and gave shape to what sprang from the ground. You never can tell what will come up where God is planted, but you can just bet something will. It is what is mixed with the dirt that makes it produce things.

God is not easy to understand, but he is something that makes things and makes things grow. God is in the trees and grass and flowers, and only for him they could not live and grow and be sweet and beautiful. Nothing could have been, had not God existed. Everything comes from God. God mixed himself with nothing and made something. That is the way creation began. It is the mixing of God with dirt that made man and all the animals, and all that live on earth. Creation is just like

Bible Sunday December 9th

Theme

THE BIBLE
REMAKING THE ORIENT

Purpose

The earthquake in Japan has made large areas of the Far East practically Bibleless. Thousands of Bible printing plates in 25 languages and dialects used in Yokohama have been totally destroyed. They must be replaced at once or the whole missionary program will be seriously handicapped.

Need

The American Bible Society needs immediately $289,000 with which to make good the actual losses, to say nothing of the enlarged opportunities.

Responsibility is definitely upon the Churches of America, whose agency for Bible work in the Far East is the American Bible Society.

Opportunity

is one of unusual significance and every Pastor, Sunday School Superintendent and Young People's leader should utilize Bible Sunday on December 9th (or nearest convenient date) for the promotion of interest in the distribution of the Scriptures in Japan and the Far East.

JEWES NO LONGER

[The following is part of an article appearing in "The Scribe," a Jewish paper. It is a significant bit of self-revelation.]

We were sitting on the fence in front of Battell Chapel at Yale. The bell was announcing the Sunday service and long lines of students were hurrying across the campus, lest the door be closed before they arrived. A few Semitic faces could be seen hurrying with the rest to this house of worship, not because they liked the music, the prayers or the sermon, but because they had to attend. I turned to those near me and said, "The world is not justified in calling us Jews. The Jewish soul has departed from us; the body must soon follow."

Our Jewish students are descended from but are not Jews. To the Jewish religion we are strangers, to its thought we are foreigners, and of its literature we are ignorant. We know less of the Old Testament than does the Christian of the New (which is not a very great deal). We know still less of the Jewish traditions and nothing of its modern literature. In the orthodox synagogue we feel out of place; to the reform temple we are indifferent. The greater number of holy days we do not observe; those we observe we do not understand. Dead to all things Jewish, we have but our physical features and our neighbor's suggestions to remind us of our race, which we betrayed long, long ago when we turned to climbing social ladders, and to manufacturing cloaks and suits.

Not only have we lost our heritage, but we are contributing nothing that is our own. Do not accuse us of contributing naught to our colleges, of failure to cheer at the football games, or of not going out for other activities. We go whenever the chance is given us, and that chance is daily increasing. Accuse us not of being different, but of being too like the other students. Could psychology find a way to testing ideas instead of "intelligence" it would find no essential difference between the Jewish and non-Jewish students.

Being so like unto the college mob, we are nevertheless not wanted in the college freemasonry. Instead of rising above it we erect a similar one in our midst. Denied admission to the fraternities, we form our own—smaller and less important it is true, but equally narrow and confined in spirit. . . . We regret and worry not because we are denied the privilege to lead individual lives and to live in a mental state of freedom, but because we are not invited to dances or wanted at proms. We must make good not in fields of learning (for that would count against us), but in the social castes. When one of our number succeeds in breaking the barrier and getting on some team we stay up to all hours of the night to talk of his "plays" and of what he does for the Jews of the college. We are loyal to the group if it strives to emulate that which is proper, but we ostracize any member who stands out as an individual lest he mar our chance of success.

ANOTHER LINCOLN MEMORIAL

The tendency of the language used by Americans and Englishmen to diverge has increased out of all knowledge in the last half century with the amazing development of American literature, remarks "The British Weekly." "Most Englishmen," it goes on, "feel that they can fathom the speeches of Abraham Lincoln as they cannot those of his successors. Is it accidental that his working library was in standardized English—the Bible and Shakespeare? At any rate, the fact that Lincoln is 'the greatest American' to the English people is constantly borne home to us in one way or another." At the birthday dinner to "T. P." at the Savoy Hotel, not long since, Lord Curzon unveiled one more bust of the American immortal—the gift of the guest of the evening—and renamed the Mirror Room the "Abraham Lincoln Room." The room has two curiously interesting war associations with America. In it American tourists, stranded August, 1914, were given relief; and from it Mr. Herbert Hoover organized the Belgian relief administration.

The World of To-day

A SERIES BY DR. NANSEN

The publishers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK take great pleasure in announcing that in the next week's issue they will begin a series of articles by the great scientist and humanitarian worker, Dr. Nansen, on present problems in Europe and their solution, under the general caption of "International Cooperation the Only Way." Dr. Nansen has been the great hero of peace. It was he who, at the command of the League of Nations, repatriated the half million prisoners of war. Most of them had been seven years in Siberia. At a gathering in New York he told the story of this task. No remarks ever written ever approached it in interest and we hope to have that story later. Dr. Nansen now has charge, under the League, of settling in Greece the one million Greek refugees from Asia Minor. The present article deals with three incidents, with all of which Dr. Nansen has been personally connected; the Corfu incident, the refugee situation in Greece and the Ruhr incident. It is a long time since any paper in America has published a more engrossing or illuminating article than this.

FOR LOWER INCOME TAXES

Last month Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, in a letter to William R. Greene, Acting Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, outlined a plan for the reduction of taxation. For each of the last two years, the Government has received about three hundred and ten million dollars above all its expenditures, including in the latter the sums devoted to the sinking fund and to other retirements of the national debt. Secretary Mellon suggests that the most useful place in which we can make reductions in the national income is by cutting down the income taxes. He would reduce the income tax on earned income by twenty-five per cent. Where the present normal tax is four per cent., he would reduce it to three per cent.; where it is eight per cent. he would reduce it to six. He would only charge the sur-tax rates on incomes from ten thousand and over instead of six thousand and over as is done at present; and he would make the highest sur-tax only twenty-five per cent., to be paid on one hundred thousand dollars and over. At present the highest sur-tax is forty-two per cent. payable on incomes of two hundred thousand dollars and over. The arguments in favor of the decrease on the lower incomes is obvious. Over thirteen million individuals pay taxes on incomes up to six thousand dollars. If Congress carries out the measures suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, the taxes of at least thirteen million would be reduced by over forty per cent. Secretary Mellon believes that the reduction on the great incomes would be mainly helpful in business. As it is, men with very great incomes pay fifty per cent. or more on what they receive, in taxes, unless they put their possessions into tax exempt securities. Of course, they have been driven to invest in such securities in very large proportions. These securities are the bonds of the national and local governments.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

When capital is tied up in such securities, it is not available for the development of the business of the country. Secretary Mellon also suggested the repeal of the tax on telegrams, telephone messages, on tickets of admission and certain small miscellaneous taxes which he summed up as "nuisance taxes." He also made some suggestions for readjustments which were in interest of fairness and would increase income taxes by technical adjustments. Secretary Mellon emphasized that it would be possible to carry out these reductions only in case we do not have the soldiers' bonus. A bonus would require not only that we keep up the present income, but that we find new sources for the Government, and it would mean a tremendous expenditure annually for years to come. Secretary Mellon's proposal has received a remarkable welcome. According to the figures which Mr. Babson, the distinguished statistician, has worked out it would mean a very considerable increase of available income to the ordinary person. For instance, he reckons that the person with an income of two thousand dollars would save directly through the Mellon provision seventeen dollars and fifteen cents, indirectly through the giving up of the tax, he would save forty dollars; that on account of the lower price level that he might expect he would save a further hundred dollars, so that altogether his saving would come to one hundred and fifty-seven dollars and fifty cents. That is nearly eight per cent. of his income. In a similar way, he reckons that a person with an income of ten thousand dollars would be saved nine hundred and eighty-five dollars, almost ten per cent. of his income. The indications are that the President is in favor of Secretary Mellon's proposal. It would seem that Secretary Mellon's letter would very possibly result in the defeat of the bonus and in a stimulation of business.

all the rest of the bunch, so he asked for a private room. He got it. The next day he told them he would like a desk in his room. He got it. He had fine food sent in, and after a few days he wanted to get out in the beautiful sunshine, and he got his parole. During all the time that I was in the penitentiary I never saw the outside of my prison." That is the difference in treatment accorded two men, one of whom was willing that our soldiers should suffer so long as he himself made money; the other who believed the whole method of war was wrong. Life made easy for the first; life made bitter for the second. Thirty-two of our fellow human beings still languish in prison because they did not approve of the war. Men spoke against the War of 1812 when we had the same Constitution as we have to-day. They were not arrested and cast into jail. James Russell Lowell spoke and wrote vigorously in opposition to the Mexican War, but he was not interfered with. William Lloyd Garrison at the time of the Civil War called our Constitution "a covenant with hell," an agreement with death. Garrison was not arrested. During the World War it was dangerous even to read the Constitution of the United States. A man was actually arrested for reading it aloud. When the policeman came up to him, the man said, "I didn't write it. Thomas Jefferson wrote it." The officer of the law (?) said, "Where is that guy?" Two of the war opinion prisoners in Leavenworth have tuberculosis. When a petition was sent to the Government for their release because they were sick, sure enough two prisoners were liberated, but not the right ones. The prisoners at least thought it was a mistake, which they ascribed to the late President Harding. Shall men who have read the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States leave these prisoners still in jail?

HOW IT LOOKS INSIDE THE PRISON WALLS

Mourn not the dead that in the cool earth lie—
Dust unto dust—

The calm, sweet earth that mothers all who die,
As all men must;

Mourn not your captive comrades who must dwell—
Too strong to strive—

Each in his steel-bound coffin of a cell,
Buried alive;

But rather mourn the apathetic throng—
The cowed and the meek—

Who see the world's great anguish and its wrong
And dare not speak!

The man who wrote these lines, Ralph Chaplin, now freed from prison, is able to-day to tell his story as he could not when the gates of Leavenworth stood between him and the liberty of an American citizen. Among his fellow prisoners in the Kansas federal prison were the Wolfe brothers, who made rotten leather and sold it to the government for the use of the men in the trenches. The Wolfes made millions of dollars out of profiteering. Before and during the war, Ralph Chaplain declared, in "Solidarity," the organ of the I. W. W., that in the war there would be profiteering. As he puts it, "I said that what they (the Wolfe brothers) did was not right; I got twenty years for that. They got two." To go on, "Wolfe and I went to the penitentiary. After he looked around the first day, he did not like to be herded with

GOVERNOR WALTON'S IMPEACHMENT

The Oklahoma Legislature has brought James C. Walton's term of office as governor of Oklahoma to an early close by successfully impeaching him. The Senate unanimously found him guilty of abusing his pardon and parole authority. He had used these powers right and left and by them had effected a pretty general jail delivery in the State. The Senate also found him guilty of placing his personal chauffeur on the State Health Department pay roll; of padding the State pay roll; of preventing the assembly of a grand jury; of suspending the writ of habeas corpus; of issuing a $10,000 deficiency certificate for the State Health Department when no deficiency existed, and of issuing a similar certificate for $4,000 for a State Negro orphans home in order to provide salaries for two Negro barbers whom he ordered placed on the pay roll of the institution; of attempting to prevent a special State election; of exceeding the legal limit of election expenses; of soliciting gifts and contributions for expenses of his office after he was elected; and of being generally incompetent. He was acquitted of five other charges. The Senate's action automatically removed him as governor and Lieutenant Governor M. E. Trapp succeeds him. Governor Walton came into national prominence through his fight against the Ku Klux Klan. But he was a man of such bad judgment, to say nothing of his moral obtuseness, that he threw away all the advantage of his position and exposed himself to the ignominious defeat that he has suffered.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE FUTURE WORK OF THE AMERICAN BOARD IN TURKEY

In this and last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK we have printed a statement by Dr. Barton of the history of the American Board's missionary work in Turkey and of the problem which faces the Board there to-day. Turkey has been given a new place among the nations, and no punishment for past offenses against humanity and international order has been decreed. The safety of the minorities yet remaining in Turkey is guaranteed and their freedom to maintain their own language, schools and religion is pledged in most explicit terms in the treaty of peace. The League of Nations is appointed to enforce these provisions. Foreigners in Turkey will receive no special exemptions or safeguards, but in general will receive the same treatment as that given to Turks resident in other countries. Though in the treaties missionary and philanthropic organizations are not given the same encouragement and consideration as are given to commercial and financial concerns, they are recognized as existing, and will be allowed to continue under Turkish law. With these now definite prospects in view, and with full reports in hand from the missionaries regarding the work now going on, and the present attitude of the Turkish authorities towards this work, the American Board and its auxiliary Women's Boards have adopted the following principles:

First: That we should continue missionary work in Turkey.

Second: That we should continue to provide moral and spiritual help and leadership for the refugee populations in Greece, Syria and the Caucasus.

Third: That we do not consider the changed conditions, governing our educational work in Turkey, so fundamental as to prevent the continuation of our schools under the laws of the Grand National Assembly at Angora.

Fourth: That we regard the period of drifting uncertainty in respect to our efforts in Turkey as ended, and we consider the work now being carried on as established and important and worthy of consideration equal to that given to any mission of the Board.

It would be folly to think that all uncertainties in Turkey are at an end. But the American Board believes that the period of retrogression in Turkey has ended; the corner has been turned. The missionaries on the field, forced into constant and immediate contact with the Turks, see real opportunity before them and call urgently and insistently for reinforcement. The Board at home accepts the challenge, and while unable to grant all the requests for advance has definitely committed itself to carry on in Turkey.

FAKE DEGREES AGAIN

The whole country has been considerably shocked by the discovery in Connecticut that several physicians were practising under the cover of degrees bought from various institutions, which did not in any way signify that those holding them were capable of practising medicine, or had ever had any medical education. Dr. George N. Sutcliff has confessed to Governor Templeton of Connecticut that he got his degree from a Missouri diploma mill. He has been ordered under arrest by the Grand Jury which is investigating this whole matter. Examination was made of the birth and death records in the office of the Town Clerk of Farmington, Connecticut, which disclosed that in the eleven months to date since Dr. Sutcliff bought the practise of Dr. Ripley, he has signed six death certificates. The papers give a record of the causes of these deaths and they are all cases that would require the most expert medical treatment. It has opened the whole question of fake degrees and it looks as if we were going to discover that not only many physicians were practising under these degrees secured either by money or by passing examinations which were nothing but subterfuges for the real thing, but also that many clergymen have been securing the degree of D.D. for slight sums they have paid on the basis of correspondence courses which amounted to practically nothing. It will be remembered that several years ago a diploma factory in the Middle West was offering the degree of D.D. to clergymen for $50 and a so-called correspondence course. It is no wonder our English brethren look with suspicion upon the many doctors of divinity who appear in England from the United States. Only very few of the clergymen in England, either in the Anglican or Free Churches have the degree of D.D. It is highly prized there because it always means real scholarship, and it is the custom to print the name of the university which grants the degree and the value of the degree is determined largely by the source from which it comes. It is a question whether or not degrees for doctor of divinity in America should not be given for real scholarship and whether it would not be a good idea that the name of the university conferring the degree always be printed with it.

MEETING OF THE AMERICAN WALDENSIAN SOCIETY

The American Waldensian Society is playing the friend to the ancient Waldensian churches in Italy. Bishop Greer at the time of his death was head of the society. His successor is Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin of the Park Avenue Baptist Church, New York. The work of the Waldensians must appeal to every Protestant. They live in the land of Rome, but they maintain a spirit of kindness toward their non-Protestant neighbors. The American Waldensian Society hopes this year to send to the Waldensian Church one hundred per cent. of the funds that are raised in this country. Administration is important and costly, but funds will be found to carry the overhead. The annual meeting of the society last week filled its members anew with enthusiasm. For whenever Peter Waldo's story is unfolded and that of his followers, people are stirred. These early Waldensians were persecuted for righteousness' sake yet they never swerved from their ideal of adhering to what they regarded and still regard as the primitive faith.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED AT PHILADELPHIA

The Observer has written in THE CHRISTIAN WORK a full account of the remarkable meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches, held in Philadelphia November 13, 14 and 15. On page 649 of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK will be found the manifesto unanimously issued by the Conference, but there were three or four other resolutions passed which are worthy of the careful study of our readers. While the manifesto emphasizes the fact that the churches of America believe in the United States' participation in the World Court, a resolution addressed to the President and the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate explicitly asks that the United States become a member. The resolution is as follows:

RESOLUTION ON THE WORLD COURT

The President is urged to reaffirm in his forthcoming annual message the recommendation of the late President Harding to the Senate in regard to the Permanent Court of International Justice. Notwithstanding that with his customary fairness in dealing with opponents, he called attention to rival plans, he never wavered in the emphatic statement of his own convictions and preferences. The American people cannot better show their reverence for his memory than by loyal execution of the policy which he bequeathed to his fellow-countrymen.

To this end also the United States Senate is urgently requested to instruct its Committee on Foreign Relations to report promptly upon the Harding Recommendation for participation in the Permanent Court of International Justice.

There was considerable discussion in Philadelphia on the question of armament and it was very evident that many of the delegates felt that great armaments are more provocative of war than almost anything else. After much discussion, the following strong resolution was passed:

RESOLUTION ON REDUCTION OF ARMAMENT

Whereas the world has long been impoverished and plagued by huge armaments, and whereas the experiences of our generation have demonstrated that armaments are provocative of suspicion and fear and ill will and utterly impotent to ward off worldwide destruction.

Be it resolved that we, the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches, beseech our own Government, and all the other governments of the world, to call a halt on all proposed increases of land and sea and air forces, and to proceed to the consideration of ways by which all military and air and naval forces may, by international agreement, be radically reduced.

We firmly protest against the policy of establishing new naval bases, and of squandering the money of the people on new fortifications, new aircraft, and new guns. All such warlike preparations only perpetuate a system of thought and action which has long cursed mankind and which must be banished, if we are ever to have a warless world.

It was also felt that no conference of Christians should break up without declaring its stand regarding war and the following short but strong resolution was passed:

RESOLUTION ON THE OUTLAWRY OF WAR

Resolved, That in response to the searching indictment of war that has been made by the speakers at this Conference, we declare it to be the sense of this body that the churches of the world should solemnly declare that war as a method of settling international disputes is anti-Christian and that therefore every effort to outlaw war and provide judicial substitution will receive their hearty support.

Resolutions Adopted at the Eighth Annual Meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches at Witherspoon Hall, Thursday Afternoon, November 15, 1923

We, the five hundred delegates assembled at the annual meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, and representing, we believe, the convictions of the Church at large, desire to put ourselves on record to the effect that the time has come for the United States to assume bold, confident leadership in the rescuing of our present civilization from chaos and in establishing a new world order based upon justice, co-operation and good-will.

Selfish nationalism and the basing of our civilization upon force plunged us into 1914. The world is rushing again toward the same precipice and our nation is doing nothing to avert the impending calamity. We argue details of covenants and who shall elect judges to a court while Europe starves, selfishness rules, militarism rises again, gross injustices are practiced, the nations arm, and force reasserts itself as the rule of life.

Against this isolation on the part of our nation we solemnly protest. We believe it unchristian, and we believe it makes of no effect the sacrifices of the boys whose idealism we have just been commemorating. We believe the time has come for the United States to lay aside all selfishness and timidity and take her place in the councils of the nations. We believe all problems, especially those we helped to create in Europe and Asia, are our problems, and our place is where they are being solved. We believe the United States has been called to serve the world and should again manifest that sense of mission to which it rose in the war. We deprecate and condemn all talk of "America first and only," whether proceeding from the Senate or the market-place. We believe that upon America rests the obligation to co-operate in the high endeavor to save the world and build a new order wherein dwelleth righteousness. To this end we demand, in the name of the American Church, that the Senate of the United States take immediate steps to make our nation a signatory power to the Court of International Justice. We respectfully petition the President of the United States to continue the crusade begun by President Harding to this great end. We believe that to stand outside the Court violates our whole American tradition. We believe it also violates the will of the American people.

This act having been accomplished, we call upon the Senate of the United States to immediately begin the study of how the United States may find entrance into the League of Nations or find some substitute association to which the other nations will agree. The churches have stood for it from the beginning. They stood behind Mr. Wilson. When Mr. Harding became President they offered their support to him in a belief absolutely justified both by his words and those of his associates that America would take her place in the family of nations. The churches' high expectations have not been fulfilled, and we believe the Senate of the United States owes it to these millions of Christians to fulfil them. We cannot sit still and see the other nations of the world vainly strive to realize the common life while we stand apart and by our absence cripple their endeavor.

The American Spirit

THE cities which are hampered by congested alienism have not always made an attractive exhibit. The reckless overriding by their inhabitants of institutions and observances long cherished here has stimulated a national prejudice which takes forbidden ways and issues a program that will perish of itself if not previously overwhelmed by public obloquy and contempt. To urge that many millions of our fellow-citizens shall be practically ostracized and always antagonized because they were born abroad, or are of another religion or a different color is to diametrically contradict genuine Americanism. Those who subscribe to such mad notions condemn their boasted patriotism by the principles they derive from it. This fatal antithesis is corroborated by the secrecy enshrouding their nefarious conduct. No American need wear a mask or adopt childish rituals and silly disguises to achieve laudable ends. Men who love darkness rather than light do so because their deeds are evil. These deeds are sure to follow in the wake of attempts at concealed justice. Crimes are generated in any conclave which skulks in the rear and stabs in the back. It is not pertinent to say that the plotters advocate things which are commendable in themselves. Their methods are too vile to be admitted to the practice of a freedom-loving state. And their usurpation of the functions of the state as the sole and supreme source and executive of justice is essentially treason. When taken from the viewpoint of religion, to which the Ku Klux Klan professes an extraordinary attachment, their behavior is even more reprehensible. Legally, they are in danger of being outlawed; religiously, they are already beyond the pale. For though religion has numerous complexions, it has but one spirit—the spirit of brotherhood, as shown in exact equity, in fraternal affection, and in mutual helpfulness. Why then has such an unexpected and ugly reversion to the Knownothingism of the past century arisen to defile our present annals? The answer is that in every land cursed by recent war there have been repercussions of degeneracy as well as of ennoblement.

Russia is enslaved, Germany is demoralized, Turkey is recalcitrant and unashamed of massacres which appal reflective minds. On three successive occasions even the government of Great Britain has reeled before the surgings of a menacing tide of revolutionaryism. Some acute and reliable observers declare that Europe has seen its meridian and is now rapidly descending to its nadir. We do not believe their prediction. But it may prove true unless a rational and tranquillizing policy is speedily found and enforced there.

In our own country the realms of theology, of politics and of social life are profoundly agitated. Heresy hunters are again in the saddle in some churches, undeterred by the obvious futility of their enterprises. Accusations and counter-accusations are bandied about. Those who should be earnestly concerned for the reintegration of the Church as the vital precedent of world peace are pre-empted by doctrinal debates. These have no important meaning, yet the flames of expiring controversies are refired in their behalf. If such fatuous pursuits obsess men who profess the divine charity of the Son of God, what better can be expected of men who do not make the profession? One erring brother proposes to crush all thought which he cannot square with his creed. Another carries the process to its logical conclusion by proposing to isolate all men who do not think as he does. Could stupid, obstinate and blind bigotry have a more vivid setting? Again, if Protestantism is responsible for the ill-starred revival of Ku Kluxism, it should occur to those who are non-Protestants that they may not be without offense. Let every man interrogate himself after this fashion: Have I or have those with whom I am associated done anything provocative of dislike and prejudice? For example, if the Jew forgets that he owes allegiance to the public interest, if he takes the untenable ground that he must be at once peculiar, select and separate, and also a sharer in the general welfare, he contributes to the mutilation of the American spirit. If the Romanist allows his religious convictions to dictate his political choices and appointments, he is guilty of violating that spirit. If the Protestant does likewise, he is likewise guilty. There is no escape from these conclusions. Instead of permitting some painful manifestations of these divisive tendencies to proceed further and involve all in serious trouble, if not disaster, every American of any persuasion should advocate concessions to conscience and to liberty of belief so long as these are not inimical to the good of all. But whatever interferes with that good and with our fellowship and harmony as members of one body and children of one Father will have to be sternly reprobated.

It is a well-known phenomenon in history that when the best gifts of life in men or nations are not used for benevolent purposes they corrupt, fester and set up internal feuds.

These ailments are characteristic of churches which have little or no evangelizing zeal, and of states whose assets are restricted solely to themselves. If America would remember that her calling as a nation is at stake, the initiation fees now wasted on asinine Ku Kluxism would be expended for relief of suffering and promotion of peace. Her statesmen would no longer deny that she exists, as all nations exist, to do the will of God. They would guide the people of this land to a noble plane of national being. They would insist that international agreements between governments which involve the citizens shall be open, above-board, and of such a nature as to inspire respect for government. They would repudiate territorial aggrandizement and establish tribunals for the settlement of justiciable disputes. They would reduce armaments on sea and land as rapidly as the decrees of the tribunals became operative to lessen the causes of war. The press would desist from malignant descriptions of other nations, meant to distort our outlook on them and to destroy friendly feeling. In brief, were the gigantic resources and mediatorial sovereignty of the Republic dedicated to the reconstruction of Christendom, we are convinced that so praiseworthy an employment of endless powers would call off the dogs of internecine strife.

In broad outline, the American spirit is firmly for these laudable causes. The American conscience has not been easy about our remissness toward them. American honor is sensitive to the charge that we quit the field before the fight was won. American energies have been diverted from those reasonable international responsibilities that preserve self-respect and abolish national difficulties. "Gentlemen," said Lord Nelson to a couple of his squabbling captains, "there is the enemy, and you are comrades to subdue him." The exhortation is apposite for dunderheads covered with Hallow Eve regalia, and no less apposite for contentious fanatics of widely different kinds.

Let us beware of the flood of secularism which carries widespread destruction on its crest. It invades business and makes you greedy of lucre. It invades politics, and makes us careless of convictions. It invades religion, and makes us detest our fellow-believers. It speaks of heaven with the accents of hell. It challenges the holiest rights and deflects us from the most sacred duties. Let us resist it by reconsecrating ourselves to the American spirit. It is the spirit of equal and speedy justice, of lawful freedom, of magnanimity which knows no dehumanizing envyings or revilings. It rejoices in the providential growth of this nation, and ascribes it to the God who gives Himself in perpetual redemption to His offspring. It loves the country where it should ever flourish. But it does not encompass that love about with hate of other nations. Quite otherwise, it recognizes their salient virtues and illustrious men, and hails with delight their democratization. It is not limited to a geographical area, but sweeps around the world as swiftly as the winds that blow across continents and oceans. It is the spirit of courage, love and discipline; of reason arising out of meditative minds. Have we that spirit? Indeed, can any man have it unless he is first possessed by the Over Soul who convinces the world of sin, of righteousness and of a judgment to come? May the breath of God breathe on us now, and surcharge every breast with the tenderness and fidelity befitting citizens of so great a nation and brothers in the family of the one Father!

The Legacy of Peace

"MY peace I give unto you," said Jesus. This is the legacy bequeathed to us by those brave men whom, with undying gratitude, we honor on Armistice Day. With the sanction of Christ we may apply to their sacrifice the words He used of His own. "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends." They laid down their lives for their friends, even for us, and by that act they left us their peace. For in giving their lives they brought the war to a victorious end. Had they failed, there would be peace nowhere to-day save the peace of devastation and of ruin. All the security we now enjoy, the fact that we are permitted to live in our homes to take up again the pursuits of peace, the fact that we have it in our power to achieve the higher things possible only in peace, we owe to them.

And this legacy of peace which they left to us is also the legacy of a righteous cause. There are some who tell us to-day that we should forget the war. If by that is meant its hatreds, its bitterness, we all agree. But when it is insinuated that we fought for no great principles; when it is said we were the victims of propaganda; when it is intimated by a spurious liberalism that there were no clear differences between us and our former foes, since we were all involved in the same system—then we say, "No, let us never forget!" For between us and Prussianism there were world-wide differences. We fought for truths of such far-reaching importance for all mankind that we cannot afford to have them forgotten. All progress depends upon our not forgetting. The original conscience which finally impelled us to enter the war and to do our part must be preserved!

And now, since they left us their peace, how shall we use it? It is one thing to inherit an estate; it is another not to waste it, but to build upon it. This means that peace must be made permanent. They won the peace of victory. Our task is to win the victory of peace.

To promote peace, there is before us the definite proposal to establish a World Court. We in America have long been familiar with the ideal. We have urged it for years. Moreover, it is a court already in existence. And what shall be the decision which we as a nation make regarding it? Shall our partisanship be so bitter that we shut our eyes and refuse to see the real merits of the Court? Shall we let it be defeated by the obstructionist tactics of a few politicians? Or shall they hear from the people a voice so imperative that they dare not disregard it?

We have also new hope to-day that at last a way has been found that will lead to the solution of the vexatious problems which have long hung like a cloud over Europe. The appointment of a commission to determine Germany's capacity to pay is, by itself, not a solution, but it may open the way. For it means that the nations that strove together for a common cause in war are ready now, in spite of many divergences, to work together for that same cause of peace. It means, let us hope, the end of estrangement among the nations that won the war and the beginning of a new era of co-operation.

The great thing is to see to it that the process of recovery is not retarded, that we do not stop until there is peace and friendship among all nations. It is here that our nation has an indispensable part to perform. One of the finest acts in the history of our country was at the time of the Boxer outbreak. Instead of collecting the debt due us, we returned it to China, where it was turned into a fund for sending students to America. It was an act which repaid for itself in the friendship of China a thousand-fold. Can we not do something of like magnanimity to help the nations which in the fury of war bore the brunt of the sacrifice, and which are still our comrades and friends? Certain it is that advice to others to show leniency and forgiveness will have weight only as we show a like spirit ourselves.

Well may we say, "America first," provided always we mean thereby "first in service." Christ's law is, "Of those to whom much has been given shall much be required," and by that standard shall we be judged.

THE OBSERVER

John Clifford

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

THE death of Dr. John Clifford at the ripe age of eighty-seven takes away one of the most forceful as well as one of the most picturesque personalities in the life of the British nation. He had come to be called England's "Grand Old Man" since the death of Gladstone. He was very much like Gladstone in some regards, except that whereas Gladstone, like Mr. Bryan, was conservative in theology while liberal in politics, Dr. Clifford was of the liberal school both in theology and politics. He was born eighty-seven years ago and as a boy worked long hours in a factory, but early in life he felt the stirrings of the prophetic life and suddenly found himself preaching. He immediately came into prominence and by the time he was in the thirties he was pastor of the large Westbourne Park Baptist Church, which pastorate he held until he was eighty. For the last seven years he has been pastor emeritus. The annual New Year's sermon, the review of the past year, became famous. Crowds came from all over London to hear it, and it was printed in full in the papers.

The Westbourne Park pulpit became one of the most famous in the land and crowds turned their footsteps thither. Youth came, for Dr. Clifford was one of the first to blaze the way out into the more liberal interpretation of the doctrines. Early in his life he refused to be bound by the Baptist rules of adult baptism or the closed communion and opened the doors of membership in his church to all believers. Then he turned his attention to the new Biblical scholarship and took his place beside those who took the newer doctrine of inspiration—that it was in the content of the Scriptures, in their progressive revelation of the heart and mind and will of God rather than in verbal accuracy. Likewise, while remaining passionately evangelical to the end, he was among those who might be termed modernists in his statements of the doctrines. He believed that Christianity was the acceptance of the Lordship of Jesus Christ, and he allowed all liberty of interpretation in the Bible and the doctrines to those who made this fundamental act of faith and consecration.

His ministry soon went far beyond the Westbourne Park pulpit. It was not long before he became one of the most popular platform orators in England. He was sought after on all sorts of occasions. He generally found himself the leader in all movements for social reform with which he had anything to do. He headed the Passive Resistance Movement against the Education Act which made Free Churchmen pay taxes to support Anglican schools. Every year for years the officers came and took some of his furniture to sell to pay the taxes. He and the officers became great friends and the annual levy became one of the most famous events in London's social life, just as all London used to turn out when William T. Stead celebrated the anniversary of his having been put in prison for righteousness sake by walking up Fleet Street in his prison garb. But Dr. Clifford became the leader of the protest against this act and for years many followed his example. He was the life and soul of all forward movements and did not hesitate to carry the fight into politics when righteousness demanded it. When the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches was formed he became one of the most enthusiastic members of its Executive Committee and one of the most ardent advocates by pen and voice of the recognition on the part of the churches that they take up the war against war. He was at his work to the end. He was of irrepressible spirit and youthful in mind as well as body away over into old age. He died on the platform just as he had finished an address. He had always said that he expected to die in the pulpit. All the old-time fire and lucidity was in his speech. He finished and sat down in his chair and fell asleep—eighty-seven years old.

I first saw Dr. Clifford when I was attending a conference in London some fifteen years ago, although I had of course read many of his sermons and addresses. A public meeting was being held in one of the halls and three or four rather quiet and commonplace addresses had been made, made by great men, too, bishops and others, but men who had no convictions or were timid about uttering them. The whole atmosphere changed when Dr. Clifford began speaking. It was like a Hebrew prophet coming in among the conventional priests.

I afterwards came to know him well. He was one of the British delegates to the Constance Conference of Church leaders, where the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches was born. I saw much of him at Constance and came all the way back to England with him. We crossed Germany on that August first on which she was massing her troops. There was much despondency in everybody's heart. I remember Dr. Clifford saying as we passed through country where soldiers in masses were going through fields cutting every cabbage off and digging every potato, and as we saw the regiments being massed at the stations and herded into freight trains: "It is just like some giant Samson sweeping his arm across Europe and pulling the temple of civilization down." As we sat in Constance together, Germans, French, British, Americans, Italians, all other nationalities, most of them leaders in the churches, Dr. Clifford said: "If we had begun this twenty-five years ago I believe this war could have been stopped." I am not sure. The people at large still dearly love fighting and killing each other and wait only for the slightest excuse to begin it; but I quote what Dr. Clifford felt very strongly. Perhaps he was right.

The British and American delegates got together again as soon as we reached London, in a sort of continuation committee. The Great War was then upon us. Germany had violated Belgium and everybody felt sure Britain would soon be in the war. There was great discouragement among those who had been working for international good-will. Some of the delegates were inclined to go home, doing nothing. Dr. Clifford made one of the most wonderful pleas for immediate action I ever heard. He insisted that on the day when the world was entering upon war the churches should organize for peace. As a result the organization of the World Alliance was perfected on that day.

In the winter of 1919 I was in London attending some committee meetings and Dr. Jowett invited me to dinner at his home. Dr. Clifford was among the guests and we had a delightful evening together around the fire. I asked innumerable questions about the religious life of England, how the war had affected the churches and about many other things. Dr. Clifford was brimming over with convictions and ideas. He saw that the war had created a new world with new problems, and he was eager to have the churches face them boldly, but he was a little afraid they would not. He was so brave, so fearless, so prophetic himself that he could not endure timidity or complacency in others. He was heart and soul with Dr. Jowett in his conviction that the time had come for the churches to put war into the category of crimes—with slavery, torture, and all other crimes.

Great, brave, fearless soul, he was one of the most passionate of preachers, one of the men of most prophetic vision, and at the same time possessing a keen, vigorous intellect that saw through all sham and cant and grasped the great fundamental principles of any enduring civilization.

The Word of the Lord Endureth Forever

By Rev. John Kelman, D.D.

Minister of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York City

[New York greatly regrets that Dr. Kelman has thought it best to resign from the pastorate of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church. Ill health has forced his decision. Dr. Kelman has accepted a call to the Frognal Presbyterian Church, Hampstead, London.]

"The Word of the Lord endureth forever."—1 Peter 1:25.

YOU have in your hands the most wonderful thing in all the world. It is a sword for smiting and a refuge from the sword. It is the profoundest mystery and the clearest revelation. It is the most terrifying book in the world and also the most comforting. It is the most human thing on earth and also the most divine. Some years ago Dr. Horton in his Yale lectures created much controversy by his insistence upon the larger significance of the phrase, the Word of God, which he widened to include the whole revelation, both in and out of the Bible. It is a valuable and a much needed correction of a somewhat narrow interpretation of revelation, and it is quite true that, as the apostle says, the Word of God is not bound—not even in the boards of a sacred book. Yet, while the phrase covers a far wider area than has often been assigned to it, it is true that it is very specially applicable to the Bible. There was a certain stretch of human history in which revelation was paramount and different from the revelations made to man, either before or after. There was a certain nation which God specially chose as the medium of His revelation of Himself to the world. Many of the thoughts and words of that revelation were written down, some in history, some in poetry, some in other literary forms. All that literature, collected and preserved for the use of future generations in the volume which we call the Bible is so distinctive and unique that it is perfectly legitimate to call it par excellence the Word of God.

The history of the Bible is very remarkable. The Jews received it from generation to generation, and after they had got the writers killed and buried they systematically began the idolatry of the book. They counted not its words only or its chapters, but its very letters, with a superstitious and unintelligent reverence which distracted the attention of men from its real value and message. Yet even to that very meticulous care we are debtors. Had they not preserved it with such superstitious reverence it might never have survived to reach our hands and eyes. The early Christians, to whom the Gospels were sent and the epistles written, took them in their free, human way, accepting them as part of their ordinary life. They read them, not as things apart, but as letters and documents from friends, and so gave the whole that natural treatment and reception which brought upon their lives the spirit of those holy books.

Many of the early Christian fathers were mystics, who saw in the sacred writings more than the unsophisticated could read there, and invented systems of symbolism which made of the plainer statements of Scripture a kind of cryptogram for the initiated. In their time, also, there was introduced the influence of the Greek philosophic spirit, which built up the thoughts and expressions of the Bible into complex dogmatic and creedal form.

The Roman Catholic Church of the middle ages showed its reverence for the Bible by the elaboration and exquisite beauty of its illuminated parchments; but it took over the right of interpretation from the individual to the Church, and, having reserved this right, it used the Scriptures for its own ecclesiastical ends.

The Reformation reopened the Book for common people and proclaimed the liberty of each man to interpret God's message for himself. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, however, Protestantism had developed a hard and lifeless orthodoxy which practically, though not confessedly, reclosed the Book. From this, individuals with strong imagination and fervent faith, broke loose in fantastic private interpretations, went out to seek strange things, and found exactly what they sought. Now, in these latter days, people are recognizing at last that this is not a repository of proof texts, nor a hunting-ground of strange prophecies, but a national literature, expressing and recording God's eternal and growing revelation to living men.

The sense of the value of the holy Scriptures has not only revived, but it has spread throughout the modern world. Recent voices of all sorts might be quoted bearing proof of this. The testimonies of Professor Huxley, Matthew Arnold and Lord Morley are familiar. M. Renan has called it "The great book of consolation for humanity." President Roosevelt has said of it, "No thoughtful man can doubt that to decrease the circulation and use of the Bible among the people would seriously menace the highest interests of civilized humanity." President Lincoln's presidential addresses could never have been written but for its inspiration. Not the least impressive of the modern American testimonies to the Bible are the words of Mark Twain, who said: "Who taught these ancient writers their simplicity of language, their felicity of expression, their pathos, and above all their faculty of sinking themselves entirely out of the sight of the reader, and making the narrative stand out alone and seem to tell itself?" In recent days we have those remarkable testimonies of General Foch, Lord Haig, Lord Roberts, and others, which are well known and often quoted. General Pershing has said to his soldiers, "Hardship will be your lot, but trust in God will give you comfort; temptation will befall you, but the teachings of our Saviour will give you strength." Admiral Sims has added his testimony that, "This Testament is a handbook of manhood; it introduces you to the pattern Man, who shows you what to become and the way to become it."

These are very remarkable testimonies and they prove that the Bible has power over time, as one has said. There are, however, a few voices on the other side. One prominent leader of popular thought has told us that he thinks otherwise. He says: "Floods of sincere but unmerited adulation have been lavished upon the Hebrew Bible. The world has many books of higher literary value. . . . Carlyle is more moral than Jeremiah; Ruskin is superior to Isaiah; Ingersoll, the atheist, is a nobler moralist and a better man than Moses. . . . Sir Thomas More, Herbert Spencer, Thoreau, Matthew Arnold and Emerson are worth more to us than all the prophets." Who is this gentleman of such original literary and moral taste? All his friends answer with one accord, "An honest man." We do not deny it, but it may be permitted to us to remark that there really are other qualities which have some value in dealing with such subjects besides honesty. For my part, I am a little tired of honest men who use their honesty as an excuse for talking mischievous nonsense. Imagine for a moment what Thomas Carlyle or any literary man of first-rate competence would say if he were to read such an account of himself, and to find himself pilloried in any such comparison. Our author has quoted Ruskin as superior to Isaiah. Set against that extraordinary quotation this from Ruskin's own pen: "I opened my Bible just now, yellow now with age, and flexible, but not unclean, with much use. . . . My mother's list of chapters, with which, learnt every syllable accurately, she established my soul in life, has just fallen out of it. . . . This material instillation of my mind in that property of chapters I count, very confidently, the most precious, and, on the whole, the one essential part of my education."

The Bible has been translated into 436 languages. It holds its sway from Norway to Madagascar, and literally from China to Peru. In Hankow during one year the printing press published 1,500,000 copies of it. For the past hundred years in every land its sales have been steadily growing. In one year recently the British and Foreign Bible Society alone published portions of Scripture at the rate of one for every five seconds, day and night; and in the one hundred years of its existence it has sent out over two hundred million copies. The New York Bible Society, which is to-day celebrating Bible Sunday in so many pulpits of our city, has had a long and distinguished career. Its yearly distribution numbers practically five hundred thousand volumes in fifty-three languages. It puts these into the hands of sailors on ships in the harbor, and immigrants on Ellis Island, and soldiers in the Army, and sailors in the Navy. It has done much work among the blind by means of Scriptures published in their type. It distributes the Bible free to those who cannot afford to buy it, but it has proceeded upon the wise principle that its output is always measured by its income, and it never goes into debt.

Let us think once more what this wonderful Book has survived. The flying sketch of its history given a few pages earlier must have suggested this to readers, but it is worth our while to remember in detail the extraordinary career of this Book.

First, it has survived persecution both from pagans and Mohammedans, which has only endeared it to those who have suffered for it, and to those who have received it stained by the blood of others who died in its defense. It has been subjected to ridicule from the days of Celsus on through those of Voltaire to the diminishing stream of such pleasantries which still trickles in outlandish places. Men have laughed at the Book for nineteen hundred years, and when their laughter proved unavailing, now and again they have turned spiteful. But the Bible has gone serenely on, unaware of all that laughter, like the Master himself, who, passing through the midst of them, went His way.

Again, the Bible has suffered from much misinterpretation. The subtleties of allegorizing have in each age tended to withdraw it from the understanding of the plain, average man, insisting that the sentences of the Scripture meant not what they said, but something else, which could only be explained by those who had the clue. Not less hostile to its real effect have been the subtleties of theologians who have turned the warm-blooded records of experience into the statements of a cold metaphysic. Such influences as these would long ago have sent any other book to the rustiest shelves of old libraries. But the plain man still possesses this Book and understands it quite well. He shakes his head over high-sounding theories about it and says he leaves all that kind of thing to scholars. But when the evening falls and the lamps are lighted he puts on his spectacles and reads his Bible.

In the third place, the Bible has suffered from the false protection of the Church. The Church of Rome has claimed the exclusive right of interpretation, and has withdrawn it from the average man, except as the Church chose to interpret it. The underlying principle of this policy is that the reader must accept the Bible because the Church tells him to do so, while the sounder principle of Protestantism is that we accept the Church insofar as the Bible and our own experience tell us to accept it. To accept the Bible upon the authority of the Church is about as intelligent a principle as that which is said to have convinced some savage tribes who confessed their belief in the truth of the Bible after they had seen magic lantern slides depicting its scenes. Our contention is that the Bible finds confirmation in the spiritual experience of men of all generations, and so confirms its claim to be the authentic Word of God to man.

Once more, the Bible has suffered from the false claims put forth on behalf of it by its friends. In a mistaken attempt to emphasize its sacredness many good people have reduced it to a mere collection of individual and independent texts which have produced a dead book, inconsistent with itself and presenting no intelligible unity of thought or progress of revelation. Instead of that, we hold that the Bible is the living revelation of God's Word at work upon a nation's soul, presented to us at the various stages of that nation's development and culminating in the perfect vision of the word made flesh in Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

Any of these mistaken methods would have been enough to ruin the influence of any other book. It would seem as if its friends and its foes alike had been working for its destruction. There has been no other book which has been so unintelligently dealt with and none which has been so variously interpreted. The open knife of Jehudi has been always hacking at it; the Bible has been burning in every age, and yet it is not consumed. This is a stupendous fact in literature. It is an absolutely unique phenomenon in the history of books. In view of this, the question inevitably arises, Why has this Book survived? What is the secret of its vitality? And the answer is, that each generation finds it equally quick and powerful. In the great story of Nansen's "Farthest North" one of the dreariest and most pathetic touches is that which records that in the two years when Nansen and Johansen traveled together through the long nights and days of the Arctic their only literature was the Nautical Almanac. Contrast that with such stories—and they were very frequent—as that of the soldier in the recent war who discovered for the first time the Gospel according to St. John, and was found reading it over and over again as the most amazing piece of writing he had ever seen.

What, then, is the secret of this Book's marvelous power?

1. Men find themselves in it. The search for oneself is old as humanity, and there is nothing in ancient Greece so characteristic as the answer of the oracle of Apollo, Know thyself. It was a great oracle, but it was no guide; and men going down from Delphi with these words in their ears were bewildered rather than instructed. But in the Bible is found a guide to self-knowledge as well as a demand for it. It reveals to men both their actual and their ideal selves, their sins and their possibilities, their conscience and their hope. Thus it has educated the world, not by any one set of texts so much as by the general effect which its perusal has had upon the generations. It has given to man a fuller, saner and more accurate account of himself than all other literature has given. When they read the works of Browning or Tennyson or any other of the great secular writers certain men find themselves, when they are in certain moods; but in the Bible all men may find themselves, whatever mood they may be in. It is this self-discovery, reaching down to the depths of conscience and up to the heights of aspiration, which is the first great service which the Bible has done for humanity.

2. Men find their fellow-men in the Bible. In our estimate of our fellows we are like blind people groping in a world of misunderstandings. Now and again a finger-tip strays upon a face, or a hand touches a hand in the dark. But it must be confessed that we have little real understanding of each other apart from some authentic guide. The literature of all nations has earnestly tried to reveal to us our unknown neighbors and make us familiar with our fellow-men. Yet we have never quite found them, and to a larger extent we continue to live alone, whether in gaiety or in austerity, while the procession of other mortals passes by. Still more is this the case with regard to those whom we think of as hostile to us or as strangers. Very few people even try to understand the point of view of such outsiders with any seriousness or thoroughness. They are simply left alone, catalogued as enemies or as aliens, hated, or maligned, or feared, but never understood. Still more isolated are the dead. They have passed from us out into the darkness, and the heart of many a mourner knows how sadly they are cut off from the land and the converse of the living, in that strange world of being or of nothingness into which no safe pathway leads.

Into all this world of isolation the Bible has entered. It brings with it a new world of human fellowship and understanding. It tells us how we may consider our neighbor in the sense of trying to get at his point of view, to put ourselves in his place and imagine how we should feel and think about things if we were he. It is not too much to say that while each of us must necessarily abide in the solitude of our own personality to a great extent, yet the Bible has revealed us to each other as far as it is possible for any soul thus to be revealed. As to the aliens and the enemies, the Bible has convinced us that they, too, are human creatures and must be regarded as such. They may have to be vanquished, but they may also be won. They have human hearts and consciences, human experience and destiny, just as we have, and until we have sought and found them, under the guidance of Jesus Christ, we have not fulfilled the true law of life.

As to the dead, an instance in the career of Dr. Egerton Young seems to express all that needs to be said. He was visiting a tribe of Eskimo Indians among whom there had been of late a plague which slew great numbers of their children. The tribe sat around him as he talked to them about the Gospel with stolid indifference and frowning faces. His Bible again came to the rescue, and a sudden inspiration led him to spring up and shout aloud to them, I know where your dead children are! From that moment he had them in his hand.

3. Men find their God in it. There is a characteristic story of the war which tells how one man in the Highland Light Infantry was shot in the battle of the Aisne, but the bullet struck a Bible which he carried in his breast pocket and penetrated a certain distance through the pages. When he opened it he found that the text at which its impact had stopped was, Ye call me Master and Lord, and ye say well, for so I am. We are all of us aware, not only of our solitariness among other mortals, but of the awful solitude which surrounds us in this most mysterious universe. The vast empty spaces through which we move with our wheeling earth strike the imaginative spirit with a sense of loneliness that might almost bring madness, were it not that we are all aware of something which seems like a spiritual presence, hidden indeed and yet mysteriously at work, around us. This presence is suggested in nature. It is felt in all high and serious art. It explains the true meaning of the sense of high comradeship felt by the scientific man when he discovers new wonders in the make of things. Great and tragic instances, such as the recent war, seem to convince large masses of men of its reality and power. Yet in all these ways it is an indefinable and indefinite thing, a conviction that never focuses itself into clear and sharp-edged experience. Now, the wonder of the Bible is that it focuses this vague sense of God until a living face looks out at us from every page of the Book. To study the Bible is not to read a book; it is to be arrested by a personality. We do not believe in God because the Bible tells us that He is there; we believe the Bible because in its pages we find Him unmistakable and clear. For we know the voice of God when we hear it. There is something in human nature that responds to His appeal. No part of life is intelligible until it has found its counterpart in the divine, and this is precisely what the Bible does for man. Luther insists upon this and repeats it and re-repeats it in his own fashion: Thou must thyself decide, thy neck is at stake, thy life is at stake. . . . Thou must boldly and definitely say, That is God's Word and on that will I risk body and life. That is what is meant by that grand old phrase, The Word of God comes home to me. It is a case in which deep answers unto deep, in which the soul recognizes the meaning of its own experience, and that which has been a vague and half-conscious sense of indefinable presence changes to the glow of recognition and the thrill of love.

Any part of the revelation recorded in the Bible is in its measure capable of doing this, and actually did it to the people of the time when it appeared. But most especially, and for all time, this has happened in the revelation of Jesus Christ. In the Bible, He appears as the revealer of God and the interpreter of human life. The person of Christ has often been discussed, but one cannot help feeling that the main thing needed is that the Bible, which describes Him, should be read so that men may find out what He actually is reported to have said and done, and the impression which He made upon those who stood nearest to Him and understood Him best. But for the Bible, Jesus Christ would now be a mere name which signified practically nothing. Through the Bible, He is to-day, to a far wider circle than ever in the past, the power of God unto salvation.

What, then, is the relation of all this to ourselves and our own lives? We have all heard stories of people who have paid enormous sums of money for rare editions of the Scriptures whose fictitious value depended upon some printer's error or some odd expression. Such collectors are not necessarily careful readers of the Book, and are reputed sometimes to be so proud of their possession, and so afraid of losing it as to lock it away in some strong safe. Like them, we too have paid a dear price for our Bible, or our ancestors have paid it—a dear price, not in money only, but in blood and tears. Have we paid that price only to boast of it as a possession and to lock it away in places where it is never read? And, if that is all, has the historic price of the holy Scriptures been worth while? If we lock the Scriptures away in the safe of our praise, our approval, our admiration, we may get them out of our way just as securely as if we had them in the deepest of safety vaults. A famous young blood in Oxford is reported to have boasted to one of his professors of the enormous number of his books and to have asked the professor what he would advise him to do with them, to which the laconic reply was, "I would advise you to read them." So our first duty and wisdom is to read the Bible—to read it not as a compliment to its author, but for our own soul's sake; to read it in order that we may be educated men and women—in order that we may discover ourselves, and one another, and our God; to read it, not as a last resort when we have nothing else to read, but as the exercise upon which our highest interests depend, as the experiment on whose issue all that makes life permanently worthy and blessed hangs. Having read the Bible, it is our business first to see that we understand it, not in any recon-dite, or conventional, or traditional sense, but in a frank, human understanding of words that were obviously meant to be understood. Next it is our duty to obey it and then to send it on. That is the object and justification for all Bible societies. They are not repositories and distributors of so much paper and printer's ink. They are guardians and heralds of a vital spirit, which, coming out upon the world from God, redeems the world through all its generations.

Yes, and the question changes. We have been discussing what we are to do with the Bible. It will be well for us if we remember that there is another question, namely, What is the Bible going to do with us? Christ said long ago, The word that I have spoken unto you, the same shall judge you. It is true that the word of Christ is not only a strict but also a merciful judge. Yet every Bible, shut or open, neglected or studied, is a judgment-seat for men; and it will be well for us indeed if our treatment of this Book, both in respect of our private use of it and our distribution of it to others, may stand unashamed before the judgment-seat of Christ.

In Teheran, among the inquirers who are learning about Christianity from the missionaries are a Moslem mollah, that is, a teacher, an Arab who is through with Islam, a high officer in the Persian army, a young Mohammedan and a Jew.

In Elat, Africa, a band of Big Brothers is organized to help in looking out for the real welfare of a hundred smaller boys. Each Big Brother receives a weekly allowance of home-made soap and oil, and so is enabled to inspire ten small boys in his charge toward cleanliness. Big Brothers here at home might be helpful in a similar way.

We have heard a good deal of the difficulty of converting Moslems to Christianity. But Persia is rather an exception to the general condition in Islam. Six young Persians are studying for the ministry and Moslem converts who preach Christianity in Tabriz are not molested or interrupted. We are on the way to seeing a church of converted Moslem Persians.

The World's Sunday School Association, in its call to the convention to be held at Glasgow next June, includes this fine sentence: "The influence of the Christian churches and the thirty millions and more members of the Sunday-schools of the world ought to be a force sufficiently intelligent and influential to create a mind and a heart attitude that is Christian among the youth of the oncoming generations that will forever cast out the spirit that breeds war." With the right instruction in our church schools we could be sure that thirty years hence the United States would be a part of the best world organization for peace then existent.

The Problem of Turkey

By Rev. James L. Barton, D.D.

Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions

PART II.

HOW OTHERS FEEL ABOUT THE WORK IN TURKEY.

THE American Board can continue work in Turkey only with the backing of its supporters at home. This is true of any and all of its fields of action, but it seems especially important in the case of Turkey that the Board and the missionaries should have back of them the unqualified approval and the intercessory prayers of an unusually wide circle of friends and co-workers throughout the country. The task is too colossal to be undertaken except in soul-searching and whole-hearted consecration.

To get the situation well before the Board's constituency a series of conferences or forums were held this spring with corporate members and leading pastors and laymen across the country from Massachusetts to Minneapolis. To these conferences, where reporters were excluded, were gathered from 150 to 300 Congregational leaders. In general, the afternoon was given to a presentation of the situation in Turkey, after which an hour or more was devoted to questions, discussions and prayer.

These conferences were held in Boston, Springfield, Providence, Hartford, New Haven, New York City, Cleveland, Chicago and Minneapolis. The same subject has been laid before Congregational clubs in Boston, Worcester, New York, Chicago and Minneapolis.

It is of profound interest to all that in every case the voluntary conclusions of the gatherings have been that there is no alternative but for the Board to continue in Turkey. In some cases formal resolutions were passed.

The situation in the Near East, and the difficulties which confront the work of the American Board there, were laid before the Foreign Missions Conference of North America in January and a resolution was unanimously voted expressing the opinion of the conference that the American Board should continue its work in Turkey as a sacred responsibility and trust, even in the face of overwhelming difficulties.

It is true that objections have been raised in the discussions and many and deep-seated prejudices against doing anything for Turks have been revealed, but in spite of these it has seemed to be the opinion of our widely scattered constituency that to go forward in Turkey, if we are permitted so to do, is manifestly the duty and privilege of the Board.

At Lausanne in November and December last year and in January, 1923, and later in the State Department, the opinion has been expressed and urged that the missionaries and missionary institutions, as far as possible, be maintained in action. It was under that suggestion that I went to Smyrna and Constantinople in January. Diplomatically, the continuance of missionary operations in Turkey, now and in the immediate future, is looked upon as of a far-sighted and strategic importance for holding open in that country the door of Christian approach to a desperately needy people. The Secretary of State has recently confirmed this position with renewed emphasis.

In January in Constantinople a group of some forty or more missionaries were assembled for conference. There were present men and women who had been in Turkey for from one to forty years. Some were there who had faced and lived through all the horrors of the war years. The marks of suffering were upon their faces and the scars of years of unspeakable hardship and peril were upon their bodies. This group of men and women had counted their lives not dear unto themselves. One by one they had laid many of their former companions and associates to rest in the soil of the land for which they had died. They had stood unflinching in the face of physical peril and the pestilence that stalked at noonday and at midnight.

Of these the question was asked, Shall the American Board continue work in Turkey? For two days the question was considered from all sides, and yet not one expressed any other opinion than that the work must go on. We can do no better than to quote freely from the findings of that conference. We must not forget that those who produced these conclusions were the ones who must carry out the program of continuation. They were making these decisions for themselves, and they knew what the cost would be. They said:

We believe that the abandonment or serious curtailment of the efforts of the American Board in Turkey would be a betrayal of the trust laid upon us by God and by the Christian Church; it would be a denial of the vital power of the Gospel of Christ to meet the needs of the Moslem world; it would mean the abandonment of the accumulated value of missionary lives and deaths in the past century at a time when that inheritance of the Board's sacrifices in the past is a mighty asset, and is the assurance of a successful reopening of the work temporarily suspended.

While we recognize that the events of recent years will make missionary operations extremely difficult, and that the attitude of the ruling class of Turks compels us to expect serious restrictions and handicaps to our work, yet, trusting in the winning power of the love of God in Christ Jesus, we are not dismayed by the difficulty of our task, and we are willing to work on under any restriction likely to be laid upon us by an unfriendly government, convinced that, however restricted, the influence of missionary lives and personal contacts during the next few years will have a potency that will abundantly justify the patient sacrifice involved.

We are further convinced from our personal knowledge of the people that while there is, it is true, a large class of Turks who do not want us and who are bitterly opposed to our work, there are far larger numbers of Turks and Moslems in this land whose need and sense of need is greater than ever before. Many of these are immediately approachable and will welcome the help that we can offer them. In educational, medical and social lines this welcome is already outspoken and urgent. And we are convinced that the opportunity for direct evangelistic approach, through the spoken and printed word, is also a challenge to the Board and to us to go forward.

Even if the Church in America should not rally to our support, as we firmly believe it will, we, individually, are fully determined, whether with or without large reinforcements and financial backing, to put our lives into friendly approach to the peoples of this land, believing that to be the largest service which we can render to our Master in the coming years.

This from the missionaries in Turkey! It is of such that the poet wrote:

"They climbed the steep ascent of heaven,
Through peril, toil, and pain;
O God, to us may grace be given
To follow in their train."

THE PRESENT OUTLOOK.

No one would venture to predict the extent and form of work the American Board will be able to carry on in Turkey under the new treaty. The old capitulations are abolished and there is little to take their place.

At Lausanne, General Ismet Pasha, the spokesman for the Turkish government and Minister of Foreign Affairs of that government, declared to Ambassador Child, as well as to representatives of the American Board, that they desired American missionaries, educators and physicians to remain in the country and carry on their work as before. He went so far as to put into writing: "I hope above all things that Americans will not worry about the future of their educational and philanthropic institutions in Turkey. We want these institutions to stay, and have no intention of adopting laws that will embarrass the continuation of the admirable American altruistic work among our people." The same sentiment was expressed by Dr. Fouad Bey, a Turkish unofficial representative recently in the United States.

The attitude of some officials in Turkey has not been wholly friendly. Dr. Adnan Bey, Governor of Constantinople and former Minister of the Interior at Angora, has shown himself to be hostile to the continuation of American missionary medical work in the country, on the ground that they have more doctors now than can find employment. It is not known whether he speaks the mind of his government.

An official note prepared at Lausanne by the Turkish delegation states that American religious institutions, schools and hospitals, as well as relief organizations recognized as existing in Turkey before the war, are fiscally to be treated upon a footing of equality with similar Turkish institutions and organizations. Property rights are recognized in the treaty, and the representatives of the two governments are discussing the methods of presenting claims for indemnity.

Under the new order, as provided by the treaty, the relations of Americans to the Turkish government will be changed from what they were prior to the war. The capitulations are abrogated and the status of Americans in Turkey, as fixed by the treaty, will be like that of Turkish subjects, in respect to the laws of the country. It will not be an easy matter to make the necessary readjustments in the conduct of missionary, educational and philanthropic work.

It is impossible to measure the import of the separation of Church and State by which the religious establishments of Islam heads up in the Caliph at Constantinople, while the affairs of State center in the Grand National Assembly in Angora. The Turks repeatedly affirmed at Lausanne that Church and State were now separate, and that there was absolute religious freedom in Turkey. It is impossible to believe that such a fundamental and even revolutionary change can be practically perfected without a long period of trial. And yet the attempt is in itself of startling significance and may mean much or little.

At present seventy-eight missionaries of the American Board are continuing their work under the laws of the Angora government. Six important high schools, one school of religion and one college are carrying on full work. In Smyrna, where the International College, closed for a few months after the tragedy of the fall of 1922, was reopened in January, 1923, a large enrollment of Turkish pupils seems assured. The missionary hospitals, long functioning in Aintab and Adana, were never more pressed with eager patients. These are almost all Turks who cannot fail to receive new impressions of the living message of Christianity. In Marash, a smaller hospital, formerly controlled by a German mission, and now temporarily under the American Board, reports seven thousand treatments, ninety per cent. of the patients being Moslem. Permission has just been granted by the Turkish government for another doctor to go to Talas, in the far interior, there to reopen a hospital for some time closed.

CAST DOWN BUT NOT DESTROYED.

The work of the American Board in Turkey has not been destroyed, although it has met with disaster.

The work of Jesus Christ was not terminated when He had been betrayed by one of His disciples, denied by another, forsaken by all, and crucified by Roman soldiers.

The early Church was not destroyed when the powerful emperors of Rome in close succession arrayed against the infant Church all the forces of the empire, backed by enraged jealousy and implacable hatred.

The Christian Church in the island of Madagascar was not destroyed when the hostile queen brought against the Church and all Christians the imperial persecuting forces apparently so successful that no visible indication remained of a vestige of Christianity. At the death of the persecuting queen it was found that the church membership had doubled during the period of persecution and martyrdoms.

Christianity in China was not destroyed and the efforts of a century of Christian missions wiped out when the Empress Dowager essayed, with the agencies of government under her control, to eliminate from the empire all foreigners, and especially the foreign religion. Hundreds of missionaries and missionaries' children and tens of thousands of Christian Chinese were put to death. Subsequent history shows that this was but the beginning of the Christian conquest of China.

In all history persecutions have scattered believers who went into exile preaching the Gospel. Apparent physical defeat has again and again proven but the beginning of a new era of spiritual advance. Barriers to Christian progress have repeatedly been burned away by the fires of persecution. New doors of opportunity, have been opened by the shock of the forces of evil in their destructive onslaught. By the blood of martyrdoms the Church of Jesus Christ has risen from the ashes of its destruction into a new physical and spiritual resurrection.

The work in Turkey has been swept as with a besom of destruction, but we can even now see tokens of new life and power and of possible opportunities not before realized. We do not attempt to explain the providences that have produced present physical conditions; they are beyond the reach of the human mind.

We turn to history for our encouragement, to the promises for our assurance, to the God of missions for our spiritual equipment, and to the command of our Lord Jesus Christ for our marching orders.

That which is seen is temporal, but that which is unseen is eternal.

CHRISTMAS BOOK REVIEW

Poetry and Drama

PLAYS OF JACINTO BENAVENTE

Third Series. Translated from the Spanish with an Introduction by JOHN GARRETT UNDERHILL. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. pp. 218. $2.50.

The four plays here presented are "The Prince who Learned Everything out of Books," "Saturday Night," "In the Clouds," "The Truth." Benavente is the chief dramatist of Spain and these plays representatives of his genius. They are very wide apart in their subject. The first play is a very lovely allegorical drama. "Saturday Night" is realism of the starkest kind and very unpleasant, if powerful reading. It is an exploitation of the underworld and is evidently placed in Monte Carlo. Princes and circus girls are all jumbled together—wickedness and tragedy run riot. "In the Clouds" mirrors with great detail, the emptiness and hardship of middle-class life in Madrid. "Truth" is a drama of the spirit, and there is little action, but the most revealing kind of conversation. For those who wish to know some of the tendencies of modern continental drama this book is very valuable.

THE COMPLETE POEMS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $4.

There are thousands who will welcome this book and Scribner's Sons deserve the thanks of all lovers of poetry for issuing this complete edition of one of the sweetest singers of all times. Here are the old favorites in "The Child's Garden of Verses" and fugitive poems gathered from the novels and many periodicals, all brought together in beautiful pages. What better Christmas gift-book could be thought of. Happy that child who was brought up, as some of us were, on Stevenson. Many of the later poems will be quite new to the reader but they are all of them Stevenson..

THE POETIC EDDA

Translated from the Icelandic with an Introduction and Notes. By HENRY ADAMS BELLOW. Two volumes in one. The American Scandinavian Foundation New York. pp. 624. $4.

This volume, published in the remarkable series of the Scandinavian Classics, really deserves a page to itself, but it is so fine a Christmas present to make to anyone interested in literature or who loves poetry that we must refer to it here. The American Scandinavian Foundation has rendered a great service both to all scholars and all readers of poetry in publishing this translation of the Poetic Edda, the great storehouse of the Northern and Germanic mythology. It is a collection of practically all the poems dealing with the Norse mythology and with some hero stories outside the Northern nations. No one knows their authors and no doubt they existed orally, as did the Greek poems, long before they were ever put into manuscript. They came into being long before Christianity touched these Northern lands and therefore reflect unalloyed heathen sentiment—and are valuable to the student of religion as well as the student of literature. Mr. Bellows has made a beautiful translation keeping both the rhythm of the ancient metre and what is better, the ancient spirit.

Travel

MY NESTORIAN ADVENTURE IN CHINA

By FRITZ HOLM. Fleming H. Revell Company. pp. 335. $3.50.

Dr. Holm, since his resignation from the Danish navy, has been war correspondent, explorer, writer and lecturer. Jointly with Dr. Carus, he had previously written concerning "The Nestorian Monument" which was erected in China in 781 A.D., a movement of the first mission to China that ever made converts to the Christian Church. The present volume is the second of an archeological adventure written in a popular style recounting the expedition led by Dr. Holm to Sian-Fut, in the interior of China, and the bringing out of a two-ton replica.

Here is an enthusiastic travel book of an unusual sort written by a man who has seen much of the world and who meets it with zest. Photographs and maps make this an attractive gift book.

CHINA OF YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY

By E. T. WILLIAMS. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. pp. 600. $2.

This book is written by one of the outstanding American authorities on China. Professor Williams has been charge d'affaires at Peking and Chief of the Division of Far Eastern Affairs in our State Department, has lived many years in China and is now Professor of Oriental languages and literature in the University of California.

It is significant that he begins his exhaustive book with the quotation from Paul, "God hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation."

It is not possible in the short space available for this review to speak at length on the features of this admirable book, but we feel it important to call attention to so full a report concerning a "newly discovered" country.

The opening chapter shows the infinite variety of China and marks the contrasts between people, customs, and scenery of different sections. The chief interests of the volume are historical, social, economic, and religious. One will find here brief statements on Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism; the story of Korea in relation with China and Japan (including the effect of the Washington Conference of 1922) and the wonderfully interesting story of Chinese village government and the present contest for democracy. Six pages of important dates in Chinese history and ten pages of Bibliography are included.

A colored copy of Rand McNally's standard map of China and a number of photographs and plans add to the attractions of the book.

NORWEGIAN TOWNS AND PEOPLE

By ROBERT MEDILL. Robert M. McBride and Company. pp. 85. $1.50.

An attractive book, well illustrated with good photographs and written in a simple and modest style "to re-create for the reader the atmosphere of Norway rather than to give a detailed catalogue of information about it." People and scenery are described from the traveler's point of view. Bergen and Christiania are sketched as modern cities, Trondhjem as the ancient capitol of the Vikings, and Hammerfest as the world's northernmost city. Glumpses are given of rural Norway and of the fjords and fields and one chapter is devoted to Spitzbergen, over which the Treaty of Versailles gave Norway the mandate.

Altogether a valuable aid to overcoming our vast ignorance concerning a fascinating country and a fine people.

FINDING THE WORTH WHILE IN EUROPE

By ALBERT B. OSBORNE. Robert M. McBride and Company. pp. 255. $2.50.

This is a revised and enlarged edition of a book for the European travel, written by a rambler who found the picturesque and beautiful, not only in accustomed but in unaccustomed places. The author having written before the war and since dying, T. R. Yharra has undertaken the revision, which he has carried out in the same spirit of enthusiastic rambling among the wonders of Europe. Furthermore he has had added a chapter on Norway, Swtden and Denmark, which is a real improvement in the book.

The book should be of great value in aiding the untrained traveler to approach beauty, wherever he finds it in Europe, with a freedom that will add much to his joy. The last chapter gives some hints concerning itineraries and the time needed to see the things described in the book. There are numerous photographs of an uncommon sort.

Essays

CLASSICS OF THE SOUL'S QUEST

By R. E. WELSH, M.A., D.D. The George H. Doran Company. pp. 342. Price $2.00.

Dr. Welsh is the Professor of Church History in the Presbyterian College, McGill University, Montreal, but he has been giving talks to the many students who came to hear him on the life of the Spirit as expressed in the great books of the ages. This extremely interesting and helpful volume is the expansion of these lectures. It begins with St. Augustine's Confessions and comes down through the centuries dealing with the writings of Dante, Tauler, Thomas A' Kempis, Bunyan, Law, Wesley, Tolstoy, Marcus Aurelius, Tagore, Pascal, Amiel, Newman, and others. It is a fascinating book and we do not wonder the students from all departments of the university flocked to hear him. It is a most suggestive volume for preachers and will greatly enrich the life of any reader.

THE CONQUEST OF NERVES

By J. W. COURTNEY, M.D. The Macmillan Company. pp. 209. $1.00.

This is one of the most helpful books of the season. It is written to show how the overcoming of nervous troubles is largely in our own hands. Indeed, in reviewing the methods of Christian Science, the Emmanuel Movement, and Dr. Courtney has much sympathy with this movement—the New Thought methods and others he shows how they, after all, with all the excrescences and so forth can be reduced to self-help. To quote the author's own words, "In these pages there will be taught the things that are vital to their recovery: that there is absolutely no royal road to health: that the return to nervous vigor is mainly a matter of the grace of God and their own intelligently directed efforts: and that psychotherapeutics and auto-suggestion, reduced to terms of common understanding, mean self-discipline, and have nothing whatever to do with some vague, subtle, curative force which can be injected into their equally vague subconsciousness or subliminal minds either by a divinely favored individual or by themselves. They will be taught, furthermore, that mind is not the absolute master of the body, but that both are alike implicated in the disorder and demand the same attention; that whatever of real value there is in unorthodox methods is borrowed from medical science; and finally, that they are in nowise called upon to do violence to their intelligence or—in plain English—to make downright fools of themselves in the effort to be well."

THE MAGIC OF COMMON SENSE

By GEORGE FREDERICK WATTS. E. P. Dutton and Company. pp. 107. $1.60.

This book is a discovery. It is a series of seven essays dealing with practically every problem facing the human mind and dealing with these problems from the point of view of a sage who has studied life, and analyzed human experience and read the great book for many years, and then given us his final estimate of all things. The book is as succinct as the pages of Lord Bacon and as full of quotations as the pages of Sir Thomas Browne. At first we wondered if it could be interesting—it seemed so compacted, so meaty—but after three or four pages we found ourselves engrossed in it and we have read it again with increasing delight.

THE CHEERFUL GIVER

Essays by SAMUEL MCHORD CROTHERS. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $2.00.

All one needs to say is that this is a new volume of essays by Dr. Crothers. It is as delightful as "The Pardoner's Wallet" and the other volumes. The essays bear such titles as "The Cheerful Giver," "Leisure While You Wait," "The Leisurable Hours of John Wesley," "Some Alleviations of Our Responsibilities," "Satan Among the Biographers," "Listening In on the Irish Question," "New Poets and Poets Not So New," "History for the Ageing," "The Conservatism of Guide Posts," "The Laboratory Method in Morals." Dr. Crothers' observations are shrewd and everything comes under his observation. His humor is unfailing. "Satan Among the Biographers" is delicious. In all these essays there is both praise and criticism, but it is always gentle. It is a good thing that the art of essays writing does not perish. So long as such men as Crothers, Sedgwick, Phelps and Van Dyke remain among us the traditions of Holmes, Curtis and Howells will not perish.

Religion

SOME ASPECTS OF THE LIFE OF JESUS

By GEORGE BERGUER. Harcourt, Brace and Company. pp. 332.

This volume is an endeavor to apply the new methods of psychology and psychoanalysis to the life of Jesus, "not with any pretense of arriving at definite conclusions, but rather with the less ambitious hope of understanding a little better a history, which, for the very reason that it interests us in the highest degree, distresses us at times because it still contains, as many feel, so much that is obscure and remote." The author quotes with approval the words of Professor August Bouvier: "If we are to advance here (in the world of faith), we must desire neither to be orthodox nor to be liberal; we must desire to be intrinsically Christian; that is to say, theologians to whom nothing that is inward and true in orthodoxy is alien, but whose method remains that of a sovereign liberalism."

Mr. Berguer's approach to his subject will be one that will arouse violent antipathy in the minds of some, nor, even in the minds of those who approach his book with an open mind, will it fail to reveal certain weaknesses in Mr. Berguer's own method. I suppose that in centering attention on one's own method, one is inclined to slight other methods, and yet it hardly seems reasonable to assume that in view of the work of modern psychologists "religion to-day appears to us as a branch of the mental activity of humanity." That is a highly inadequate statement. Nor is it quite fair to say, "the psychology of religion, then, studies facts, not ideas; states of consciousness, not doctrines." Such declarations are the words of special pleading. On the other hand, there can be no doubt but that the theological approach to the life of Jesus has often been made arid and futile by the unreal interests on which it has been based.

The method of the book, then, is that of modern psychology, and in this the author adopts Professor George Coe's division into two types of research: first, from the structural point of view, which leads us to approach the life of Jesus from the angle of its resemblance to our own, and secondly, from the functional point of view, which directs our attention to what separates Him from others, and helps us to observe whatever is unique in Him.

The author begins by describing the mystery religions, and draws a parallel between the psychology of these religions and that of the Israelitish prophecy of the seventh and eighth centuries B.C. He points out a parallel especially in "the tendency constantly manifested by the religious soul to fashion divine figures and create a type of salvation that is better adapted than the old gods and beliefs of the past to the deepest needs of the personality and the race." While he points out the parallels between Graeco-Roman paganism and the Hebrew prophecies, he does not fail to notice the most striking contrast when he says, "But in the Jewish line, there appeared at a certain moment in the history of the race a historical personality who gathered up in himself the lines that had been sketched prophetically, and found in himself the secret of living and the strength to live the highest and most divine conceptions of his race, to desire to realize them, and to offer himself towards their realization." As this quotation implies, Mr. Berguer is a staunch believer in the historicity of Christ and in the fundamental reliability of the Gospel records, although he points out that the evangelists wrote "works of edification" rather than history in the modern sense, and that we should bear this in mind in dealing with the documents. His three chapters on this subject are excellent summaries of the point of view of modern scholarship.

Before taking up the immediate events of Jesus' life, the author stresses the fact that at least three psychologies must be taken into consideration: First, that of the Christian community in which the Gospels were born; second, that of the author of the Gospel of John; third, that of Christ himself. "apprehended as far as possible through these two prisms from which we must escape as often as we can by comparing texts and correcting, any flagrant distortions that appear." It is unnecessary to state that the following chapters provide a fascinatingly interesting interpretation of the events of Jesus' life. The division into chapters is as follows: 1, The Birth of Jesus; 2, Childhood and Youth; 3, Baptism and Temptation; 4, Teachings of Jesus; 5, Miracles; 6, The Transfiguration; 7, Personality of Jesus; 8, The Death of Jesus; 9, The Resurrection. It would be unreasonable in a brief review to try to deal with all the issues which are here raised, but it would be equally unreasonable not to bear witness that the present method of approach, which is sometimes a little dogmatic, like every new attempt, yet sheds a great light of vital interest on the beautiful record of the Gospels. One feels that modern psychology is in still too uncertain a state to be called a science in any strict sense, but there can be no doubt that it is going to refresh the arid wastes of the dogmatic approach to religion.

Having finished the main study of the book, Mr. Berguer appends a most graceful and scholarly essay which bears witness to Jesus' continuous appeal to the heart of humanity. This essay bears the title, "The Poetry of Jesus." "A poet is a man who feels the universe taking life within himself, who sees in the spectacle of every-day existence the reflection of higher verities which the human eye hardly dares to contemplate. Jesus was a poet in this sense, more of a poet and a better poet than the greatest of men."

The book is completed with a bibliography of the important lives of Jesus that have been published since the beginning of the nineteenth century, and in this list are included certain studies which, while not bearing the title of "Lives," still concern the greatest of all subjects—the understanding (so far as may be possible) of Jesus Christ.

THE DISCOVERY OF GOD

By BASIL KING. The Cosmopolitan Book Corporation, New York. pp. 265. $2.00.

Many people were helped by Mr. King's book on mental healing, and even more have enjoyed his novels. This book is frankly about the Bible, which he describes as a history of the quest of the human race for God. The Church has many allies in warfare against materialism and selfishness, but few outside her own ranks who are interested in the Bible, and she will no doubt welcome the aid to her teaching ministry which thus unexpectedly comes from the Episcopalian novelist of Cambridge. It is another sign that our age is tremendously interested in religion.

This book might be called the "Novelists' Old Testament," for the author gives to the story of man's seeking after God all the interest of a novel. It is not for the minister; it covers too much familiar ground. It is for the man or woman who never learned in Sunday-school to visualize Bible characters as real people groping after the Father of Spirits. It is for the person who wants a new thread on which to string the treasures of the Old Testament. The clue is the idea of progressive revelation. To Mr. King the Bible is the story of the world-long struggle between spiritual and material forces, with the spiritual (revealed completely only in Christ) only beginning to win. Reverently, without undermining the older forms of faith, the author traces the thought of God through the Old Testament to its culmination in the teaching of Jesus that He is the Universal Father.

The book will not satisfy the scholar; Mr. King has not digested the valuable material now available about the prophets. His handling of Biblical material is not discriminating. His treatment of the person and spirit of Christ are not deep. He colors everything with a Hegelian theory of conflict. But the book was not written for scholars, and it will no doubt help many readers to feel the presence of God as a force in their own lives, and to turn anew to the Bible as God's own story of the steep and hard ascent of the human race towards Him.

Abraham, he says, discovered that God is one; Jacob, that God cares; Moses, that civilization is on a spiritual basis; David, that God demands purity and righteousness; Isaiah, that Jehovah was the God of all men; Jeremiah, that responsibility is personal; the book of Daniel, that God protects; "but One, one matchless Being, goes without fluctuations or deviation straight up to where the birds skim and gallant ships pass by."

The last chapter, where he tells about present-day obstacles to the spread of the religion of Christ, is epigrammatic. It follows no isms, and is a good book to pass around.

GOD'S FREEMAN: A TRACE FOR THE TIMES

By NATHANIEL MICKLEN, M.A. The Pilgrim Press, Boston.

This is a very enjoyable book and illuminative in the highest degree. It is an interpretation in the light of our present need of some of the fathers who had most to do with shaping our Protestant thought. It presents the famous clerk, Erasmus of Rotterdam, and adds sundry warnings touching Humanism; it treats of Luther and the liberty of the Christian men; it asserts the need for men of the Puritan temper—with modifications; it devotes a chapter to the forgotten Protestant mystics—Denck, Franck, Schwenckfeld and Castellio, and shows what they taught us; it shows how a young Episcopalian, Henry Scougal, epitomized Protestantism for the seventeenth century; it presents a critical inquiry into the nature of Christian Unity; discusses the antithesis between personal and impersonal religion and shows how justification by faith is the bedrock of Protestantism. The style is engrossing and while the book is scholarly, it is written for "the man in the street."

THE ROAD AWAY FROM REVOLUTION

By WOODROW WILSON. Atlantic Monthly Press. Price 50 cents. pp. 13.

Mr. Wilson's little essay, which was first published in the "Atlantic Monthly" last August, is one of the finest contributions to clear thinking and hope that has been written for many years. The essay is written in that high-minded style and with those broad strokes of characterization that we were made familiar with in the days of his Presidency when we entered the war.

How simply he describes the situation that gave rise to the Russian revolution! His words are a model of restraint and of complete mastery of the subject. "What gave rise to the Russian revolution? The answer can only be that it was the product of a whole social system. It was not, in fact, a sudden thing. It had been gathering headway for several generations. It was due to the systematic denial to the great body of Russians of the rights and privileges which all normal men desire and must have if they are to be contented and within reach of happiness."

How clearly Mr. Wilson points out that if we would avoid social cataclysm we must keep off that road; and how fearlessly he insists that men must not be "used as mere instruments of profit;" that generosity and human feeling are essential in the conduct of all business; that the road to peace "is defined by the nature of man and of organized society," and that therefore "it is essential to efficacious thinking in this critical matter that we should not entertain a narrow or technical conception of justice!" The conclusion of the whole matter is in this pregnant sentence: "Our civilization cannot survive materially unless it be redeemed spiritually." And Mr. Wilson concludes that the only way to accomplish this is through civilization's "becoming permeated with the spirit of Christ, and being made free and happy by the practices which spring out of that spirit."

A little book, but a mighty one.

THE LIGHT OF RUSSIA: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE RUSSIAN CHURCH

By DONALD A. LOWRIE. The Association Press New York, N. Y. pp. 241. $2.00

This is an exceptionally interesting and also valuable book. The whole question of the Russian Church is now under heated consideration. Even as we write these words the Bishops of the M. E. Church are debating—with Bishop Blake present—what attitude they shall take with the new movement in the Russian Church—some thinking that it is financed and controlled by the Soviet government, some thinking with Bishop Blake, that it is simply a democratic movement in the Church to bring it into harmony with the new age. Shall they recognize the ancient Church and its officers as the Anglican Church is doing, or shall they recognize the new revolutionary Church as Bishop Blake desires.

This book gives one background. It traces the history of the Church and also tells its part in the life of the people. But Mr. Lowrie has lived in Russia many years and devotes a large part of his book to a study of the Church to-day and an interpretation of it. Mr. Lowrie realized that in spite of everything that has happened in Russia, the great masses of the real Russian people, intensely religious as they are, are still attached to the Church. His description of a Russian Easter service is no exaggeration of the faith still alive in Russia. Mr. Lowrie devotes the last chapter to new movements in the Church and is very sympathetic to them; but one wishes that he had gone a little more in detail into the recent split in the Russian Church.

Christian Art and Architecture

THE CATHEDRAL CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

By WILLIAM BURNET TUTHILL, M.A. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This is an intimate study of the English cathedral church structures as a developing system of a beautiful expression of architectural art, together with a more or less critical examination of many of the supremely attractive buildings belonging to it. It throws much light on the growth of the great building period in England and reveals something of the personality of each cathedral. It shows the beautiful, both actual and relative, in the architecture and dwells somewhat upon the history. It is most interestingly written and there is a beautiful picture on every other page of the book.

CHRIST IN ART

By MRS. HENRY JENNER. E. P. Dutton and Company. Price $2.00. pp. 186.

This is a small volume illustrated with thirty-nine full-page reproductions of great paintings of Christ. Mrs. Jenner says frankly that she does not expect in so small a volume to avoid passing by many things which are important, but that she hopes to follow "the gradual development of the delineation of Christ in art from the faded frescoes of the Catacombs to the easels of the modern artists." The new element in her work is its chronological point of view, and her emphasis on the fact that in each age men have portrayed Christ as they desired him—now benign, and now harsh, now full of glory and magnificence, and now poor and depressed. Mrs. Jenner is rather violent against the modern method of portraying Christ, saying that He is represented as a "fanatical workman among the men to whom labor is degrading and heaven is unknown." "What is known as modern religious art has much the same relation to actual religious art that the sacred volume of the Mormons bears to the Bible of Christianity. It is interesting as a human document and with a few exceptions chiefly reveals a pretty sentimentality and a neat taste in archaeology."

The various periods into which the portrayal of Christ may be divided are briefly described on the basis both of the examination of a number of books on the subject (a bibliography of which is appended at the close of the volume), and many opinions.

The illustrations include a number of those that are familiar to most of us, but there are also some which are rarely seen and which deserve far greater attention. For example, Giorgione's "Christ Carrying the Cross" and Andrea del Sarto's "Head of Christ."

SHELTON OF TIBET

By FLORA BEAL SHELTON (Mrs. A. L.). George H. Doran Company. Price $2.00. pp. 319.

This is the story of a medical missionary in China and Tibet during the last fifteen years. As everybody who observes missionary work knows, Dr. Shelton met his death at the hands of bandits near Bantang when he was returning from an expedition in which he had hoped to achieve the ambition of his life—to enter the sacred city of Lassa and establish a hospital there. His death was one of those tragic events which, speaking from a human point of view, ought never to have occurred, for Dr. Shelton was not only the friend of the outcast and the oppressed, but he was a real aid to just government. (witness his assistance in disputes between the Chinese and Tibetans).

The present volume is a lively narrative by his wife of his whole career, only a short chapter being devoted to his life before beginning his missionary work under the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Dr. Shelton was a man of tremendous interest in every aspect of life, a member of the Royal Geographic Society and the Royal Asiatic Society. He was a man of great evangelical fervor and an able physician who established at Batang the first hospital in all Tibet, and was the introducer of such widely differing benefits as alfalfa and bath tubs. He was a man of great dash and daring, and a childlike faith. His courage was only equalled by his humility. All this and more we learn in the pages of this enthusiastic book, written indeed as a labor of love.

Perhaps one of the most interesting features of the book is its anecdotal character. There is story after story to illustrate the customs and superstitions of the Tibetans and their need of help that the missionary alone can bring. Mrs. Shelton has headed each chapter with a Tibetan proverb, some of which are very attractive, as for example, "If there is hard work, he is there; if there is worship, he must be there. Happy is the place where resides the man who is not afraid of his share." The story of Dr. Shelton and Mr. Ogden on their first entering Tibet is fascinatingly narrated; as is also the story of Dr. Shelton's captivity of more than two months in Yunnan Province, and also the story of his death in Tibet.

In addition to the narrative of this courageous life, as told by his devoted wife there are also included in appendices certain letters of Dr. Shelton and certain selections from tributes written by his admirers. There are a number of very interesting and beautiful photographs which add to the interest and value of the book as a real stimulus to missionary endeavor on the basis of self-sacrifice.

HENRY MARTIN

By CONSTANCE E. PADWICK. George H. Doran Company. pp. 304. $1.50.

This is the first volume in the "Modern Series of Missionary Biographies." It does not lay claim to making great changes in the books already published concerning Henry Martyn. It is "a re-reading of old records, and that not unaided but with the good help of kind people in Cornwall, Cambridge and London too numerous to mention by name, but who have given generous and ready help in regard to anything and everything in which ignorance and carelessness stood in need." Sargent's "Life." George Smith's great biography, and especially the astonishing Journal of Henry Martyn himself, are the chief sources. But an endeavor is made to present this great missionary in terms understandable to people of this age and at a price within the reach of many who could never afford to have the basic sources among their possessions.

The mysticism of Henry Martyn is admirably portrayed in these pages, not overlooking the great spiritual struggles which underlay the outward serenity of his life. And here is also the story of his labors in translating and supervising the translation of the New Testament into Hindustani, Persian and Arabic. What adventures he had with his assistant, "the wild man of the desert," Nathaniel Sabot, an Arab educated at Bagdad! How extraordinary is the record of his stay in Shiraz while engaged in translation work!

Our author has certainly presented a charming portrait of a great mystic and made his adventures live again—which, after all, is the highest praise, since her object is to increase the popular understanding of this great missionary who went to India following Carey.

A short table of dates gives the historical setting for Henry Martyn's life and an index at the end of the volume makes it handy for reference.

FRANCOIS COILLARD

By EDWARD SHILLITO. George H. Doran Company. pp. 235. $1.50.

This is another volume in the "Modern Series of Missionary Biographies" and contains the same features and purpose as to earlier volumes mentioned above. It is a popular but carefully written biography of the great French Protestant missionary, who spent nearly fifty years laboring in South Africa and who finally laid down his life on the upper Zambesi River. The story is told with a kindly human touch that does not omit to stress the beautiful relation that bound together for more than thirty years the hale and hearty missionary and his devoted wife, Christina Machintosh. Here is a moving tale of missionary heroism among the Basutos and the Banyai and the Barotse.

HENRY LOOMIS, FRIEND OF THE EAST

By CLARA DENISON LOOMIS. Fleming H. Revell Company. pp. 150. $1.25.

Henry Loomis is a perpetual monument to the power and influence of friendliness and kindness. As Secretary to the American Bible Society in Yokohama, his life was poured forth in a steady stream of evangelistic fervor guided by modesty, considerateness, love—life itself was his delight. Until it was destroyed by fire he had a notable collection of the moths and butterflies of Japan. His whole life is a tribute to the grace of God working in a man.

This little book written by his daughter bears witness to her father's passionate interest in Japan especially, but also in Korea and China.

Beginning with his life as a poor boy on a New England farm, the book proceeds through Mr. Loomis' forty-eight years of observation in the awakening years of the Far East. Its value rests thus not only in the portrait of a Christian gentleman but in his observations during a thrilling epoch in the East.

PATHS IN THE WILDERNESS

By C. E. SPARKS. The United Lutheran Publication House. pp. 171. $1.25.

"Paths in the Wilderness" is a story of the Lutheran pioneers in Georgia. Its hero is a young Englishman, who, disappointed with the quality of the English settlers of Georgia, joins the colony of German Lutheran Salzburghers. John Wesley and Governor Oglethorpe and the difficulties between the Georgia colony and the Spaniards to the south figure in the tale. It reminds us of the fact that many of us have forgotten that John Wesley came to his "Methodist" ideas through his touch with the German Lutherans of Georgia. Occasional theological conversations make the book at times seem a little like a Lutheran tract, but its story is absorbing enough to carry the weight of the theology.

Miscellaneous

MAXIMS OF LIFE AND BUSINESS

By JOHN WANAMAKER. Harper and Brothers. pp. 129.

Collected by an unnamed friend, the maxims of this book are published for the purpose of extending as widely as may be the influence of the striking personality of Mr. Wanamaker. The brief quotations are grouped under six headings: Business and Success, Character-building, Human Relations, Citizenship, Education, Life.

The maxims vary somewhat both in value and originality, but most of them are of genuine significance—not only because Mr. Wanamaker said them, but for intrinsic reasons. Here is a better form for an old proverb, "Taking good care of a small sum, saved week by week, has been in thousands of cases the foundation of a large fortune." Here is a keen observation on young men, "Anyone may form a fair judgment of what a young man is by the way he treats his mother." How illuminating are such thoughts as these:

"It is a poor prosperity that is blind to the need of God's favor."

"Have you noticed that there is a dignity, even in animals, that some human beings might study to advantage?"

"The world is greatly indebted to its obscure families if we have read its biographies right."

PRAYERS OF JOHN WANAMAKER

Fleming H. Revell Company. pp. 159. $1.25.

In the introduction to this collection of prayers, Dr. MacLennan, pastor of Bethany Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia (of which Mr. Wanamaker was a member and for almost sixty-five years active superintendent of the Sunday-school), speaks of Mr. Wanamaker's profound devotion to the service of the church and his deep personal concern in religion. The prayers reveal a childlike faith and a natural delight in the world and a persistency of appeal that is both pleasant and helpful to note.

THIS EARTH OF OURS

By JEAN HENRI FABRE. The Century Company. pp. 339. $2.50.

Fabre's series of books on the wonders of natural science written for young people have long been among the most popular of books. They had one fault: more often than was altogether justified there were repetitions of the same passages in several books. The translation of the present volume assures us that "this eccentricity has been suppressed so far as it has been found possible to suppress it without undue mutilation of the book."

Fabre still speaks in the genial character of "Uncle Paul," but dialogue form is discarded and we have in this latest volume a familiar narrative illustrated with a few diagrams and sketches in black and white scattered through the text. But it is the text itself that will delight not only youth but age. Fabre shows the enthusiasm and wonder of a child in every description. Listen to this introduction to a visit to the interior of the earth:

"It is not veins of gold and silver or grottoes encrusted with rubies that I propose to show you to-day. My plan is simply to study with you the earth's inner structure. We shall bring back from our underground journey no precious stones or costly metals, but something better—sublime conceptions of the architecture of this globe of ours and a high admiration for its divine Architect."

Or what could be more imaginatively charming than the colorful description of the waterfall at the plateau of Gavarnit in the Pyrenees with "the appearance of a long streamer of muslin or of silvery gauze fluttering from the top of the rampart."

Here are volcanoes and glaciers and rivers and springs and coral islands, seasons and climates, tides and earthquakes described in fascinating language and with practical and scientific sense. The book creates an atmosphere of marvel that is very akin to reverence.

HOW TO PROMOTE HOME RELIGION

By SAMUEL WELLS STAGG. Abingdon Press. pp. 16. Price 15 cents.

A valuable pamphlet suggesting how to meet the responsibility of a church to develop religious training in the homes of its children. The old-time family altar is gone; the new program for home religion must center in the child, and must make conduct the objective. The average home has no program of religious training, but parents are keenly interested in the spiritual development of their children, want a practical program, and are willing to help work it out. Dr. Stagg is one of the authors of "Home Lessons in Religion."

THE SONG OF KORTHAN

By FRANCES B. TAYLOR. Fleming H. Revell Company. pp. 30. 50 cents.

This is an attractively written Christmas story of Korthan, the old musician, who arrived too late at Bethlehem to see the Christ Child.

He went forth in a quest to find Him, carrying the blessing of his cheerful songs everywhere. At last he returned to Bethlehem and there in a beautiful scene the author describes the crowning glory of the old man's life as he enters Joseph's carpenter shop and hears the song of the young Jesus at his work, the song of love, labor and laughter.

WHAT SHALL I BUY FOR CHRISTMAS

Very soon all over the land the question, "What shall I buy for Christmas?" will be demanding a solution. Among the many articles which you may be considering may we suggest the peculiar suitability of the Bible? Holding as it does so important a place in the Christian experience, surely nothing could be more suitable as a gift to a member of the Christian fellowship.

It is true that the Bible is already very extensively used for Christmas gift purposes, but it is remarkable to find, however, how many Sunday-school children are still without a Bible of their own. There are multitudes of older folks who are still trying to read Bibles with fine print they had purchased or had given to them years ago when their eyes were younger and keener. To such a large print edition would certainly be a comfort and a most appreciated gift.

There are many Sunday-school teachers who are trying to get along with a Bible that is altogether inadequate to their needs. How much they would enjoy an edition which has teachers' helps that would make their Sunday-school work a joy instead of a drudgery.

Just as a reminder, therefore, we suggest that you include the Bible on your Christmas gift list.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Conducted by Rev. Edmund de S. Brunner, Ph.D.

The Farm Home

MEETING in St. Louis for three memorable days just after election, three hundred delegates from thirty-six States and Canada participated in the sixth national conference of the American Country Life Association. The conference marked the high-water mark of the Association's history, due largely to the efforts of the executive secretary, Mr. Henry Israel. The theme was the "Farm Home." The discussions were filled with practical suggestions and constructive ideas such as will make the proceedings, soon to be issued, a most valuable volume.

In his presidential address, Dr. Butterfield squarely challenged the notion that if farmers are shown how to make money, human values will take care of themselves. Rather, agricultural prosperity may come only through the dominance of intellectual and spiritual wealth. A great agrarian movement is sweeping the world to-day. In Europe we have one hundred million lifted, in the space of half a decade, from all but serfdom to land ownership. In India and South America, in Mexico and China, there are stirrings of an awakening rural life. In the United States and Canada the movement is unmistakable. Its significance lies not merely in an economic fever, but rather in the basic urge for a fuller and freer life. The good rural home is the test of successful farming.

Following these significant statements by the president of a great agricultural college, Mrs. Ruby Green Smith, of Cornell discussed "The Rural Home at Its Best" by taking the delegates through the ideal home from yard to attic. She laid large emphasis upon the comfort, utility and beauty of the home and its surroundings and upon the rights of children to a rich home life. She paid a glowing tribute to the farm woman, wife and mother, who as cook, washer woman, cleaner, nurse, gardener and executive, earns but does not receive a salary of $3,588 a year. "Farm life," she declared, "demands a high grade of managerial ability, both in the field and in the home."

Though speaking under the shadow of one of the greatest agricultural depressions ever known, Dr. Charles J. Galpin, of the United States Department of Agriculture, yet declared that the farm family can afford modern institutions, adapted to rural needs. He presented a masterly analysis of farm property and income correlated with institutions already serving rural people and showed that under proper social control there was opportunity for a far richer life on the farm. Prof. J. O. Rankin, of the Nebraska College of Agriculture, was also optimistic as he presented the results of his study of one thousand farm homes, though he did show striking differences between owner and tenant in the matter of household conveniences, reading matter, recreation, and the like. He stressed the need for giving more care to health, education, morals, general welfare and leadership, and it was upon these very matters that the conference spent much of the rest of its time.

Dr. Caroline Hedger, of the Elizabeth McCormick Memorial Fund, Chicago, Illinois, scored the continued teaching of cube root to girls to whom no instruction was given in motherhood. Reports thus far are meager on the status of the health of the farm population. The mental health of the rural children is also an unknown quantity. She indicated the lines of educational effort by which the mother will be better able to insure physical and mental health for the child and indicated certain simple tests of various kinds designed to help in achieving this end.

Dr. N. P. Colwell, of the American Medical Association, dealt with the problem of the decline of the country doctor. The cause of this decline is in the arduous duties and the insufficient return. Cities, where there are better roads, are competing successfully with the country for physicians. Some places are without doctors. Health officers and public health nurses must take their place until other policies can be worked out. Some communities are employing doctors on a salaried basis with a guaranteed minimum salary, and one State has passed a law permitting communities to tax themselves for this end.

One of the most unusual events of the conference was the clergymen's luncheon attended by seventy country parsons, about equally divided between Romanists and Protestants. So far as it is known, it is the first time that such a gathering has ever been held. For ninety thrilling minutes these men, under the chairmanship of Father O'Hara, rural director of the National Catholic Welfare Council, discussed their common problems. They found that each needed to make the rural ministry loom large, that each too often lacked the equipment and knowledge, and that suspicion, distrust and prejudice needed to be eliminated. Monsignor J. Kelly, secretary of Church Extension for the Roman Catholic Church, sketched by concrete examples how some of these problems had been solved by minister and priest alike meeting in the community as citizens and never forgetting their obligation as citizens. The greatly awakened interest in rural affairs on the part of the Roman Catholic Church was remarked. Its first national rural conference was held in conjunction with the American Country Life Association gathering, two sessions being joint affairs. Over five hundred priests and church officials were in session for two days. Certain Protestant groups also met.

Protestant and Romanist again met at the conference's annual banquet. Archbishop J. J. Glennon defined the country as the natural habitat of the race and pled for fortifying the normal life of the race. Warren H. Wilson, in an address which perhaps marked the high tide of the conference, demanded a new element in education, namely, freedom. The rise of the administrative element in education had been attended by real dangers, necessary as it is. The danger is that in remembering to keep records, measure progress, pass examinations and to receive diplomas, the process of learning will be forgotten. We have no schools that are really free. We need schools that will teach freedom. Perhaps it will come through organized co-operation by which groups will call their teachers, as country pastors rightly hopeless of theological seminaries have assembled in summer schools and called teachers to them. Dr. Wilson protested vehemently against education without tolerance. Bigotry, prejudice, occasioned among other things by the rise of the inane and insane Ku Klux Klan, have no place in anything that can be called education in a free country.

At other sessions discussions considered those forces and agencies which play upon the farm home. New ideals as to school and church, extension service and press, business and parenthood were voiced, and with these confessions, too, of the faults and mistakes of the past. Again and again discussion veered around to the place of the parents in maintaining family ideals, and here again it was Dr. Wilson who challenged the conference with an original approach to the problem by way of economics. He said in part:

The country home alone both produces and consumes. In this it is peculiar. Elsewhere homes but consume. Our agricultural education has thus far emphasized production alone. Only very recently has there been any emphasis laid upon farm management and securing an adequate income. This teaching of production may have been overdone, but it has been well done. It has brought about in the country a noticeable lack of the knowledge of the art of happy living. We do not know how to use the wealth we have as a nation. Our cities are prosaic, our villages drab and farm life has lost its savor in America. Yet the city dweller does know how to enjoy life better than the others, and so men flee from, not to the farm, in spite of the beauty and freedom of country life, because "there is no life there." And so in all the discontent with life, and we, the richest of nations, are a discontented people, the greatest discontent is among the farmers who produce the greatest addition to our wealth. One reason for this is that we have taught both men and women to produce, forgetting that consumption is a social function and one peculiarly belonging to women. I propose that agricultural education change its emphasis from production to consumption, addressing itself in the future to women and girls.

As Edward T. Devine says, "If acquisition is the idea which in the past history of economics has been all but unduly emphasized, expenditure is the idea which the future of the science will place beside it. It is this change which involves a revolution in the attitude of the science toward the economic function of women. To recognize this is the first step in the program." The agricultural colleges of the Middle West see this with growing clearness. They are teaching farm and village women how to dress, how to beautify, how to enjoy with their families the products of the farm and the factory and the store.

A second step is to recognize the dominant place the consumer plays in the process of marketing. Consumers control prices by their demand. Third, consumption has a profound effect upon the whole production process, in that the morale of producers is modified greatly by the organization of the process of consumption. The goodness and variety of food, comfort of clothing, beauty and attractiveness of home furnishings, all make the worker able to work or else undermine his ability.

The education of country women, if the above is true, should be a preparation for the work of consumption, even admitting that she is also a producer. It is the part of teachers of women to impart to them skill in buying, selecting, harmonizing goods to the end of satisfaction. Theirs should be an education with the objective of spending and saving. To this end teachers of women must be artists.

The conference closed with a colorful international evening, speakers from foreign lands describing the rural home life in their fatherlands.

Throughout the whole conference the spirit was one of optimism and of constructive thinking. Many problems were faced. The economic depression was never forgotten, but spiritual and intellectual values were placed uppermost. The various agencies plan to build the farm home of the future well. The place of the youth of to-day was recognized, and his right to be heard in the family council. Science is being brought to the aid of rural living. Rural social engineers are looking not backward, but forward.

Four clergymen conducted the ceremonies at the burial of the Unknown Soldier on Armistice Day in 1921. They were Bishop Brent, Chief Chaplain Axton, Chaplain John B. Frazier of the Navy, and Rabbi Morris S. Lazaron, of Baltimore, a chaplain in the Officers' Reserve Corps. These four clergymen have determined that one or more of their number shall visit the tomb on each succeeding Armistice Day, there to honor their unidentified comrade with a suitable devotional service. Last year Chaplain Axton conducted a brief service a few minutes after President Harding had placed his wreath upon it. This year, immediately after services in the Amphitheater, the colors of the Veterans' Associations were formed around the tomb and Rabbi Lazaron represented his associates by offering the prayer. The presence of these men at the Unknown Soldier's grave is an annual expression of the religious unity of America.

The American Silk Association has underwritten the expenses of the Department of Agriculture at Canton Christian College for the coming year. The Association also intends to erect a model plant for the unwinding of the silk cocoons, a filature, in technical parlance. In addition, it will put up a cold storage plant at the college. The Canton Christian College has set an example of intelligent co-operation between business and missions.

ACTS 16:6-15.

"I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."—Romans 1:16.

HOW good it is that the writers of Scripture painted these saints and seers just as they were, wrinkles and all! They were men of like passions with us. They did not always see eye to eye in their plans. Here in the lesson, "Barnabas was minded to take with them Mark, but Paul thought it not good to take one who withdrew from them in Pamphylia. And there arose a sharp contention, so that they parted asunder—Barnabas took Mark with him, and sailed away to Cyprus, but Paul chose Silas, and went forth through Syria and Cilicia." Wherever we go we find that the main instruments of the divine purpose on earth have been men and not angels.

When Paul came again to Lystra, where once he was stoned, he found young Timothy and his mother steadfast believers in Christ. The young man "was well reported of by the brethren at Lystra and Paul would have him to go with him." Timothy's mother was a Jewess, but his father was a Greek.

"When they had gone through Phrygia and were come to Mysia they essayed to go into Bithynia; but the Spirit suffered them not; and passing by Mysia they came to Troas." It seems hardly worth while to use space in recording these unfamiliar geographical names. But dress those words up in their proper associations, set them in order, give them a chance to talk, and they will tell you a story.

Phrygia and Mysia, Bithynia and Troas—they are not mere names on the map of that half-forgotten world. They are moods, phases of feeling, personal experiences. When Paul and his companions moved out toward Bithynia, that lovely little province on the shores of the Black Sea, something happened which changed their plans. He does not go into details, but in the light of further developments he regarded it as providential—"The Spirit suffered us not." So turning aside from Bithynia and passing by Mysia they came to Troas. And there at Troas came the vision which carried him across the Ægean into Europe. He gave up his plan to enter a province and God gave him a continent.

While they were in Troas "a vision appeared to Paul in the night." He was lying there asleep on the rim of Asia. He had been looking out across the Ægean toward that newer continent to the west. He was an Asiatic, born in Tarsus, a city of Asia Minor. He had never been in Europe. He had read about it, talked about it, thought about it, and here he was dreaming about it. He had learned to speak Greek, one of its leading languages. He knew that Rome ruled the world and that the wealth of the race was flowing into those cities beyond the Mediterranean, giving to that newer continent political and economic leadership in the unfolding history of the world.

While he dreamed "there appeared to him a man of Macedonia," beckoning to him. The man cried out across the sea, "Come over into Macedonia and help us." It was a vision of the moral need of that continent standing out definite, actual, concrete, like the figure of a beseeching man. He was entreating Paul to come with his gospel to the moral relief of all those needy souls. When Paul awakened next morning he was ready to start. "After he had seen the vision," Luke says, "immediately we endeavored to go, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us to preach the gospel there."

Here was the prompt translation of a vision into a deed. Paul found in Macedonia, as a matter of fact, some bigoted Jews who persecuted him. He found some rattle-brained soothsayers and psychics who annoyed him. He found some crooked Roman officials who stripped him, beat him and put him in prison. He had crossed the Ægean, his face shining and his heart leaping for joy because of the vision he had seen, but before this chapter ends he finds himself in jail.

But his vision was none the less sound to the core. The man he saw did not represent the conscious, confessed need of Macedonia—that beckoning man represented the unconscious need, the deeper self which waited uneasily beneath the surface of Macedonia's life overborne meanwhile by a false content. The man represented the unawakened spiritual capacity of that continent which needed the gospel of moral renewal with which the apostle had been put in trust. It was the unconscious need of that country making its mighty appeal which Paul saw in his vision.

When the apostle and his friends reached Philippi "they went forth on the Sabbath by a river side where prayer was wont to be made." "And here, at this little outdoor prayer meeting, "they spake to the women who resorted thither." "To the women"—it has a familiar sound, for then as now the prayer meeting was made up in the main from that sex which shows habitually the larger measure of quiet, genuine devotion. One of those women, named Lydia, was converted and rendered a beautiful service to that Christian community at its inception.

It is only a hundred and forty miles across from Troas in Asia to Macedonia in Europe. The distance was quickly covered, even by the sailing vessels of that earlier day. But who can measure, not in miles, but in moral significance, the reach of that journey Paul took? How the presence of that greatest apostle upon the newer continent and the planting of the gospel of Christ in the centers of European influence bore upon the unfolding history of the Kingdom of God!

Flowers in the Window

By William Willard Howard

FOR purposes of illustration and comparison I have asked myself this question: Suppose that you were reduced to such appalling poverty that your only bed was two planks supported by discarded boxes; your only pillow a block of wood; your only table a drygoods box; your only chair a soap box; your only habitation a cellar so damp that when you arose before dawn to seek work you placed your bare foot upon the slimy back of a frog. Would you have growing flowers in the window of the dismal place? Would you have upon your box-table cut flowers freshly gathered from nearby fields? It is a rather searching question. Anne Louise Howard thinks that I would have the flowers—if they were edible.

This embarrassing question arose as a result of my investigation of the condition of Russian refugee children on the border of Bolshevik Russia last August and September. As I already have outlined in these pages, the Baroness Berends-Situna and I went forth on foot into that Sargasso Sea of hunger, suffering and destitution, seeking members of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia in cellars and attics and other obscure places into which they had crawled for shelter. We groped through dark cellars dripping with moisture; we climbed rickety stairs leading to bleak attics; we crawled through breaks in backyard fences; we waded through deep sand; we stumbled over stones.

In each obscure and dreary place that we entered, whether in moist cellar or dim attic, there were growing flowers in the window. In some places there were cut flowers on the table.

This is not an expression of poetic license. It is an assertion of actual fact. Each and every room had its flowers. The pots containing the growing plants were old tin pails, cracked earthenware crocks, or small wooden boxes apparently salvaged from a dumping ground. The vase holding flowers usually was a small pitcher, long since past usefulness.

I told Anne Louise Howard about the flowers in the windows and asked her what it meant.

"It means that the artist soul survives cold and hunger and pain and suffering," she said. "It means that the love of beauty lives forever."

To me it means that these Russian exiles, fallen from the ease and opulence of their former high estate to the lowest depths of unutterable destitution, still are thoroughbreds. It means that, in spite of the broken shoes and patched garments and hunger, the inherited characteristics of their class shine on with unchanging steadiness.

A love of beauty in whatsoever form, whether it be in form or color or in the wondrous loveliness of nature's growing things, is the infallible mark of gentle birth and breeding the world over. If a woman loves beautiful things—blossoming flowers, the colors of the sunrise, the motion of falling water, the delicate tints of spring, the glory of the autumn woods, I know that she is of the gentlefolk, no matter what her worldly circumstances.

The flowers in the window were eloquent answer to the often-asked question: "How can those Russian gentlewomen, situated as they are, do such beautiful embroidery?" The love of beauty—the hall mark of the gentlewoman of whatsoever race or creed—lives forever.

The destitute Russian gentlewomen have translated their inherited love of beauty into terms of hand-embroidered blouses and one-piece gowns so artistically and with such rare effects in color-tones and harmony that I am in despair over the impossibility of reproducing any part of it through the medium of printer's ink and paper. It cannot be done. To help out the situation, therefore, I have placed on exhibition in the business office of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, Room 811, about one hundred blouses and about fifty one-piece gowns. The young women in the office will be glad to show these beautiful garments at any time, except Saturday afternoon, between nine a.m. and four p.m. Each garment has attached to it a tag showing the price and the bust measure.

The office is easy of access. It is on the eighth floor of Mr. George A. Plimpton's beautiful Educational Building, on the southwest corner of Fifth Avenue and Thirteenth Street. It may be reached by a short walk from the Fourteenth street station of the east side subway or by a short walk from the Fourteenth street station of the west side subway. The Fourteenth street station of the Sixth Avenue elevated railroad is only a block away. Out-of-town visitors arriving by way of the Grand Central Station should take the east side subway to Fourteenth Street. Visitors arriving at the Pennsylvania Station should take the west side subway to Fourteenth Street and leave the subway by the Thirteenth Street stairway. Visitors arriving by way of Jersey City or Hoboken should take the Hudson tube to Fourteenth Street and Sixth Avenue.

The new hand-embroidered one-piece gowns, which I brought back with me from the border of Bolshevik Russia a few weeks ago, have not been illustrated or described in a booklet. There are so few of them, as yet, that they probably will be sold before I could get a booklet ready. They are in Swiss voile and also in native Russian linen. They are beautifully embroidered, both front and back and on the sleeves. The linen gowns are unusually heavy and durable. I should think that they would wear for generations. The colors are permanent. They may be washed in lukewarm water and white soap an indefinite number of times.

If you desire to increase the scope of the relief by a contribution to the working fund you may forward your gift to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON and HERBERT L. WILLETT, Editors

Published Weekly Four Dollars a Year

The Religious Revolution

GR^{EAT} and vital changes taking place in men's thought as to what religion is and what its function is in personal and social life—new assessment of old doctrines—fresh conceptions of God and destiny and duty demanding room in the realm of faith—Jesus Christ assuming a new role in the lives of his followers—the ancient Bible undergoing revision and reinterpretation—the church challenged as to its competence to carry on the spiritual business of mankind—the missionary enterprise at a crisis—denominationalism losing its hold and confessing its futility—science and social passion saturating traditional creeds and churchly virtues with new convictions and ideals—religion under our very hand and eye is passing through an epoch of change more profound and revolutionary than the Protestant reformation of the sixteenth century!

The most interesting subject in all the world——and never in history so interesting as right now!

THE Christian Century is a free journal of religion. It is under obligation to no denomination, no society, no board, no ecclesiastical or other interest of any sort, and is therefore in a position to speak its convictions concerning events, or personalities, or doctrines, or institutions without let or hindrance from any established interest whatsoever.

Within the past five years The Christian Century has come into a unique position in the journalism of America. Its influence now extends into all the communions of the American church. It is equally at home among Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Disciples, Baptists, Episcopalians, Evangelical Unitarians and liberal Jews; and not a few of the liberal leaders of the Roman Catholic church are among its readers. Its readers now extend to every country on the globe.

Besides, it is gripping the minds of thinking men and women who have no church connection. They are astonished that from within the church, which many supposed had become moribund and incurably denominational in its vision, there should emerge a journal in earnest with the church, devout and evangelical, and at the same time as free as a university classroom. Such people stand amazed to find themselves actually enjoying a religious paper!

A glance at its pages will reveal the fact that it conceives its field and function as something quite different from other religious papers. It seeks—and it finds—the leader-like minds in all walks of life.

There probably does not exist anywhere a more remarkable and adequate roster of America's religious and moral leadership than the present subscription list of The Christian Century. The most vital minds in church life, in social action and in educational service make up its readers. It does not solicit subscriptions from the thoughtless or superficial—such persons would not long remain subscribers to a periodical that deals as earnestly and candidly with moral and religious issues as does The Christian Century.

And besides, the very presence on its subscription list of readers of a dependent type of mind would inevitably color and tone down its treatment of living issues. If its editors had to consider the reader whose faith is likely to be injured by a frank facing of the issues which today try the souls of all of us, they would have to produce a paper quite unlike The Christian Century. For such minds plenty of other religious reading matter is available.

But it definitely and purposely restricts itself to another field. The constituency which it seeks to serve is that of the thoughtful, mature and independent leaders, particularly from the laity, inside and outside the churches, who desire to follow the free and untrammelled discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ.

This is a field which no other weekly journal of religion has undertaken to cultivate. The Christian Century is not made for children, it uses no pictures, and its editors and contributors feel no need of toning down their utterances lest the "weak brother" be offended. Our invitation is for a reading constituency of strong minds which grow stronger by participation in free discussion.

Yet this journal of religion is no high-brow, technical, academic affair. It grips the interest of the average man and woman of intelligence. Its genius is that it makes ideas interesting. And religious ideas, at that! Its discussions and editorials are not intended merely for professionals, but for the man in the street and pew—lay leaders from the rank and file. The intelligent layman and woman are in the editorial mind continually, and the paper is produced for them. Perhaps it is just this fact that explains why The Christian Century is so widely read by teachers and ministers and other professional folk.

And its readers have been grateful to find that The Christian Century speaks not as a detached and irresponsible outsider, but as a sympathetic and loyal insider from the bosom of the church itself. This discovery of a journal that is free without being a free lance, that is loyal without being servile, and that is always interesting and vital without being sensational, is the secret of the great joy our readers take in The Christian Century.

Consider the names of some contributors: Charles E. Jefferson, Frederick W. Norwood, Joseph Ernest McAfee, William E. Barton, Jane Addams, Robert A. Millikan, Ernest F. Tittle, Robert E. Speer, Vida D. Scudder, John Dewey, Shailer Matthews, Roger Babson, Edward A. Steiner, Charles A. Ellwood, Albert Parker Fitch, Dean Inge, Canon Barnes, Maude Roven, Sherwood Eddy, Henry Churchill King, H. D. C. MacLachlan, Harry Emerson Fosdick, Rufus M. Jones, Edgar DeWitt Jones, Lloyd C. Douglas, Frederick F. Shannon, Cleland B. McAfee, Harry F. Ward, Ozora S. Davis, Bishop McConnell, Peter Ainslie, Samuel McComb—these are just a few of the master writers whose messages appear in The Christian Century's pages.

They with the editors write on such vital topics as:

International Affairs—The World Court, Outlawry of War, etc.

The Mind of Jesus and Modern Science.

Modern Sex Morality.

What Is There Left of the Bible?

Is Evolution Inconsistent with Religion?

The Future of the Community Church.

Is the Denominational Church a Competent Organ of Religion?

The High Art of the Spiritual Life.

Do We Need a New Religion?

Is Sin Obsolete?

The Menace of Millennialism.

Jewish Fundamentalism.

The Chicago Tribune as a Breeder of Anarchy.

and a hundred other subjects covering the delicate but urgent problems involved in the modern attempt to discover the mind of Christ and to apply his ideals in our actual workaday world.

Space forbids calling attention to certain interesting features for the immediate future. We can only mention the vigorous and illuminating discussion of the modern sex debacle, just beginning. Or take that remarkable series of articles by a dozen or more social service leaders of all the churches of which Bishop McConnell fires the opening gun in the current issue. The articles are dealing with this question: After nineteen hundred years has Christianity seriously modified the pagan character of human society? These articles, we promise, will lay the axe at the root of the tree.

You are heartily invited to join The Christian Century's far extending circle of readers. Note the attractive books—modern, up-to-the-minute books, everyone—offered free with a new annual subscription.

WASHINGTON AND LINCOLN ON THE SABBATH

Washington's general order:

That the troops may have an opportunity of attending public worship, as well as to take some rest after the great fatigue they have gone through, the General in future excuses them from fatigue duty on Sundays, except at the shipyards, or on special occasions, until further orders. The General is sorry to be informed that the foolish and wicked practice of profane cursing and swearing, a vice heretofore little known in an American army, is growing into fashion; he hopes the officers will, by example as well as influence, endeavor to check it, and that both they and the men will reflect that we can have little hope of the blessing of heaven on our arms, if we insult it by our impiety and folly; added to this, it is a vice so mean and low, without any temptation, that every man of sense and character detests and despises it.

Lincoln's order:

The President, commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy, desires and enjoins the orderly observance of the Sabbath by the officers and men in the military and naval service. The importance for man and beast of the prescribed weekly rest, the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors, a becoming deference to the best sentiment of a Christian people, and a due regard for the Divine will, demand that Sunday labor in the Army and Navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity.

ARCTIC CURRENTS

Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, the Norwegian explorer, while in Washington the other day, approved a plan being worked out there to discover the currents of the Arctic Sea without endangering the lives of men by placing a ship in the Arctic ice. Instead of letting a ship drift its way, as in the case of Dr. Nansen's ship, the "Fram," they propose to place wooden markers in the Canadian and Siberian waters, which flow northward, have them marked and noted, and then offer an international reward for their recovery. Dr. Nansen said it takes about three years for the currents to carry objects over the Polar region.

THE AGE OF HUMOR

Laughter is beneficial and American children are better at it than English youngsters, Dr. C. W. Kimmins, Gilchrist lecturer at the University of London, said at a recent luncheon of the Federation for Child Study. Dr. Kimmins remarked that children in this country have the advantage of the Mark Twain and Bret Harte traditions and are more faithful readers of Dickens than English children. He further said that his studies of London children show that they begin to laugh at the age of seven, when they begin to sense superiority over some of their companions, and improve until eleven, but that from eleven to thirteen there is no development of the sense of humor.

ROME VS. WESLEY

The Roman Catholic Church will never do the right thing except when compelled to do so by some strong outside influence. This statement is being verified in the struggle now taking place in Rome between the forces of Methodism and the Romish organization known as the Knights of Columbus. Neither the Church as a body nor the Knights of Columbus as a society within it did anything affecting the social condition of the thousands of poor and neglected people in Rome until the Methodists undertook to relieve their circumstances by various means. But now that Methodist labors have begun to make themselves felt, the Knights have started to build gymnasiums, theaters, playgrounds, and other places of recreation for the benefit of the previously ignored masses. Where Romanism has no opposition, even "the faithful" are allowed to go to the dogs, provided only that they give of their penury all that they can scrape together for the benefit of their "holy religion." Strong opposition is the only method that will keep the God-inspired religion of the popes within the bounds of common decency and regard for the betterment and rights of others. . . . When the Knights of Columbus (which order has been in existence for thirty years) awakens to a sense of its duty touching the Catholic poor only when some other "spiritual" society has started the ball a-rolling, one cannot fail to recognize the good-will of such society in its philanthropic undertakings for the benefit of the pope's destitute children in the "Eternal City."—"The Truth Seeker."

How important do you consider responsive readings in your church? RESPONSIVE SCRIPTURES supplies a need long experienced. Rev. C. Waldo Cherry, D.D., Pastor of the Pine Street Presbyterian Church, writes: "I have become very impatient with the usual responsive readings. They are too long and are selected with so little consideration for appropriateness that I have felt something better ought to be provided. I like very much not only the selections of RESPONSIVE SCRIPTURES, but also the topics, which greatly facilitate the securing of appropriate and timely readings." By special arrangement, it has been made possible to send a sample copy to any church upon request. Association Press, 347 Madison Avenue, New York.

HEREDITY IN PERSONALITY

"As I review their lives I realize that I have no mental aptitudes or moral traits of character that I did not inherit from my parents. . . . I inherit, too, my mother's even and sunny temper, her exceptional dread of disharmony or even disagreement, and her exquisite sensitiveness, which makes it hard for me to disagree with anyone, especially to his face. . . . On the other hand, if this pristine passion for amicable relations is broken through, I often tend to be not only critical but severe and sometimes to give way to temper, which is my father's diathesis voiced again in my own soul."—G. S. Hall: Life and Confessions of a Psychologist, pp. 82-86.

WHAT DOES THE ROMAN CATHOLIC ARCHBISHOP SAY?

"The Truth Seeker" advertises itself as a "free thought" weekly, but much of it reads as might the most ardent Christian journal upholding liberty in the Church. Commenting on the account of a Roman Catholic priest in Latin America who presided over the burning of a quantity of Bibles brought into town by a Protestant colporter, the editor remarks: "The picture shows that the burning took place in the street in front of a church. The books had been purchased by a devout Roman Catholic for the purpose of destroying them in this manner. A further history of the affair would be interesting. Was the priest commended or condemned for his part in it? If his act was allowable by his church, why do we not see Bibles burning in front of St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York? The archbishop here may be neglecting an important function. We have to look away from the United States to observe the manifestations of genuine [Roman] Catholicism."

However, we confess that not all Protestants would want to be judged by the attitude of German Evangelicals toward "Kaiserism," for instance. To be sure, however, there is no common authority over us and the former state churches of Germany. That makes a difference.

AN ELDERS' SCHOOL

It is good to learn of customs quite different from those of America and Great Britain growing up in churches which have been started by our missionaries in foreign lands. Such customs mean that Christianity is genuinely taking root among the people. Rev. Homer E. Anderson, a Presbyterian missionary, describes a village elders' school held in the Punjab of India that could not be duplicated outside Asia. Fourteen rugged, bearded villagers met for the school. They sat by the hour chanting and clapping their hands and gently swaying their bodies, singing narrative songs which retell Bible stories. One of their favorites is "O, gardener, where have you hidden him?" They unfold in their song

The Next Room Took the Overflow

HAVE YOU ever been one of those "next roomers"? Or had to crane your neck to look through a doorway to see the speaker in the next room? Or maybe you have sat in some small meeting held in a big poorly lighted, half heated room because no small room was available.

For both such occasions Sectionfold partitions are made. They turn one room into many, many into one, to say nothing of the heat and light they save.

May we send you our catalog No. 17 with the whole story?

the whole story, the two Marys in the early morning coming to the tomb and meeting the Risen One, mistaking Him for the gardener, and putting their plaintive appeal before Him. In a similar way they tell the story of Daniel and his two friends in the fiery furnace, the angel's announcement to Mary, the parable of the sower, the story of the palsied man let down through the roof. They sing the songs over and over. Not one of the men can read a word of the Bible, but they are passing on the Bible story in the genuine Indian fashion. They know much of the gospel word for word from songs which are literal quotations of Scripture. Some of the men, of course, have a special knack at composing such chants. One young man a month after his baptism was singing songs of his own making. They are not wholly limited to singing for their music. One of Mr. Anderson's men plays a drum to the glory of God. He uses no sticks, just his fingers beating out a tattoo on the goat-skin stretched over the ends of a nail keg.

KEEPING THE DOCTOR AWAY

You will recall the first impression I formed of him when I traveled that whole day with him on the train from Haifa up to Damascus. I didn't like him at all. In fact, I thought he was a most egotistic, disagreeable person; but later on I came to admire him very much and to love him. But always I find I have to look for hidden meaning in his speech. I have come to know him so well that I can see from his expression when to be on guard. So when he said to me, "Doctor, I see you write your wife every day," I saw this particular expression and was on my guard.

"Yes," I said. "Always when I am away from Louise I write her every day; she is so much more contented."

"Yes, of course," said he. "A letter a day keeps the doctor away."—Q. and Q.

SAFE-CRACKING VS. TRUTH TELLING

Ralph Chaplin, author of "Solidarity," at the Cooper Union Amnesty meeting the other night, told the story of a fellow prisoner at Leavenworth who was serving a cumulative sentence of fifty years. He had been safe-blower, robber and thug and had been sentenced many times for various crimes. One Christmas, after a petition for his pardon had been presented to President Harding and it looked as if he would be released, Chaplin, who was serving a sentence of twenty years for saying that if we entered the war there would be profiteering, said to the robber, "What are you going to do, John, when you get out?"

John said, "I don't know; what did you do to get in?"

Ralph told him.

"How long did you get?" asked John.

"Twenty years."

"Well, I won't try your job; it's too dangerous."

A CALL FROM SOUTHERN EDUCATORS AGAINST LYNCHING

Eighty-three of the South's leading educators, including eight state superintendents of education, twenty-six presidents of state universities and colleges, twenty-five presidents of other universities and colleges, and twenty-four college professors, recently issued to the American people the following appeal:

"We the undersigned, engaged in the work of education, earnestly appeal to all citizens to exert their influence constantly and actively in condemnation of the crime of lynching.

"We furthermore urge upon our State legislators and executives to enact, if necessary, and persistently to enforce, such laws as will tend to put a stop to this species of lawlessness."

Expressions like this by the leaders of opinion in the South must have a cumulative effect. And it is not only the South where opinion needs to be educated in regard to lynching.

INTERDENOMINATIONALISM

The First Congregational Church of Oakland, California, one day last summer held its Sunday school in the Unitarian Church, its morning service in the Jewish Synagogue, where the sermon was delivered by a Presbyterian minister, and met for its evening service in the Baptist church, where the sermon was preached by the dean of an undenominational divinity school. There is something to the unity of the Church after all.

David's mother had corrected him and he was very quiet for a time. Finally his mother called him to her and asked him what was troubling him. He said, "I'm mad at God."

"And why, my dear, are you angry with God?"

"Mother, I am mad at God because He didn't make Aunt Clara my mother," said David.

International Golden Rule Sunday

do unto You do Ye even so unto Them

Communion of the Golden Rule

HANKS be unto Thee, O Giver of our Daily Bread,
For this Communion of the Golden Rule.

May this plain food strengthen our bodies;

And the loving cup of kindness refresh our souls.
Bless the great multitude of homeless children,
Thy little ones far away in the Near East,
Whom we greet in spirit at our table today.
Orphaned, may they find in Thee a Father;
Helpless, may they find in us true helpers.
In their hunger we would feed them,
In their nakedness we would clothe them,
In the prison of man's cruelty we would visit them.
Grant, O Father most merciful and loving,
That our hearts may hear the benediction
Of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ:
Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these,
Ye have done it unto Me. Amen

A Grace before Meat
by Henry Van Dyke

(On December 2, all persons who are disposed to make a practical application of the Golden Rule are requested to provide for their Sunday dinner the same menu that is approved and used for at least 50,000 of the orphans of the Near East.)

GARGOYLES AND CHURCHES

When I came into Rheims on my way up to Paris from St. Menchould after the armistice and had found my way to the Cathedral, although the desolation and destruction throughout the city had prepared me for the great ruin, it did not seem possible that such destruction could have been wrought. One thing I noticed particularly was the gargoyles around the cathedral cornice. It was really amazing that the almost continuous shell fire, which had demolished the wonderful statues of the saints, ruined roofs and walls, and completely destroyed the windows, and especially the Rose window, could have done so little damage to these useless, hideous, long-necked gargoyles. There were whole rows with only one gone here and there.

France was the place where the gargoyle was originated. The term sprang from the old French word "gargouille," meaning throat, so called because they were first used as leads from the gutters to carry off the water, but in modern times they have not this picturesque excuse for their existence. Their precursors date back a long time. In ruined Egyptian temples there have been found stone waterspouts with the face and form of the modern gargoyle. The Gothic style of church architecture lends itself most readily to these effigies. They are chiefly found in church architecture, and there are many here in New York, oftentimes with grotesque and bizarre combinations of head and neck and body. There are some fascinating ones on the gutters of Grace Church, leaning over the side entrance almost within reach, and they smile in a friendly way at the passers-by. On the Fourth Presbyterian Church in West End avenue there are a variety of them. Two in particular, in the form of lions, are somber and dignified, while others are flat-headed and haven't the room for brains nor desire for pomp. Much like these are the ones on the front of All Angels Parish House in West Eighteenth street. St. Patrick's Cathedral seems at first to have been built without them, but when one approaches from the Madison avenue side he sees that this part of the pile is alive with them. And the Cathedral of Commerce, the tall, stately Woolworth building, in keeping with its name, has many of these hideous objects on its tower sixty stories above the ground. Up here the lizard-shaped, bat-winged monsters seem more in place. The idea of life in these grotesque figures has fascinated the imagination of many people, and the genius of Victor Hugo in his "Notre Dame" has made the wierd idea of life in them immortal.—Q. and Q.

The Presbyterian School for Girls in Tokyo, the Joshi Gakuin, was not completely destroyed by the earthquake, as was generally understood in America at the time. It was, of course, badly injured. The tiles slipped on the roof so that it became like a sieve; three chimneys on the dormitory broke and the two chimneys on the chapel. In the Teachers' Home the central chimney rocked away from the wall so that one can see from the hall into the kitchen. That is only a very partial report of the injury. Altogether the repairs will cost twenty-five hundred dollars. However, the school was able to begin on the second day of October. Three hundred and fifty girls attended the school last year. The Meiji Gakuin Middle School and the Seminary also opened early in the month. The Women's Christian College opened on the sixteenth. The Deaf Oral School, conducted by the missionaries, opened on September 11, just one day behind schedule time, but only eighteen of the fifty children were in attendance. The homes of most of the others had been burnt. The government has asked the school to take in seven deaf children who became orphans through the fire.

The Anti-Saloon League of the United States holds its national convention at the First Congregational Church, Washington, January 12 to 17, 1924. A three-day workers' conference, to be held at the Raleigh Hotel, Washington, will precede the convention.

CHURCH HONOR FOR PRESIDENT MASARYK

John Hus Evangelical Theological Faculty, in Prague, has given its first honorary degree to President Masaryk. The Protestants in Bohemia want to prove their love and admiration for the President as a spiritual leader who has the courage to proclaim the significance of religion in private and public life. Masaryk has criticized the churches, not excepting the Protestant Church, but always for the sake of a purer religion and a better church.

A SONG OF PEACE

By Rev. Ernest Bourner Allen,

Minister of the Pilgrim Congregational Church, Oak Park, Illinois.

[These verses are written to be sung with the music of "The Son of God Goes Forth to War."]

The Son of God goes forth for Peace,
Our Father's love to show;
From war and woe he brings release,
O who with Him will go?
He strikes the fetters from the slave,
Man's mind and heart makes free;
And send his messengers to save
O'er every land and sea!

The Son of God goes forth for Peace,
That men like brothers live,
And all desire the other's good,
And other's sin forgive.
He turns our spears to pruning hooks,
Our swords to ploughshares warm,
And war no more its death-blast brings,
Nor men their brothers harm!

The Son of God goes forth for Peace,
Nor lands nor power to gain;
He seeks to serve, to love, to lift—
Who follows in His train?
A glorious band, in every age,
In spite of scorn and pain,
True sons of God, His peace have made,
Who follows in their train?

Now let the world to Peace be won,
And every hatred slain;
Let force and greed be overcome
And love supreme remain!
Let justice rule in all the earth,
And mercy while we live,
Lest we—forgiven much—forget
Our brother to forgive!

We send our love to every land—
True neighbors would we be!
And pray God's Peace to reign in them,
Where'er their homeland be!
O God, to us may grace be given,
Who bear the dear Christ's name,
To live at peace with every man,
And thus our Christ's acclaim!

PETROLEUM SUPPLY

The enormous increase in the production of petroleum, particularly from the new fields of California, has driven the price of gasoline down and down. The Standard Oil, it seems, is showing its faith in the future of the oil business by taking advantage of the present slump in prices to buy up producing companies. The official publication of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, "The Lamp," reckons that consumption will again overtake production next June. Then we may be sure, as surplus oil decreases, prices will rise. Let us ride all we can this winter, for next winter we may not be able to afford to!

JULIUS ROSENWALD WORK FOR SOUTHERN NEGROES

When in 1912 Booker T. Washington made his appeal to Mr. Rosenwald for funds to educate the Negroes in his own State of Alabama, he said that Negroes numbered half the population of the State, and that the year before, while $2,865,000 was spent on education, only $360,000 of it went to schools for Negro children; that sixty per cent. of the white children were enrolled for an average term of seven months, and only twenty per cent. of the Negro children were enrolled for an average term of four months. Something must be done. Mr. Rosenwald agreed to do something, and he did do it. As a result of

"TWELVE TESTS OF CHARACTER"

A new book by the man who has been characterized as "one of the spiritual leaders of America" almost deserves that much abused word "event." Certainly it is an event to the tens of thousands who have read any one of his "Trilogy of Meanings." This noted and popular New York preacher loses none of his telling phrases nor compelling sincerity when he puts his message on paper, and his clear vision makes that message of enduring value.

"Twelve Tests of Character" deals with a subject that is fascinating to us all—human nature and individual character—and deals with it in an absorbing and inspiring way. NEARLY A MILLION of the other Fosdick books have been read, and there is every evidence that this new book has a message for a very large public. Cloth, $1.50

The World of To-day

THE ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS

Congress assembled Monday, December 3rd. In spite of the anticipation that the Senate might have difficulty in organizing because some of the Senators thought it bad judgment that so old a man as Senator Cummins (he is seventy-four) should occupy both the position of President of the Senate and Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, the Senate proceeded with its organization and postponed the question of committee assignments. The organization has preferred that Senator Cummins should resign as President of the Senate and retain his place as head of the committee, since Senator La Follette is second on the Interstate Commerce Committee and would become chairman if Senator Cummins resigned as chairman. Senator Cummins was determined to hold both places. In the House twenty-two insurgents and independents held the balance of power in the balloting for Speaker. While the dragon of Cannonism was supposedly slain some ten years ago, there has grown up a new system of rules in the House that makes it almost as difficult to put through any measure which does not suit the party leaders as it was in the days of Cannon and Reed. When the Democratic party is in control of the House the party members choose the membership of the committees. When the Republicans control, a small committee has charge of the committee assignments. There is practically no way in which a bill can be forced out of a committee which refuses to report it. The Republican majority of the steering committee can decide practically all the legislation which shall come before the House. The insurgents held up the organization of the House for three days. At the end of that time Mr. Nicholas Longworth, Republican leader of the House, and Mr. Nelson made an agreement by which the House will operate under the present rules for thirty days. During that time members will submit to the Rules Committee suggestions for amendments to the rules. Then the Rules Committee will make a report, which may be amended by motion from the floor of the House. Some change in the rules is almost certain.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

On Thursday, President Coolidge delivered his first message to Congress. President Coolidge writes and thinks clearly. He is willing that people should know what he means. We read his message with mixed feelings. In his opening paragraphs on foreign affairs he makes the familiar misinterpretation of the election of 1921. He says:

Our country has definitely refused to adopt and ratify the Covenant of the League of Nations. We have not felt warranted in assuming the responsibilities which its members have assumed. I am not proposing any change in this policy; neither is the Senate. The incident, so far as we are concerned, is closed. The League exists as a foreign agency. We hope it will be helpful. But the United States sees no reason to limit its own freedom and independence of action by joining it. We shall do well to recognize this basic fact in all national affairs and govern ourselves accordingly.

Then he advocates our entry into the Permanent Court of International Justice, urging that it is not a partisan question. If only we might as a nation have taken the same attitude toward the League of Nations! And why can we not today? As President Coolidge says, "Partisanship has no place in our foreign relations." The President is not willing that we should recognize the Russian government until it is disposed to compensate American citizens who were spoiled in Russia and is willing to accept responsibility for the debt contracted by the Russian Republican government. In regard to the war debt owed us by our allies, the President says, "I do not favor the cancellation of this debt," but immediately adds, "I see no objection to adjusting it in accordance with the principle adopted for the British debt." But the readjustment which France needs is a more generous one than that which we made with Great Britain. In addition to our financial interest in the economic recovery of Europe, we desire, he says, "the stability of civilization and the welfare of humanity." Strange, if we care so much about these things that we cannot take part in the most effective organization yet made for the furtherance of "the stability of civilization."

THE PRESIDENT ON DOMESTIC QUESTIONS

The President in his message earnestly commended the present budget system. He approved Secretary Mellon's plan for the reduction of taxes. High taxes, he said, bear most heavily upon the poor. "They diminish industry and commerce. They make agriculture unprofitable. They increase the rates on transportation. They are a charge on every necessary of life." He advocates a constitutional amendment to abolish the right to issue tax exempt securities. He would make no changes in the tariff. He would transfer the government shipping to private ownership with the aim of "first, and of prime importance, adequate means for national defense; second, adequate service to American commerce." He advocates further development of our intra-coastal waterways, as we have the means to pay for them. He would not change the railroad rate law, but would hasten the consolidation of our railroads into regional systems. On prohibition he is very satisfactory. In order to prevent smuggling he would strengthen the Coast Guard and secure a supply of swift power boats. He concluded his discussion of prohibition with these words: "Free government has no greater menace than disrespect for authority and continual violation of law. It is the duty of a citizen not only to observe the law, but to let it be known that he is opposed to its violation." A considerable number of our college graduates and big business men need to learn to think as straightly on the topic. The President would have Congress pass an anti-lynching law. He recommends the appropriation of half a million dollars for medical courses at Howard University. "to help contribute to the education of five hundred colored doctors needed each year." He would extend the Civil Service Law to first, second and third class postmasters and to the prohibition officers.

THE MESSAGE AND THE PUBLIC

The President does not believe in reducing the size of our army and navy. His thinking in regard to the use of force will be somewhat disappointing to many. He says, "We want no more competitive armaments. We want no more war. But we want no weakness that invites imposition. A people who neglect their national defense are putting in jeopardy their national honor." But such a statement puts the case very incompletely. Mr. Coolidge favors a constitutional amendment against child labor; he would include a Secretary of Education in the Cabinet; he believes in the policy of restricted immigration. In ten words he stops all question as to his attitude in regard to "adjusted compensation." He says very simply, "But I do not favor the granting of a bonus." He bids those who are responsible for the conditions in the coal industry to undertake its reform and free it from any charge of profiteering. In the section of his message devoted to agriculture he notes the need of reducing the acreage planted in wheat and of increasing diversification in farming. "Those farmers who raise their living on their land," he comments, "are not greatly in distress." He also suggests that co-operative marketing would help. The President's judgment, as evidenced in this message, seems generally very sound and his recommendations have commanded very wide approval. It is encouraging to see "The Atlanta Constitution," for instance, a great, old Democratic paper, urge the Democrats to co-operate in the enactment of "a program so soundly and forcibly and resolutely laid down." The New Orleans "Picayune" comments, "By unequivocal statements for the Treasury tax plan, the World Court and against bonus he compels the respect even of those who disagree with him about these issues." The Philadelphia "Public Ledger" remarks of the message, "It is written as a man might write who cared not two whoops whether or not he came back to the White House."

THE PRESIDENT'S IDEALISM

While one may be disappointed in the President's attitude toward war, for he seems to take it for granted that we shall continue occasionally to indulge in such madness, yet a fine idealism likewise appears in last week's message to Congress. After recommending a Department of Education in the Cabinet, the President commented, "Enlightenment must be accompanied by that moral power which is the product of the home and of religion." He ended his message with a noble recognition that as a nation we cannot live for ourselves.

We are great and powerful. New powers bring new responsibilities. Our duty then [when the Monroe Doctrine was adopted] was to protect ourselves. Added to that, our duty now is to help give stability to the world. We want idealism. We want that vision which lifts men and nations above themselves. These are virtues by reason of their own merit. But they must not be cloistered; they must not be impractical; they must not be ineffective.

The world has had enough of the curse of hatred and selfishness, of destruction and war. It has had enough of the wrongful use of material power. For the healing of the nations there must be good-will and charity, confidence and peace. The time has come for a more practical use of moral power and more reliance upon the principle that right makes its own might. Our authority among the nations must be represented by justice and mercy. It is necessary not only to have faith, but to make sacrifices for our faith. The spiritual forces of the world make all its final determinations. It is with these voices that America should speak. Whenever they declare a righteous purpose there need be no doubt that they will be heard. America has taken her place in the world as a republic—free, independent, powerful. The best service that can be rendered to humanity is the assurance that this place will be maintained.

It is remarkable that, when the President feels so strongly our duty in the world, he should not also be ready to come out and say that we should take the natural next step and become a part of that world organization which is forming and which has already proved itself a very great help toward peace.

THE BRITISH ELECTION

By a majority of almost three million votes out of a total of twelve million, the British electors last week refused to adopt the policy of protection which Prime Minister Baldwin and the Conservatives advocated. That unfavorable majority, however, represented only a gain of one hundred thousand votes each by the Liberals and the Laborites, and a corresponding loss of two hundred thousand by the Conservatives. The Bonar Law-Baldwin government from the first has represented only a minority in the country. In the campaign the Prime Minister had promised that under protection the unemployed should have work and the farmers should receive a subsidy of one pound per acre of land under cultivation, on condition that they paid their employees a minimum of thirty shillings a week. Neither element swallowed the bait. Districts where the unemployed are strongest defeated Conservative candidates almost uniformly, and in the country, where the Conservatives felt sure of seats, they suffered very numerous losses. The new Parliament will consist of some 260 Conservatives, 190 Laborites, 150 Liberals and ten Independents. The general expectation is that Prime Minister Baldwin will continue in office for a short while, will submit his scheme for protection, and when it is defeated will, of course, resign. But what will succeed the Conservative government is a puzzle. Whether it will be a coalition between the Liberals and Conservatives, led probably by ex-Prime Minister Asquith, or a coalition between the Liberals and the Laborites is most uncertain. Last Saturday's "Punch" printed a picture of Mr. Baldwin piloting Mr. Asquith about Chequers Court, the official country residence of the Prime Minister, and saying, "Look the place over, but I warn you it is haunted." Off in a corner one sees a chair occupied by the shade of Lloyd George. The Conservative defeat was, indeed, in large measure due to the little Welshman. He made the workingmen and the women feel that protection certainly meant an increase in the cost of living. Apparently the women voted more nearly as a class than in any preceding election, and against the Conservatives. Of the thirty-one women candidates for Parliament, eight were returned, an increase of five over the number in the late Parliament. Three women, Lady Astor, Mrs. Wintringham and Mrs. Phillipson, sat in that Parliament and were all re-elected. The newcomers are the Dutchess of Athol, Conservative; Lady Terrington, Liberal, and three Laborites, Miss Susan Lawrence, Miss Margaret Bondfield and Miss Dorothea Jewson. None of the last three are of the working class, but they have all been associated with the trades union movement. Miss Jewson graduated at Girton College, Cambridge.

"AMERICA GOOD TO US"

Wherever one travels in the Near East to-day he meets most eloquent testimony to the superb service rendered by Near East Relief. Most vivid of all is the evidence of thousands of orphaned children, now safe and happy in well-kept orphanages, and of other thousands of penniless but grateful Armenian and Greek refugees, most of whom would to-day be in unknown graves but for the merciful work of Near East Relief. Almost equally moving is the open gratitude of the Greek nation as a whole, and of what would be to-day the Armenian nation except for the tragic injustice of recent history. The affection of a whole people for America, as a result of what has been done, you may observe anywhere, in low quarters or high. Samuel McCrea Cavert, one of the general secretaries of the Federal Council of Churches, while in Greece this summer, sat in a train beside a Greek farmer, who could speak only broken words of English. "You American? America good to us." The Archbishop of the Orthodox Greek Church, Prime Minister Gonatas, Colonel Plastiras (the chief of the so-called revolution), and even His Majesty, King George, spoke to him, as the main subject of conversation, of their appreciation of what the American people had done for Greece. The Archbishop declared that he saw in the work of Near East Relief a great indication of the spiritual power and vitality of the American churches. The King said: "Tell your people we shall not forget how they helped us in our hour of terrible need." A demonstration of this gratitude occurred at the time of President Harding's death. In spite of the fact that the Government of the United States and the Government of Greece are still in a technical state of severed diplomatic relations, the Greek refugees, with the help of the government and their Church, planned a memorial service to our President as an expression of their grief for the loss of one who was the symbol of American friendship. It was a memorable sight. Packed into the Cathedral were thousands of reverent refugees, while other thousands of refugees and orphans thronged the square outside. One wonders whether amid all the notable memorial services held throughout the world any would have been more gratifying to the President than this spontaneous tribute, in the liturgy of a foreign church, of affection for the people of whom he was the head.

THE CHIEF CHAPLAIN'S DISTRUST OF CHRISTIANITY

Chief Chaplain Axton appears to have a war "complex." Virtually every one of his speeches which has been sent out to the press discusses the necessity for a great army and navy or urges support of the National Defense Act. When he addressed the New York City Rotarians' luncheon on "Chaplains' Day," December 6th, he indulged in the familiar argument. The United States military force, he said in effect, is a bulldog to guard the house. "A burglar never deliberately raids a house if he knows there is a bulldog behind the window through which he wishes to enter." But he would give the army a good name. "The bulldog is probably so friendly that all the little children in the neighborhood frolic with him in the back yard by daylight." So anxious was he or the War Department to get his speech into the press that it went out through at least two channels. Why does not the Chief Chaplain apply his bulldog principle to our respective States? Why does he not suggest that Iowa line up a military force along the border of Missouri? Must not a State keep the burglar from coming in through the window? We fear the Chief Chaplain is not talking complete Christianity. Here is practically all the world organizing in somewhat the fashion that our own States organized after the Revolution. We talk glibly of our good-will to the world, but we refuse to come into the organization and assert that we must have an army and a navy to protect us! Why not play the game with the rest of the nations and so speed the day when it will seem as absurd for the United States to buy cannon and guns for its private national use as it would be for one of our States to do so in fear of one of its forty-seven sisters? But to return to our topic, again we insist that the function of the Chaplains' Department is to bring the message of Christianity to the soldiers. It is not to advocate War Department policies through the religious press. The Church cannot maintain interest in a chaplains' office whose principal public activity is the preaching of armament, armament and yet more armament.

FRENCH PROTESTANTISM

Among the many welcome visitors to this country for the Philadelphia meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches were Monsieur and Madame Jezequel. Monsieur Jezequel is secretary of the National Union of Huguenot Churches of France. Madame Jezequel, a woman of unusual ability, is one of the leaders of the French group of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches. They bring a hopeful view of religious conditions in Protestant France. Thanks to the three hundred thousand Protestants in the reannexed provinces, French Protestants to-day number one million. The really convinced Roman Catholics only come to some eight million. As a matter of fact, the great majority of French people are outside the church and have practically no interest in religion as embodied in Christianity. The Protestants possess more than their proportion of influence in the country. Forty or fifty Protestants sit among the six hundred, more or less, deputies in the French Parliament. Monsieur Edouard Soulier has especially stood out among them. Soulier was one of the men elected under the new group system at the last parliamentary election to represent the Protestant interests in Paris. But he has been a disappointment to the Protestant group. They understood that he would advocate advanced social legislation. He has stood rather for what was reactionary. Monsieur André Weiss, vice president of the Court of International Justice, represents French Protestant feeling in more satisfactory fashion. Other Protestants of like caliber figure in French public life. The French Protestant Church is enjoying a new vitality since the war. Where there used to be only five or six men studying for the ministry, to-day there are thirty or thirty-five. Of course, some of these come from the new provinces. But even so, the number from the old French Church has very largely increased. The Church is working up societies for the young people, Boy Scouts, a Young Men's Association, and so on. The church attendance of the young people has increased. French Protestant leaders look forward with greatest hope. The war between the Liberals and the Conservatives was fought out in France perhaps fifty years ago. At that time there was a split between the Liberals and the Conservatives in the Reformed Church, but the two divisions of the Church work freely together to-day. They are practically one. Many men of eminence are connected with neither one nor the other division. The American Baptist Fundamentalists have talked of a split among the French Baptists, between the Fundamentalists and the "Modernists," but French Baptists are so small in numbers that the revival of theological acrimony in that little denomination is nothing more than the dropping of a leaf in the corner.

GODD-WILL BETWEEN PROTESTANT AND ROMAN CATHOLIC

With all the foolish talk that goes on of the opposition between Roman Catholics and Protestants it is pleasant at times to note incidents of another sort. We think of a community in the northeast of our country where the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist and Roman Catholic pastors have united for the week-day instruction of school children. They have agreed on a course of study. The three Protestant pastors give the instruction in the primary and grammar grades of the school. The Roman Catholic priest gives it in the high school. Any one might exchange his place with another. They all have full faith in the integrity of each other, that each will teach religion as they all would see it, without trying to bring in anything on which they would differ. We are reminded of another recent manifestation of good-will between Roman Catholics and Protestants. The minister of the Scarsdale (New York) Congregational Church died suddenly while away on his vacation. The priest of the Roman Catholic Church of the village wrote the following letter to the assistant pastor of the Congregational church:

I wish to extend to you, to the trustees of your church and to the members of your congregation, in my own name and in the name of the members of my parish our very deep sympathy in the sad and sudden death of the shepherd of your flock.

In the departure from this life of the Rev. Henry M. Dyckman this community, as well as his congregation, have lost a power and influence for good well-nigh inestimable.

The late Mr. Dyckman's civic virtues, as well as his exceptional moral and manly qualities as set forth in his sense of justice, righteousness, kindness and Christian love for his fellow-man, have endeared him to everyone who knew him.

This bereaved community, as well as his sorrow-stricken congregation, might well look upon his sudden departure, from its midst in the one case and from its leadership in the other, as well-nigh irreparable.

As a personal friend and as a co-worker for God I prized him and revered him.

Trusting that God will empower you to bear your great loss with genuine Christian fortitude and perfect resignation, I beg to remain with heartfelt sympathy,

Such a letter gives a better hope for unity in America than all the masks that ten thousand men may wear.

Preliminaries or Praise

DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON, author of the famous story, "In His Steps," and editor of "The Christian Herald," has, like Robert Louis Stevenson, suggested his own epitaph. Upon his tomb there should be placed these words, he says: "Here lies a man who had a sermon to preach. He longed to preach it, but was killed by the preliminaries." Dr. Sheldon specifies these preliminaries: organ prelude, doxology, invocation, response, solo, responsive reading, anthem, hymn, duet, Scripture, prayer, response, second anthem, notices, solo, offering, offertory prayer, hymn, sermon, hymn, benediction, postlude. Dr. Sheldon might have observed that in some instances there is a second Scripture lesson, a children's sermon, and that the prayer is from ten to fifteen minutes long. He mentions that often when he gets up to preach in some church there have been fifty minutes of these "preliminaries." The writer preaches nearly every Sunday in some church and he has often had this same experience. The sermon has sometimes come when the people have been through an hour of religious exercises, and it was easy to see that they were rather fatigued from having been sung to and prayed to so long. He has often thought that it might be a good idea to have the sermon come early in the service and have half the service come after the sermon, as is the custom in the Roman Catholic Church. There the sermon comes after the mass has proceeded about twenty minutes and the people are all alert for the message of the day.

But it was not altogether of this that we would speak. It is the question of whether we are going to have "preliminaries" or praise and worship. There can be no doubt but that in many of our churches the service before the sermon is looked upon as "preliminaries" to the sermon. Also, the service is more of the nature of a concert to which the congregation listens. Our whole system of quartette choirs and soloists tends to give this impression. Worship should always be common worship. It is not worship unless the whole congregation takes part in it. Sitting and listening to soloists and quartettes is not worship and very seldom does it create the worshipful atmosphere. This is easily to be seen by anyone who has made any study of the psychology of congregations. The only opportunity for the congregation to take part in the worship of many churches is in two or three hymns and a responsive reading. The minister is supposed to voice the aspirations and longings of the congregation in the "long" prayer. But only about one man out of four does this. The prayer is too individualistic and too much in the nature of a preachment to the people to be common prayer. The liturgical churches avoid this by using prayers which the whole congregation knows and in which it can join either audibly or silently. Furthermore, these prayers are "common" in their nature. They have been coined out of the experience of the needs and devotion of the ages. What the liturgical church loses in spontaneity it gains in common worship. We doubt if the non-liturgical Protestant churches will ever abandon the free and extemporaneous prayer. We are not sure it would be wise for them so to do. For this reason the minister should take infinite pains to make his prayer express to the utmost the common consciousness and yearnings of the people. The average non-liturgical Protestant minister should put as much thought upon his prayer as upon his sermon. Some ministers do this with the most praiseworthy result and to the great help of the people. Dr. Jowett has done this and carefully arranged his prayers under headings which express the common need. He announces these headings in the course of the prayer. "Let us pray for those who are in great temptation." "Now let us pray for those who are passing through great sorrow." "Now let us pray for the youth of the land—those who are at school and college, and those who work in shop or office." "Now let us pray for the missionaries at home and abroad." The result of this was that the people felt they were praying with the pastor, and this is worship. We cannot emphasize this too strongly, for we fear that most of our ministers put no thought upon this thing and when they rise to pray express themselves alone and not the people. This is not worship, and it is on the side of worship, not of preaching, that our non-liturgical Protestant churches fall short.

As to the music, that also should be common if it is to be praise and not "preliminaries," which it too often is. We are frank to say that we do not think it can be made so with quartettes and soloists except in rare instances. The quartette is too individualistic. The average man will be thinking of the singer in spite of himself. He will be asking, "Has he or she a fine voice?" "Does he or she sing well?" It is this individualism inherent in many prayers and in practically all solo and quartette singing that is the greatest foe of worship. A chorus choir, even though it sings without the congregation joining, is a long step out of this individualism and concert stage toward common worship, because the mind is immediately drawn from listening to individuals to listening to the music and words. This is a step toward sharing in the singing. Where the words are those familiar to the congregation, as they are in the liturgical churches, it easily passes into common worship. Perhaps the ideal is reached in those churches where the people know both the words and the music. We have a feeling that the reason some people are not interested in the services of the church is because they have no part in it, are simply spectators or listeners, find no "common" worship.

Perhaps there is nothing more needed just now in our non-liturgical Protestant churches than to regain that worshipful atmosphere we seem to have lost. Our preaching is on high levels, on higher levels than one finds in the liturgical churches. There is no reason why it should be minimized in the regaining of a service in which preliminaries are forgotten in a beautiful spirit of adoration and a humbling ourselves before God. As we have said on a previous occasion, the one thing lacking in many churches is any sense of awe in the presence of God. We go to church as to an afternoon tea and bestow ourselves to listen to preliminaries as we do to hear a piano solo in a drawing room. Now the one thing most people need just now is to feel that there is something bigger and holier than themselves in the world, and church is the place to feel it. But how many people in the ordinary church service prostrate themselves before God, feel the Eternal and Holy One is in their midst; how many fall upon their knees in awe and adoration, feeling their littleness in the presence of the Infinite; how many are really meeting God face to face. We have seen Roman Catholics tremble with awe as the Host was elevated, seen thousands fall upon their knees before the Lord. We have not the Host, but have we not the Holy Spirit in our midst, the Eternal Christ in the temple? It is this that we have got to regain in our Protestant churches, and that minister who can do most to make his service one complete act of adoration, reverence and holy awe; prayers, music and sermon all fitly joined together; all part of one sacrifice of common praise, all working toward the same end of bringing the people face to face with God, is going to render an inestimable benefit to the Protestant Church, to the people of God, and to the faith.

Divine Love in the Affairs of To-day

THAT the religion of individuals and of the Church must be intensified, deepened, enlarged on every side, unified, according to the command of our Lord, is the ever growing conviction of Christians and even of non-Christians. Judgment knocks at our door to inquire if we control our surroundings as the apostles, or even the medievalists, controlled their surroundings. That judgment comes upon us like a thief in the night in what is indeed the "Day of Christ." If it finds us impotent before prevailing secularism, acquiescent with a deified state, unaware of the sin of separateness in the face of a united and vigorous antagonism to the Faith, no excuses and no extenuation can avail us. Other golden candle-sticks besides those of the earliest churches will be removed from before the Throne; other once historic and memorable fellowships will inevitably fade and die. The churches we serve must overcome hate, greed, arrogance, rabid nationalism and war before they can produce the fruits of that righteousness which is by Christ, as an offering to the glory and praise of God.

Consider in this connection the signs of the times. Doubtless, countless Christians have found in the Life of Divine Love the path to the Eternal City. We rejoice in the hosts of the spiritually-minded, of every sect and persuasion, who are intent on the application of God's passion in them to the woeful needs of human existence. But our rejoicing is modified by the ageless quarrels that are now renewed; by the vagaries of theological disputes that have little or no bearing upon the realities of religion. The spectacle of Europe as the mediate source of our Christianity is extremely depressing. It arrests our jubilation. It forces us to ask how we can sing the sons of Zion in a torn, distracted world bedeviled by misery and want. Nor can we question the conclusion that had the Love which alone reduces all national and ethnical boundaries and overlaps all creeds and sects been more abundant it would have exterminated those degrading conceptions of God and man which are traceable to the fleshly vision. Its wisdom is seen in its defense of the universality of the mission of the Church. It prompts us to unite the changeless goodness and mercy of God with a continually fluctuating world. It overarches endless discussions and differences as the sky overarches oceans and continents. To make that goodness and mercy our own, to give through them succor and guidance to a despondent, wandering race, we must first clearly apprehend for ourselves and for our fellow-men that the center of faith is not in creeds, sects and parties, but in the Love that ordains salvation for the entire world in Christ Jesus. They depart; He remains "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever."

Stress as you will the need of social and political reforms, yet these are not doors to Paradise. One can imagine temporal Elysium, such as the literature of Utopias paints. But unless the inward man of the heart is conformed to that which is holy and just, these prospectively perfect frameworks will not satisfy the cravings of the soul. Much is also said in behalf of the educational processes of Christianity. Certainly no right-minded person will deny their importance. Yet again, are we presumptuous in insisting that Christianity is more than knowledge, however adequate or sacred? It is the Life of Divine Love shed abroad in believers' hearts; a strangely transforming vitality imparted, not by tuition, but by the spirit's immediate contact with the source of that Life. Scholarship is also brought into the issue to be eulogized or reviled according to well-known proclivities. It cannot be separated from religion if superstition is to be kept at bay. But the reverent and constructive learning which has made us heavy debtors and with which our church has had a long and meritorious connection, does no more than prepare the way of the Lord. It does a great deal in doing this. Nevertheless, we long for this appearance as in the former times; and that He will make bare His arm and save the nations from degeneracy. Rid the Scriptures of misinterpretation, show that they are not free from the hazards of their human elements, furnish means for a theology which moves freely and fearlessly among the amazing conquests of the scientific mind. For these admirable achievements we shall be grateful. The marrow of the Gospel is not in erudition, nor even in the more generous and befitting explanations we may give of it. It is in the inward, the indefinable passion which transmutes every faculty and gives it a capacity and a strength above itself. Less instructed periods to which we look back have experienced a high state of grace and a comparatively low state of culture. Other periods, on the contrary, have experienced a high state of culture, and a rampant paganism which was the despair of the legislator and the moralist.

Again, the message we convey is seldom rejected outright. True, a group of intellectuals patronizes it; treats it as though it were unsuited to the deepest needs of life, and would relegate Christianity to the shades where gods and ghosts already dwell. But it is usually admitted that the Church is an indispensable institution, and that her agencies exercise a very beneficial influence. So far, so good, but how very far from the New Testament standards and requirements! Do we not hunger for the Bread of God, sent down out of heaven? We observe a prodigal world, sorely bereft and wounded, in dire distress, feeding on the husks the swine eat. We recall that in the Father's house there is Love enough and to spare; grace to cover all the sins of mankind; justice for the oppressed, wisdom for the foolish, strength for the weak, pardon for the penitent, restraint for the heedless. Could we but witness an apocalyptic renewal of the heart and conscience of society in evangelical righteousness we should want no further apologetic.

Is there a sign of brightening horizons? The reply is in the affirmative. The felt need for one visible sacred society as the home of all Christians and for the moralization and balancing of the state is surely an answer to that prayer. The unconditioned Church has already passed; the unconditioned state is passing. Catholicity is congenital to love; separation is its antithesis. Integration is carried forward despite all hindrances. Believers in every land are anticipating the oneness which will have to precede and not follow genuine political unification. In this issue, as in previous periods, any enlightened theocracy is the ancestor of a verifiable democracy, unhampered by the feuds which have deluged Europe with blood. The operation of Christian love is also revealed by the gradual weakening of race prejudice. I shall be reminded that it has a sorry awakening in this republic. But its native ugliness and its negation of Christianity are demonstrated by the latest outbreak. It has but to emerge to drive us to the estimate of St. Paul. He foresaw its submergence; he declared that henceforth he knew no man after the flesh. The tribalism, select races, imperialistic preferences, the gulfs cloven by color, culture, distance, were no more. He marshaled the people of the earth as one entity for the coming of their King. He passed them in review, pronounced them alike the property of Divine Love. Christ also came into the picture, and He was no longer seen under fleshly limitations. The Shepherd and Bishop of all Souls was federalized with them in the dominion of the Spirit.

It elevates believers above their environment, but the elevation is sacrificial after the pattern of the one sacrifice which draws all souls to its expiatory grace. It shows us the meaning of Christ's cry as He faced His ordeal, "All souls are mine." Its eminence is the source of its compassion, of its justice, of its constraint in service, of its unspeakable compensations. For seeing Jesus as High Priest, Love sees all men completed and perfected in Him. His reign from the Cross has hallowed and magnified the mission of the Church in the world. Nor will her mission end until all nations have heard and obeyed the Gospel. Does this prediction daunt our tamer day? Is its fulfilment to be delayed by contemptible ideas about earthly "success"? Then what of the Asiatic savage who knows full well what his pleasures are, and seems content to revel in them? Yet once he realizes his profounder self he will start the prayer wheels on which a million prayers revolve daily to satisfy his spiritual cravings.

We venture to think that the fruits of righteousness are still ours. The lover of God and of the brotherhood of man will share this will and purpose for the brotherhood. He will apprehend that neither the silent spaces above, nor the absurdities and tragedies of existence beneath, nor the brutality of death, nor the madness of needless conflict, can quench that God consciousness in men which responds to the call of their Creator. Let us then abandon the lower levels that have no rational terminus and address ourselves against every evil and in behalf of every good, fortified by Divine Love.

The Rhythm of Life

HERBERT SPENCER maintained that rhythm accompanied all motion. He illustrates from the action of a breeze on a flag, wind on a tree, tides on the seashore, marine currents, animal life, and human life. In regard to human experience, whether or not we can find any law which governs these alternations of feeling and consciousness, we know the fact. A strong emotion, whether of joy or of sorrow, does not maintain one level—it subsides and returns. Probably the same power that gives pauses to pain gives pauses also to pleasure. It is the power that preserves our sanity. Some people have very marked periods of exhilaration and depression; others, much more equable, have nevertheless their undulations of feeling. Life is not uniform anywhere.

In regard to spiritual experience and the religious life, this fact has often been a puzzle and a cause of unnecessary trouble. The mystics talk about the dark night of the soul following days of glorious vision. And it is quite common in religious life to feel that the tide of power which rolled up the shore of life is ebbing; there are times when one feels that the best things which were so clear and sure are not quite so clear and sure, times when God and all the high things of the soul are so real that beside them nothing else is worth much; but other times when God and the high things of the soul seem to be in the background. One day the tide runs in strong, another day it seems to be going far, far away, and one feels as if it will never return. "Thy loving kindness is better than life, I will praise Thee while I live," is the utterance of one day, but on the very next day we cry in distress. "Why standest Thou afar off, O God, why hidest Thou thyself in time of trouble?" When Cowper longed for the blessedness which once he had known, he thought that sins had driven the sweet messenger of rest away. That may have been so, but it is not necessarily so at all. Quite apart from sins, hours of perfect peace and blissful blessedness do not last; they go, but they come again. This is in the nature of life, and here spiritual experience is in harmony with mental experience, and physical experience, and with all motion throughout the universe. A state of equilibrium anywhere would be a state of stagnation. So long as we move, so long as we grow, there must be this rhythm, this "periodicity," as Spencer and others call it.

It would be well to accept this as normal. It is one of the things we do not know in youth, and many fail to learn it properly even in manhood. Alice Maynell says: "It is in the afterpart of each life that the law is learnt so definitely as to do away with the hope or fear of continuance. That young sorrow comes so near to despair is the result of young ignorance. So is the early hope of great achievement. Life seems so long and its capacity so great, to one who knows nothing of all the intervals it needs must hold, intervals between aspirations, between actions, pauses as inevitable as the pauses of sleep." When a great sorrow comes to the young it is felt as if it were going to last forever. Nor can one tell them that it will not be so, for at the moment when the sorrow is acute such an announcement would seem to them either a want of understanding or a want of sympathy. All one can do is to be sincerely sympathetic and friendly and let life bring its own revelation later on.

In the same way young joy takes full possession, and there is no suspicion that it will not last on the present ecstatic level. The young idealist is full of confidence that his cause will go straight ahead to victory. He does not foresee the intervals, the setbacks, the hindrances, nor does he see that the soul itself will demand pauses as surely as the body demands sleep. Not for one moment would one have youth different from what it is, but this fact of rhythm, of alternations, is one we have to learn as we go along. After all, if there were no hills, there would be no valleys, no day if there were no night. Sorrow and pain, no doubt, are hard to bear, but without them we should not know pleasure or joy. It is just as true that we should never know fulness of religious feeling if we had not times when we felt empty. It is just as necessary for God to hide Himself as to reveal Himself. We often speak of the need of mountain-top experiences in religion. They are perhaps the greatest of privileges. But it is not only the work of the world that calls us back from them, but the need of our own soul, too. If the experience of the mount gives us inspiration for life in the plain, it is equally true that life down below has its own way of qualifying us for the experience of the high places in religion. It is not only that "tasks in hours of insight will be done through hours of gloom fulfilled," but that the hours of gloom also have a training of their own and a discipline for the soul, which in turn qualifies for the hours of insight. The time of high awareness is a glorious time, for the light is unclouded, the far distances are clear, the great truths are certain, and to the soul God is the one reality. But if such a time were constant, no soul could live. The current would be too strong for the lamp, and would burn it out. God's withdrawals, properly understood, are mercies. The sea is just as much under His control in the ebb as in the flow.

Once we understand this we shall not be afraid of the ebb tide of the spirit, any more than the navigator on a tidal river becomes gloomy and despairing when the water is getting low. He understands it, and he uses the time to prepare for the next tide. We shall not fear that the cloud which hides the sun is a frown of Deity—it but shades a heat which if too long continued would enervate us. If the soul could sustain one note, however high and clear, it could not make music. There must be a fall as well as a rise, a cadence. It is a mistake to try for a uniformity in religious experience which is really impossible anywhere in life.

The mistake, indeed, that many make with life is to seek to sustain it on one level. There are people who try to make pleasure in life continuous. They cannot bear to be dull even for a day. They are in a fever to keep up a constant succession of pleasures. I have seen lives of that sort sometimes come down with a terrible crash. It was like an effort to span the high ridges of a bridge that broke when they were in the middle of it. They might have come gradually down the slope, and, just by continuing, gone up on the other side, but they could not bear the interval in the valley. We must learn this law of alternation, and learn it in the religious life. It is God's arrangement for us so that we may not be consumed on the mountain-top, nor crushed in the valley. We must learn to take the times when we are down as pauses in the advance, times of refitting for the forward marches, days when life, if we take it rightly, will bring us the necessary discipline. The way to be reconciled to these changes is to see that they are related, that they can be made mutually serviceable, and that they all belong to God.

THE OBSERVER

The Clergy Club and the Actors

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

I ATTENDED a very interesting luncheon at the Hotel Astor last week. The Clergy Club of New York City had as its guests William Hodge, the well-known actor, and his whole company. The luncheon was in the nature of reciprocity. A few weeks ago Mr. Hodge invited the members of the Clergy Club to see his play, "For All of Us." He is not only the author of the play, but the leading actor. The clergymen who accepted his invitation—and a great many did accept—were greatly impressed by its high moral tone, but more especially by the message of good-will, charity and brotherhood which stood out from every line. The Clergy Club became so interested in the whole problem of the stage and morality that they suggested to Mr. Hodge that he be their guest and speak to them from his heart and very frankly on this subject.

It seemed an especially opportune time to discuss this theme. During the last month the newspapers of New York have been full of the action certain groups have been contemplating against three or four plays which they claim surpass in pruriency, salaciousness and effrontery anything ever seen on the New York stage. Besides these groups of citizens, one of the commissions of the Methodist Episcopal Church has been investigating certain plays and reported its findings to the press. Now Bishop Manning has asked one of the Protestant Episcopal groups also to look into the matter.

None of the groups will have to look far. One play running in New York is a most realistic and disgusting picture of the course of a courtesan from girlhood to middle age. Nothing is left to the imagination, and such sordidness has never before been seen on the stage. One of the revues is described in full detail by the Methodist committee. The stage is full of a lot of naked girls running about exhibiting themselves to the throngs of eagerly staring men. One of the papers says that it goes the Folies Bergere of Paris one better, which no one thought possible. Two or three plays also come in for criticism. There seems to be no restraint whatever upon the conversation on sexual matters in these plays. No steps as yet have been taken by the authorities to stop these plays and the Commissioner of Licenses says he cannot act except upon specific complaints from observers of the plays. (There is great wonderment upon the part of many why the aforesaid Commissioner of Licenses should be so ignorant of plays which everybody else knows are vile and why he should have licensed them in the beginning.)

The result of all this agitation is that there is a rather strong movement toward appointing an official censor or board of censorship which shall pronounce upon all plays before they are presented to the public. The difficulty of this course is that it is hard to find censors who have good judgment, and that when censors act some judge can always be found to make this action of no avail. In this way a vile play gets free advertisement and the lewd mob rush to see it. But if it comes to censorship with power, no one will be to blame except the producers of the plays themselves.

Mr. Hodge went into this matter of immoral plays at some length. Of course, he was perfectly right in insisting that the clergy and others in attacking the stage should attack not the whole stage but specific plays. There were plenty of plays on in the sixty theaters of New York that were as clean and healthy as the average book or magazine read in every home. After all, the number of filthy plays and objectionable revues were few. The thing to do was to be specific. Attack the vile play just as you attack the vile book. It is just as futile to attack the whole drama as it is to attack literature as a whole. Mr. Hodge thought the clergy ought to go even further. The drama was an integral part of human society. People have always flocked to the theater, and they always would. They loved the dramatic element in life, and the stage gave it to them. The thing to do was not to outlaw the theater, but make it as clean and healthy as music or literature or sports.

When it came to the matter of the placing of the blame for indecent plays and revues, Mr. Hodge begged them not to put it upon the actor. He is like a soldier under orders, and has to earn his living. He takes the part the manager gives him, and often took parts he hated. He was sometimes "in the play but not of it." There were three parties to blame for bad plays, and the actor was not of them. First, the author; second, the producer; and third, and most to blame of all, the public which flocked to see them. Attack these and not the actor. To quote Mr. Hodge: "I hate smut, and I know lots of actors who hate the smutty things they have to play in. I don't blame the actors; they have to work. The fault is first with the man who writes the play, and then the manager. The third and most powerful party are the people who go to see the plays."

There is much wisdom in what Mr. Hodge says. Even this week the District Attorney of New York is reported to have said that he could not act because while he heard much of the depravity of actors and the stage during this present season, he had received no specific complaints of any one play, and he could not act until he did. As I write these lines the daily papers announce that the December Grand Jury, at its first session last week, discussed plans for investigating reports that five or six plays in this city contained salacious lines and laid out a definite line of action. District Attorney Banton said that he had not received any definite complaint which he could lay before the body. He added that he expected to receive many complaints within the next twenty-four hours. "Now that it is known that we are after evidence against salacious shows," the prosecutor continued, "I expect every theatergoer who has been shocked at these performances to write to me or call in person and tell me about them. As soon as I receive any evidence that certain shows violate the law I shall have the matter presented to the Grand Jury."

A word should be said about the actors. Mr. Hodge says that the actors are in no wise to blame. They have to earn a living and have to take whatever parts are assigned to them. I doubt if this is wholly true. There are certain very eminent "stars" just now playing in most disgusting plays. Could not these actors and actresses, who are so popular that they can always secure parts, refuse to play certain roles? Mr. Hodge said very emphatically that he had never played a smutty part, and would not. Could not other eminent artists take this stand? Furthermore, no woman or girl of self-respect would exhibit her nakedness, as some are now doing in a certain revue, to a lot of gloating men, no matter whether she ever got another part or not.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

The Methodist Church has just started a Press Bureau in Washington in charge of H. E. Woolever, who for the past eight years has served as assistant editor of "The Christian Advocate" of New York. The Federal Council is co-operating with the news service, which consequently will have a genuinely national aspect. The Methodist Church is the first to establish a press service at the capital.

Practically all France to-day supports Poincaré. But a considerable proportion of the people recognize that they are in the position of the man who holds the wolf by the ears. Just when the ears may pull off, they do not know. The working people and the intellectuals believe that the real hope for national security lies with the League of Nations, but the bankers, the Comite des Forges (the trust of iron, steel and coke owners in the industrial regions) and reactionary business interests are inclined to put their reliance in force and in force only. Liberal opinion in France condemned Mussolini's action, as it did everywhere. But diplomats, as a Frenchman sees it, can scarcely be expected to favor the League of Nations very strongly. It might put them out of a job.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

"Life and Work" in England

By Rev. Thomas Nightingale

Secretary of the Free Church Council (England and Wales)

[This is an address delivered before the American Section of the Conference on Life and Work of the Churches, at its meeting in Philadelphia on November 12.]

MY Christianity tells me three things:

First the spiritual nature of man. Speculative atheism is gone, but practical atheism has taken its place. I would rather have a man who disbelieved in a God and lived as though there was one, than a man who believed in a God and lived as though there wasn't. The intellectual atheism of the last century has disappeared, and all men everywhere recognize that man is more than dust and possesses the powers of a world to come. My Christianity also tells me that God is working and working all the time, and in the third place it speaks to me of the social implications of the gospel.

Before the Church can do its full work it must emancipate itself from formality and conventionality. It must let itself go and lose itself in a passion for humanity. It must also give over defending itself. God's last word is not "church" but "kingdom," and the chief instrument for the setting up of that kingdom is the church which our Lord founded. The church hesitant must become the church militant. Like our soldiers it must go "over the top." It must not only "hold the fort," but storm forts.

Dr. Ramsey in his fascinating book entitled, "My Travels in Turkey," tells that upon one occasion he engaged a guide who was a Turk. This man turned up the next morning, dressed in real Turkish fashion with voluminous scarlet trousers and white jacket, and Dr. Ramsey says that he was the most model guide he ever had and lived up to the splendor of his clothes. The Church must live up to its creed, its prestige and its power.

We need to preach the gospel of a new emancipation. The history of the world is one of a series of deliverances—intellectual, social, moral and spiritual. The philosophy of Bacon brought intellectual deliverance to Europe. Martin Luther, religious emancipation, John Wesley tried to deliver the Church of his day from formality, Lincoln freed the slaves. In my own country feudalism was broken, the franchise came and with it the emancipation of women.

In my own little village, when I was a boy, the village mill was burned down and many lives were lost. I can see one of the firemen now, with hot debris up to his waist, crying for deliverance. There were two ways of getting him out. The first was to apply dynamite, but the dynamite that would have blown the stones up would have blown him up, and the second state would have been worse than the first. The other method was to turn on the hose pipe, cool the stones and get him out alive. This was done. Our business is to release everything that holds man down and get him out alive, making the bounds of his freedom wider yet.

Of course man stands central to the universe. He is more important than systems, markets and the rise and fall of political parties. The man who discovers a planet is bigger than the planet he discovers, and we have to deal with him in his moods, guilt, tendencies and destiny, and nothing is right until he is put right. If Society is built up, not on the soldier but on the citizen, then we must make that citizen clean in body and mind and pure in soul, giving to him those conditions that will help him to unfold his better nature.

It is no use of storming at one's age. Anybody can denounce cancer; but why cancer? Our business is to inspire and guide and fill the age in which we live with Godliness. This is our chance and this is our work. There are times when we become impatient, but we must remember that all good things come slowly; not because God is unwilling, but because man is so stupid and so foolish.

Take in my own country, the post office tried to kill the telephone. Sir Walter Scott declared that the inventor of gas was a mad man. Twenty-six barons signed Magna Charter, and only three could do so in their own name. Parliament at one time put to death thousands of witches, and in doing so thought it was rendering good service. In the eighteenth century Parliament was thoroughly corrupt and dishonest. In that century everybody swore, so I am told, including ministers of religion. Every fourth house in London was a drink shop and over the doors of some of them one could read the words: "You can get drunk for two pence—dead drunk for four pence, straw provided." As recently as one hundred years ago mothers in my country carried their babies in their arms as early as four o'clock in the morning to the mills and factories of Lancashire and Yorkshire. In those days children worked in mines and factories fifteen hours a day. Parliament reduced the fifteen hours to twelve hours, not because they wanted to, but because the grave yards were getting full of children. John Bright declared that a ten hour bill would be ruinous to British industry, and Shaftesbury fought him and won. All this belongs to the dim past and things are not quite so bad now.

The work of the Christian Church is to change the climate. There is a difference between weather and climate. The Evangelical Revival was due to a change in the religious climate. I am told that they have, sometimes, beautiful weather in Greenland and vile weather in Italy, but they cannot grow grapes in Greenland while they can in Italy, even in the worst of summers. The pioneers have always changed the climate. In my own country they purify the penal code; they abolished the corn laws, they inaugurated education; they started the temperance movement and brought about other reforms. We still need another change in the moral climate, out of which great social evils will drop like bits of dead lead.

What is our business? It is to create a fellowship of all those who believe in Jesus, to give the Christian conscience a voice in reference to great social evils and national situations. Take, for example, the question of capital and labor. The business of the Church is not so much to formulate economic creeds as it is to impart a new spirit and a new temper to the world as she finds it. Two ideals are associated with industry—profit for the employer and wages for the employee. What is the result? Group interests and selfishness, but the one purpose of industry is the well being of the community. The Church has to face that logical issue. Good-will in place of selfishness is what we want. The worker in the main does not seek riches. Well, if he does he will not get them, but what he does seek and what he has a right to expect is material security.

On the question of wealth I want to point out the undue desire to get it, the unchristian method so many people use to acquire it and the unchristian use to which so many people put it. It is the business of the Christian Church to show the way out of the present situation, to uproot selfishness, and in its place plant love and good-will. The creation of a civic conscience, a social conscience and a national conscience through the individual is the only remedy for all our ills.

We need to capture every situation for Christ. Psychologists tell us that reason, will, conscience, emotion and judgment are not separate entities of personality, that personality is one and these are related and interrelated, fused and interfused. We separate them thus merely for purposes of explanation. What is true of personality is true of our common social and national life. There are people who say that business is business, politics is politics, sport is sport, pleasure is pleasure, and religion is religion. It is all wrong to talk like that. There is only one compartment and God must fill it from top to bottom and from side to side.

Let me illustrate what I mean—in my own country some years ago a man went to an auction sale and bought a very pretty door. He had it placed into his house. Then he grew dissatisfied with the house. He felt he must either take the door out or bring the house up to the quality of the door. The door challenged and condemned the rest of the house. He decided not to take the door out, and so had the house painted and decorated and brought up to the standard of the door. Our Lord said: "I am the door," let him be placed into the house of life and the whole of it will have to come up to that standard—business, politics, social relationship and everything. That is our task.

The Apostle Paul declared that ours is the ministry of reconciliation. The word "reconciliation" in that connection means readjustment. We are to adjust man to God and to his brother man and to the whole round of his relationship, but some one will say: "If that is true, physician heal thyself." All I want to say in that connection is this, that the church is not divided, it is merely dislocated. Fundamentally and spiritually the whole church is one. The Roman Catholic, the Anglican and the Free churches all worship the same Father and believe in the same Saviour. Ecclesiastically the Church is dislocated. If my shoulder is dislocated it is still a member of the body and the body is still one, but not until it is readjusted can the body enjoy fullness of life, complete rest and render perfect service. So it is with the Church. Not until its parts are readjusted can it hope to claim the full endowment of the gifts of the Spirit.

Now what are we doing in my own country in reference to "life and work"? First of all there is a movement among all the Methodist churches. It is a distinctly spiritual movement. Those three denominations are now praying together, thinking together, toiling together. In addition to this each has set up its Social Service Committee, and they are thinking out how the principles of Christianity may be applied to all social aspects in English life.

In the second place there has been established a Council of Christian Churches, which includes the Roman Catholic, the Anglican, the Free Churches and the Salvation Army. They are now agreed on what are called the "Four Points of the Temperance Program." First: That no intoxicating drinks shall be sold to youths under eighteen years of age. Second: Local option for England and Wales. Third: Sunday closing for England and Wales. Fourth: That social clubs with drink license shall be placed under the same supervision as the ordinary drinking saloon. The first of these has already been won by Lady Astor and her friends in the House of Commons.

Third: There are summer schools which meet at Oxford and other places to study the application of Christian truth to the whole round of human life. Truth has two values. It has a value in itself and a value in relationship. For example, a chair has a value in itself. It is worth so much in the open market, but its second value comes when it supports some one. A dollar has a value all its own, but its second value is established when it is able to purchase something that will meet human needs. "If our virtue go not forth from us 'tis all the same as if we had it not." We read in reference to the coming of our Lord that the word become flesh and dwelt among us and we beheld his glory.

Fourth: There has been established in England what is known as "C. O. P. E. C." that is a Christian Council of Politics, Economics and Citizenship. Groups of people have been meeting and studying all sides of the social problem, and they will assemble in Birmingham in April of next year to pool their findings and to issue statements for the guidance of the people. I think it is true to say that very often spiritual issues are routed in social conditions. I have great sympathy with a poor woman living in one of the slums of London, who said to a social reformer when he was asking her to give up the drink. "What's the good of belonging to an Empire on which the sun never sets if you live in an alley on which it never rises."

Bishops to the number of two hundred and fifty met at Lambeth, London, some two years ago and issued what is known as the "Lambeth Appeal." That Appeal manifested quite a new spirit and a new temper, not only towards Christians of other communions, but also toward the social problem, but some of us are disappointed that they have not, as far as England is concerned, began to act on Paragraph 13 of their own findings, which suggests the establishment of a Council of Christian Churches in order to bring to bear on social and national evils, the full weight of their intelligence, will and moral force. Some of us would like to see the establishment of a great Christian Parliament of Churches and kindred organizations setting up commissions dealing with education, housing, morality, temperance, capital and labor, international peace and watching carefully political situations as they may arise from time to time. It seems as though we cannot yet get it, the churches being so busy with ecclesiastical readjustments. I want us to get on with the real business of the kingdom for which the Church of Jesus Christ exists.

It will take us a long time before we can get our point of focus in the accepting of one form of ecclesiastical government, even if that were desirable; but in the meantime, what! Why not unite where we can and for great social ends. What things we could do, if only we were one in Christian fellowship without sacramental implications and in our desire to effect the social implications of the gospel. Vain dream! Well let us dream it!

I am waiting for some great soul to arise or some great event to take place that will weld together for us a great universal church, including the Roman Catholic, with its gift for organization, the Anglican with his love of culture and reverence, the Presbyterian with his dignity and strength, the Congregationalist with his love of order, the Methodist with his fire, the Baptist with his zeal, the Quaker with his love of peace and the Salvation Army with his passion for souls. Then should we march as we sing: "Like a Mighty Army Moves the Church of God."

To the Gentlemen of the Senate Assembling

By Rev. Douglas Horton

Minister of the First Congregational Church, Middletown, Connecticut

WHEN you assembled five years ago, gentlemen of the Senate, the world had just emerged from the most devastating war in history. The nations, as you recall, had lost more than seven and one-half millions of their young citizens and one hundred eighty-six billions of dollars in material resources.

Many of you had known the war intimately. You had seen localities over which battle had just passed, the ghastly picture of which cannot easily have faded from your memory—the stump-studded hillsides with their zigzag gashings of trenchwork, the shell-tortured earth, the clinging bands of barbed wire, and the débris of conflict littered everywhere. That débris!—branches of trees, shreds of uniforms, utensils and kits of every description, guns, machine guns, machine gun belts, ammunition, horses, men—and the remorseless soil already beginning to draw them into its bosom. You can hardly forget the scene's stupefying completeness of dissolution.

In such surroundings, just before the armistice, fell an old college friend of mine, and he lies in France to-day. You also doubtless had friends of the same nobility of character, who now lie there with him. I wept like a child when I heard of his death. It had come magnificently, as he led his men, with native chivalry, in person. Some may have gone to war by reason of ungovernable circumstance; this man went readily and intelligently. He made it his mission: he was prepared to die in a war to end war. This was the faith which made his going wonderful.

But now five years are past and you are assembling to deliberate and legislate upon the very matters which must issue in peace or war. Humanity looks toward you in dead seriousness, for you are about to authorize either courage or despair. You will plant a dagger in the world's heart if you evade or wrongly answer the one paramount human question: Shall the nations again engage in war?

You must know that there is no question upon which the common people of the world are more pathetically unanimous. Especially to the soldier, in whom the war spawned its fearful and disgusting memories, no idea is as nauseating as that of a return of military strife.

This universal antipathy in itself may seem to you a sufficient promise of peace until you recall the disquieting fact that the past generations hated war as much as we do. No person to-day is damning war more frankly than did our fathers in their day—and yet the Great War was their begetting! My friend, and your friend, and the millions who lie dead with them were blameless in themselves: the loam of France was their bequest from the Senates and Congresses and peoples of the last century. Their own ancestors murdered them.

Those, our forbears, who killed their sons were not malicious folk. They were only narrow. Their widest political conception was that of nationalism. Their existence was useful in its sphere, but was horizoned by the idea of the nation. They were patriotic; but they failed to maintain the peace because they failed to see that peace is a by-product, not of patriotism, but of loyalty to an international ideal. Their largest unit of pragmatic thought was their country, and the cleavage of the human race into nations did not distract their allegiance. Their nationalism was kindly, but it was one day to crucify their children. Their best dreams of peace were muddled by their own short-sightedness.

The guilt for the last war lay upon them;; but the guilt for the next war can lie only upon you and the other leaders of the world to-day. Are you better than your fathers?

It is in the light of the issue, gentlemen, that the death of my friend cuts at the artery of hope. I could have suffered that death if it had been only the vicarious oblation of the innocent to fulfill a purpose; but who will remove from me the aching awareness of the absolute futility of it? His own contemporaries have, as a whole, forgotten him and his companions. Most of them never understood him, apparently. The world that he died to make better is as visionless, one must almost believe, as it was before. He was slain by the past, but his slaying did not much alter the future. The unspeakable pathos is that he thought his death was a supreme event, but to the world it was only part of the inevitable round of things. He died with his eyes lighted by the sight of a new, warless, free brotherhood of peoples; those peoples are now indifferently casting lots for his garments.

The ground for pessimism to-day is that the philosophy of many of us is not different from that of our fathers. Even some of the most distinguished among you seem to be lending your first energy to national rather than international ideas. No one doubts that the ideal of those leaders is peace, but they will seek in vain with their short instrument to bridge the gulf to their ideal. Nationalism is always inadequate.

Nationalism takes two forms, with both of which the debates upon your floor must have made you familiar.

The harder type of nationalism argues that the only way to keep the peace is for our nation to be so well prepared that no other will dare attack her. The case is illustrated by President Roosevelt's ultimatum to Germany in 1902, when a German quadron was maneuvering ominously off Venezuela, that Admiral Dewey would sail to that coast and destroy any European fleet he found there unless these maneuvers and the German demands they portended were not halted before a certain date. The German commander, at so great a distance from his base, did not dare risk the attack of the American fleet, and so peace was actually maintained by preparedness for war. So, you have frequently heard it said, peace may be maintained at any time. To quote: "The United States will be guilty of criminal misconduct, if, as conditions are now, we do not keep ourselves ready to defend our hearths, trusting in great crises, not to treaties, not to the ineffective good-will of outsiders, but to our own stout hearts and strong hands."

But as a premise to world peace the argument is too narrow. What if another nation or combination of nations were as well prepared as we? When every gentleman carried a sword, were duels infrequent? Is human nature such that arming makes for peace? A well-armed nation, Germany, became the hated and hunted of Europe. This nation-first principle has proved itself again and again to be a prolific war-breeder. There is no hope to be derived from it.

The more benevolent type of nationalism is equally mischievous. It is this sweetly sinister creature which, I must admit, often hovers in the air of the churches; but the Church as a whole has time and again repudiated it. The argument is that if every nation would dedicate itself to peace and disarm there could be no war; and that America should begin the disarming. The thought is substantiated by the illustration of China's appeal to Japan to withdraw from Shantung. If the former nation had lifted up arms to re-establish its ancient rights, it is probable that the invader, his martial honor threatened, would have remained until this day, but because the former made an appeal as an unarmed suppliant seeking justice alone, Japan felt it no indignity to retire. So, according to some, peace may be maintained by any nation at any time: if that nation is definitely committed to peace, the sense of fair play in other nations will prevent them from attacking her. Every nation, they say, ought to issue a manifesto declaring itself "unwilling, under any circumstances, to participate in war."

In the face of this argument you will doubtless recall Dean Inge's celebrated epigram, "It is useless for sheep to pass resolutions in favor of vegetarianism while the wolf remains of a different opinion." The principle of peace for America at any price is too narrow. Many times nations which did not wish and were not able to fight have been set upon. To governments desiring empire a weak peace-loving neighbor is eyed as fair spoil. In this wise Africa has been "colonized" by the stronger powers of Europe. The voice of Armenia's blood crieth from the ground against the notion that the disarmed and irenic nation will find peace. The idea is as fatuous, from the viewpoint of world peace, as that of preparedness.

Neither of these principles is viable, and for the same reason. Though each looks toward an international goal, each takes a national road to reach it. As if one might arrive at the North Star by walking north on the earth's surface! By the one idea our nation is called to prepare for war; by the other, to prepare for peace. But neither can rescue the world from the war system, because neither has a world sanction: they are ethical abstractions for single nations.

If our own country should initiate disarmament, there is no surety that the others would follow; and if our country should become the best armed of all, who knows but that a weak neighbor, a generation hence, would prove too great a temptation to us? These rules of procedure for single nations will lead us on only into belligerency, always in hope ending, never in fact ended.

To draw a circle, gentlemen, one lays his compass-point first at the proposed center. If the circle of international brotherhood is ever to be drawn, we must give our first attention, not to the nations themselves which lie on the periphery, but to the international center. The perfect analogy for peace in the world community is the spirit which brings peace in the smaller communities: loyalty to the law, the authoritative center. When there is law, there is room for peace, Lex and Pax being boon companions of old.

As for the world community, you will immediately protest, there is hardly enough of international law to hang any loyalty upon. But that law will increase as you and we think, feel and act internationally. The primary matter is to contribute our energies upon the centers where the international idea is taking life. The World Court is not perfection, but it is a dreamed-of beginning; its groping toward the future may be weak, but it is a-groping. The League of Nations is certainly far from perfection, but it is the best our race, racked in travail, could bring forth; it is feeble and malformed, but it is a child of hope. There was the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armaments: there is the projected world conference on economic rehabilitation. There is destiny in the idea of international consultation.

If the war spirit is to go, it must be melted in a fierce international will toward companionship, and companionship arises only out of common interests. If there is to be a crusade for peace—God hasten it!—it must be a world crusade, such as neither your merely national preparedness advocate nor your merely national peace-at-any-price disciple contemplate. The chief concern is not our national policy, which must always take its form from the condition of the world at large: the chief concern is an international consciousness. The stronger among the nations that consciousness becomes, the less dramatically will Italy strike his chest, France set her teeth, Germany gesture in despair, and all the nations grasp at their swords. It is the pathway to peace. It lies before you.

I assure you from the viewpoint of a churchman that there is no idea more germane to the genius of the Christian Church than that of international co-operation. It is implied in Jesus' doctrine of the Kingdom of Heaven, where in all nations shall one day be provinces. Any political party which declares itself for national aloofness thereby takes leave of the world's best religious thought and matriculates for eventual defeat.

Surely, during this session you will not allow the ideals of our country to lie in the old undrained pool of nationalism. Will you not rather open the sluiceways of the entire country's passion into the broad international channel—a pure river of water of life, upon whose banks blossoms a tree of peace, with leaves for the healing of the nations!

If you spend the session talking of merely national peace policies you will lose time to-day and your sons will lose blood to-morrow. This was the unwisdom of our fathers. But they had only their fancies to move them: you have the stark, horrid memories of war. It is only because there is hope that you will sustain and strengthen the international agencies of peace that one rejoices at your reassembling.

"Copec" and the Promise of Success

By Rev. Henry A. Atkinson, D.D.

General Secretary of the Church Peace Union

"WORKERS of the world, unite—you have only your chains to lose," is a slogan the danger of which lies not in the truth it may express, but in its hold over the masses whose faith in such a destructive cry is only surpassed by their inability to find a better one. The churches in Britain, not content with simply condemning those who preach violent doctrines, see in the strength of a Lenin or Trotzky their own weakness, in his courageous outspokenness their own feeble silence, in his enthusiasm their own apathy, in his great faith in economic force their own lack of it in moral force, in his clear-cut programs their own lack of clear thinking. The better cry churchmen need is, "Christians of the world, think—you have only your chains to lose and a world to win." To the Bolsheviks chains mean capitalism and wage slavery, to the churches ignorance, prejudice and apathy. "Copec," the popular title of the conference on "Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship," to be held in Birmingham in 1924 is an attempt by all the sections of the Church in England to offer a Christian solution to the great problems of the day. War stirred thousands both inside and outside the church to ask new questions, which need new answers. None having come since Armistice Day, the promoters of Copec and thousands of others look to the conference which is to be held in Birmingham, April 4-12, 1924, to point a way out of the jungle of confusion, doubts and perplexities that have darkened the religious horizon since the war ended.

The main purpose of Copec, then, is first to unite Christians in a common search for a fuller understanding of the mind of Christ on social problems, and secondly, to offer suggestions for its application. The promoters feel, in spite of the Church's failure to grasp the opportunity that came immediately after the Armistice, there is now, since war passions have died down, a better chance for the preparation and adoption of a Christian scheme for society's reconstruction. They believe with Gilbert in the "Gondoliers" that "quiet, calm deliberation disentangles every knot," and that the interval of five years of comparative peace has restored the nation's sense of that proportion and a mental perspective which can form a sound foundation for such impartial thinking as the task demands. They believe that Christian principles touch all life, that it is not enough for Christians to confine themselves to sectional reforms, such as temperance or Near East relief, and that they must devote more study to the root causes of the world's disorders, no longer "panicking" about patching up cracks as they appear, but seeking a purer white Christianity as an unbreakable remedy for red revolutions, yellow perils and blue funk. They trace the smallness of the fruits of Christianity to divergent ideas of God, to too little understanding of the divine purpose and too little honesty in applying what little has yet been discovered—all noticeable in the many divisions of Christendom and the consequent babel of church voices and the lack of one true lead. Even so, they pin their one hope for humanity on the Gospel, feeling that if those inside and outside the Church who long for a better world could visualize the social implications of Christ's teaching and unite to work for its acceptance by mankind fresh health might come to a diseased civilization.

The organizing genius behind this Copec is Miss Lucy Gardner, than whom no country has produced a harder worker or more energetic leader. Her force of character and undaunted courage have won all the leaders in every branch of the Church of England until Copec has become the most talked about movement in Britain to-day.

It was first necessary to create a public opinion on the social gospel by educating the indifferent or uninformed. With this object in view, groups of students and workers who had given their time to social subjects were brought together to consider the program and prepare questionnaires that all denominations could use. The papers produced are ample evidence of the quality of the help these experts so willingly gave.

The first item of study was the divine purpose for humanity, and answers to questions such as the relation of love to the use of force, the place of sex and nationality in the scheme of things, were felt to be essential before the Gospel can be intelligently understood or properly applied to the ramifications of economics and politics. For this purpose it was essential to get the co-operation of historians, biologists, artists, poets, philosophers and theologians to help find and interpret the meaning of the way, the truth and the life of Christ in fulness, or rather in that fulness present knowledge allows.

The first questionnaire on Property and Industry has been followed by ten others, entitled God's Purpose for the World, Education, The Home, Leisure, The Social Function of the Church, The Treatment of Chime, Politics, Christianity and War, International Relations, and The Relations of the Sexes.

Varying methods of studying the questionnaires obtain in different localities. Usually, a group of people discuss each one or some of them in turn, reporting to headquarters the conclusions on which they had agreed or opinions arising from the informal exchange of views. The Social Service Unions and other educational bodies and small study groups are co-operating by arranging Copec circles independent of or with the many classes organized by the churches. Commissions have been set up to study the different departments and prepare reports which will be discussed by the conference. The work of the commissions is helped in turn by the reports sent in from the local groups studying the questionnaires which the Council has sent out.

During the last spring and summer the findings of the groups have been submitted to the commissions and the first drafts of the reports have been prepared. These are to be circulated and discussed in time to allow of final drafts being ready at the end of this year. The conference will discuss these final reports and prepare its own report for issue to the churches. It is proposed to follow up the conference with regional meetings in the chief large centers of population with a view to the establishment of a permanent interdenominational council for social study and service able to speak with the united voice and the authority of British Christendom in times of crisis. Local councils might act as a bureau of experts for local needs, able to function if needed.

Hopes run high and are justified by the results so far achieved. Already great success has come, for the common quest for a fuller understanding of Christianity is in being. Every Protestant denomination has given official support; the Roman Catholics, too, for the first time are taking an equal share in the united efforts of the churches. Even if the conference produces no permanent machinery, it cannot have been in vain when the gulf between denominations is steadily being bridged by the co-operation of all in joint study circles, joint meetings and from common platforms. Participants in the interdenominational study group discover that truth can only be reached by the views of different denominations being pooled. This frank exchange of views on Christianity between so many cannot but break down narrow prejudices and create a community of thought in the rank and file of Copec enthusiasts, without which the resolutions passed by the delegates at Birmingham will be as worthless when action is needed as the profession of the Socialist Internationals in 1914. Interest in Copec has penetrated further than the beaten tracks of national life—into the back streets of Manchester and into Surrey drawing rooms. It was as encouraging to find gray-haired ladies enthusiastically, seriously studying Sidney Webb's "Trade Unionism," their interest in social matters for the first time being roused by the questionnaire on Property and Industry, as to find a workingmen's discussion class run by the Manchester University Settlement in a slum area devoting three weekly meetings to the questionnaire on Leisure. These men rarely went to church, deploring the existence of denominations, but the idea of interdenominational study of such things as their eight-hour day immensely attracted them. Attendance at a Copec circle of ten in a parish room in a more salubrious residential quarter of Manchester, where several middle-aged ladies vied with one another in condemning war, convinced the ex-soldiers present that, apart from the actual conference, the preparations by informal talks showed a real earnestness among all classes to think for themselves and gave promise of good if not spectacular results. The experience of these bears witness to similar activity in other parts of England.

Apart from the results of study expressed in the report, a greater effect of these preparatory meetings is the reality of the fellowship which the common effort to find truth brings to these seekers of knowledge. The ability to understand and tolerate the other man's point of view on the part of many who have not been used to even hearing the other side is another effect of Copec study which ordinary church life has failed to produce so far.

Besides the spiritual results, which will neither be measured nor published, it seems certain that the preparations will bear more lasting fruit in the creation of an Interdenominational Council of Social Service, linking up the overlapping organizations and acting as a common source of information and a directing head in time of crisis. The establishment of such a body by a combination of so many organizations would command the respect of organized religion and attract those thousands who want to work for Christianity, but who, through no fault of their own, have not attained the intellectual standard required for sifting dogmas and giving sincere consent to a system of beliefs as puzzling to them as they are so often meaningless to others. But even if the report of the conference produces no machinery, the study that has gone on will form a basis of preparation in England for the Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work, which is to be held in Stockholm, Sweden, in August, 1925. The new ground that Copec has broken, the interest shown in the questionnaires, and the quality of the answers sent in so far fills the promoters with hope.

E. D. Morel: A Possible British Foreign Secretary

By Lucia Ames Mead

MR. JOHN A. HOBSON, the eminent London economist, has just published a striking survey of the English Labor Party, which now leads the opposition in Parliament and may any day be called upon for a new ministry, showing that the party is by no means so deficient in talent for that purpose as its critics like to urge. He studies Ramsay MacDonald, Arthur Henderson, Mr. Clynes, Mr. Thomas, Sidney Webb, Charles Trevelyan and others and emphasizes the fact that many able men, not formerly members of the party, are now joining it for political purposes. What man in England has a larger knowledge of foreign affairs and has done more notable service for international justice and common sense than E. D. Morel, the man who was at the root of the overthrow of the despotism of King Leopold in the Congo?

Morel is one of the foremost thinkers in the Labor Party in the House of Commons to-day and the editor of the trenchant monthly entitled "Foreign Affairs." Says Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, the well-known English preacher and writer: "Morel's great aim in life is to break down the evil of secret diplomacy, which he maintains was more responsible for the war than anything else. It is doubtful whether there is any man on the government bench to-day who knows as much about foreign affairs as E. D. Morel. And his great strength is in his knowledge of details and his ability to put his finger on chapter and verse in official documents for every statement he makes. A barrister said during the war, 'Morel was sent to prison, not for things he said which other people said, but because he proved them from official documents.'"

Mr. Morel's book, "Ten Years of Secret Diplomacy," was the outcome of long research and patient study. Son of a French father and an English mother, he has always taken a broad, impartial view of international matters. From his teens he was a staunch lover of justice and the stern foe of cruelty, though it be practiced by a monarch of great wealth and related to half the thrones of Europe. He equally hated hypocrisy and oratorical buncombe, though it be the most brilliant of his own British statesmen who were guilty.

Over twenty-five years ago, having become familiar with conditions in West Africa, he began a stubborn fight for the rights of the oppressed natives. Without influence or help, he began single-handed to fight tooth and nail with facts and figures and the awful photographs of little black children whose hands had been cut off, until in 1913, the entire policy of the despot of the Congo, Leopold of Belgium, was overthrown and the atrocities ended.

Some Bostonians may recall a crowded, tempestuous meeting in Park Street Church during the great International Peace Conference of 1904, when, facing Morel, an emissary from the King endeavored in vain to camouflage the evidence that this one monarch had unlimited power over twenty-five million natives and had deprived them of their ancestral lands and desolated the whole country with an army of cannibal savages under Belgian officers, intent on the exploitation of rubber. Morel was not overawed, but stood his ground and brought missionary reinforcements to buttress his damning evidence.

The man who roused the world and flouted a king was not to be deterred from exposing the iniquity of secret diplomacy, whether in his own country or any other. Before 1914 Mr. Morel was highly honored in his own country, but his attitude during the war brought sharp reprisals. Unconvinced that Germany was solely responsible for the war, as his previous study of secret diplomacy showed the contrary, his plea for justice aroused only villification. He was condemned as pro-German. Public wrath knew no bounds, and like Professor Nicolai, of Berlin, whose masterly work, "The Biology of War," is perhaps the most scientific treatise against war ever written, he suffered in prison for his faith. To-day, having triumphantly defeated Winston Churchill in the last election, he now sits in his seat representing Dundee. He has regained the confidence of the now disillusioned who have come out of the hysteria of war.

Mr. Morel has a terrible way of pinning men down to facts. In the question of German reparations, Lloyd George last winter recklessly asserted that the original figure, £11,600,000,000, was "probably an estimate" and "was never presented to Germany," whereupon Mr. Morel shows that on January 29, 1921, the Reparations Commission fixed the reparations bill to Germany at precisely this sum mentioned, payable in gold forty-two years hence, and proves the publication of this fact at the time. No wonder he comments, "In our view, it is perfectly intolerable, an insult to the country and a humiliation to Parliament, that an ex-Prime Minister, whoever he is, should get up in the House of Commons and utter a deliberate falsehood on a matter of fact which has determined the events of the last two years." The sanctions to be enforced if that bill were not paid included occupation of the Ruhr. Yet Mr. Lloyd George told the House on May 5, 1921, that "with the Ruhr gone, industrial Germany withers; it cannot exist." Two years ago he was willing that this step should be taken. "In February, 1923, he tears his passion to tatters because France takes it. The simple truth is that Mr. Lloyd George has been the evil genius of the piece all through, the evil genius of the British and French people. Mr. Lloyd George led the people of this country and of France to believe that the full costs of the war were recoverable from Germany."

Mr. Morel feels that Mr. Lloyd George, having thus in 1918 assured his own return to power, this initial wild exaggeration poisoned all subsequent action and identified England with Clemenceau's extreme policy instead of Wilson's. Says Mr. Morel: "This country held practically all the trumps. Clemenceau could not have opposed a united Anglo-American front against French imperialism. The French workers were pro-Wilson and pro-peace." Mr. Lloyd George, unlike Castlereagh in 1815, at Vienna, chose a "peace" of revenge rather than of reconstruction and reconciliation.

With clear insight, unaffected by his French origin, Mr. Morel has depicted the fallacy of the French claims that France has always been the systematic victim of German aggression. He reminds students that the blood-feud is two hundred and fifty years old, and that "during most of that period Germany was overrun, dismembered and devastated by French armies to such an extent that it is a marvel she has survived at all. The armies of Louis XIV turned Germany in ten years into a desert." In a historical retrospect he shows that with the exception of one episode the various invasions of France were occasioned by previous invasions of Germany, the French declaring war in 1870 and invading Germany. Says Mr. Morel: "No one enjoying either political or historical authority in this country has attempted to rebut the accumulated evidence of the past four years (mainly Russian and French), which evidence goes to prove that the Republican rulers of France, far from being guiltless for the Great War, played a very active part in bringing it about, deemed themselves fully prepared to undertake it and confident of the result." For details with quotations and figures to substantiate this claim one may refer to Labor Booklet No. 8, "Military Preparations for the Great War—Fact versus Fiction," by E. D. Morel, in the series of sixpence publications to be had from the Labor Publishing Company, 6 Tavistock Square, London.

Mr. Morel discusses the "population myth" which presents the imminent danger of forty million Frenchmen from sixty million Germans. He says: "The boot is on the other leg. It is a case of her having one hundred million to draw from against Germany's sixty million. France has 43,500,000 people under her sway in Africa, and 22,500,000 in Asia. And she has now applied to all these people her laws of military conscription. She is raising and training great armies for service in Europe. She reckons within the next five years to have a permanent army of eight hundred thousand Africans for war in Europe if need be. The conscription of Africa by France is one of those tremendous events which alter the destinies of nations. In all essential respects Belgium is now a French province and under French pressure she has replaced voluntary service by conscription. French militarism is heavily subsidizing Poland to maintain an army of five hundred thousand men staffed by numerous French officers. It is far less a matter of obtaining security for France than of security for Europe." It is as an ardent friend of the French people that Mr. Morel condemns the present French policy of Poincaré.

He sees no solution in Great Britain's trying to obtain national security by building an air fleet equal to that of France. He has no faith in armaments to maintain national security. He believes this to be attained only by a national policy that shall eliminate the causes of friction and shall purge Britain from imperialistic self-seeking. He would begin by securing democratic control of foreign policy and not leave Parliament in the dark as to what a little cabinet had decreed. This should be accomplished through constitutional measures and changes in parliamentary practice and procedure. He excoriates the "secret junta" which controls national and imperial foreign policy, and urges the people of the dominions to secure parliamentary control over the foreign affairs of their own government. The Canadian Prime Minister has repeatedly besought the British government for permission to present correspondence to his own Parliament and been refused.

Mr. Morel calls for a new conference of all the powers for the three-fold purpose of revising the political settlement of 1919; of giving France and all the other states of Europe security through an all-inclusive League of Nations; of planning general disarmament, and of promoting an international rearrangement of debts and reparations on a just and sensible basis. He feels that Britain herself must make sacrifices and not merely demand them of France. Were Britain and America to unite in impelling such a conference he believes that a solution could be reached. "Otherwise," he says, "Europe will totter along under the impulse of French imperialism and British vacillation into war and anarchy."

"Only once before in our history," says Mr. Morel, "have we been in such potential peril as we are to-day—when the Armada was sighted coming up the Channel." If that peril is to be averted, a peril for which our aloofness is largely responsible, America can not long venture to dally and halt and play the part of the mere spectator. As a moderator between the diverse policies of the two Allies who have become greatly estranged across the Channel we might at this juncture, were we in the League of Nations, play a decisive part in shaping the future of humanity for a century to come.

International Co-operation the Only Way

By Dr. Fridtjof Nansen

PART II.

THE difficulty of Greece at this moment is the more than one million refugees thrown upon the Greek nation—the Greek people—during the military disaster in Asia Minor. Of all the people who have gone through suffering and hardship during the last twelve years of European history, I think no people has been exposed to a more terrible strain than the Greek people really have. For ten years, with very short intervals, they have had continual wars, and most exhaustive wars. They have been fighting in Asia Minor and on the Peninsula, and it has been a tax on their resources which are, after all, very small. On top of that war and the overwhelming military disaster in Asia Minor last autumn, when the Greek state was shaken to its foundation, it took an enormous effort to pull themselves together, to assist and offer assistance during the peace negotiations. Then at this crisis—the worst crisis in Grecian history—it had thrown upon it—a people numbering less than four and one half million—had thrown upon it in a few weeks an additional population of more than one million refugees from Asia Minor and from eastern Thrace.

You will understand what that means. The country was perfectly exhausted. The people in their ordinary circumstances had not enough to feed themselves. They must import and they had no credit to borrow abroad, and still they received all these refugees. Why? They were not Greek subjects, many of them could not speak Greek—they spoke Turkish. They were of the Greek race to a great extent, it is true, but many of them were not even of Greek race—they were Armenians—but they were all of them Christians, and when you asked the Greek government why, in its great difficulties, why it received these refugees it said, "If we did not open the doors they would have perished, and we haven't the heart to say no." That is what the Greek people did. But how could they be fed? I say the resources in Greece were too small; they could not do it. We tried in Europe. The League of Nations at once took action. I was asked to go down and take care of them as far as we could. I went down, and we also got several European organizations to help to feed them, and we threw in as much food as we could in a moment to save as many people as we could from death by starvation. But in that moment the American people came in and added a new chapter to your marvelous history of charity which you have written during the war and since the war—a charity activity which is so magnificent, so unique, there is nothing that can equal it in the whole history of humanity. You fed there during the winter something like eight hundred thousand refugees, but in the summer the American organization had to stop because it saw that nothing was being done to save the situation permanently, and it thought it would not be well to continue because it would keep the people together instead of letting them go out and try to find work. It is absolutely necessary, of course, when people are dying from starvation to feed them and to help them, but on the other hand it is clear that that kind of charity work is not a solution of the problem, because when you stop feeding the people they have gone no further than when you began, unless they have got work in the meantime, and that is the difficulty. They saw we were trying to help them, that it was necessary. By the way, I may say that the League down there was not so much for feeding them, and we decided to divide the work between us. The Americans took charge of the feeding and the League took over the sanitary part of the work, and I may say, I think, without boasting too much, that the Epidemic Commission of the League did very good work indeed.

As an example, I think I may mention that the Epidemic Commission vaccinated 728,000 refugees to protect them against smallpox and other diseases, but we saw clearly that the one great need was to try to settle these refugees in permanent work.

The greater part of them were agriculturists, and there is plenty of vacant land still in Greece or Greek territory, especially in eastern Thrace and Macedonia, but to settle the people on vacant land, even if you get the land for nothing, costs money because the people must have equipment. They cannot cultivate the land with bare hands, and they must be fed while they are cultivating and waiting for the harvest. That meant great expenditure.

Work must also be found for the others. We saw that, and we had very little money, indeed, but we had a little, and we decided with what little money we had to make an experiment under the leadership of Colonel Proctor in Constantinople—to make an experiment with ten thousand refugees to try to settle them in permanent work to gain experience as to how the work ought to be done. These people were brought to western Thrace, distributed in the villages in that region. They occupied sheds during the autumn and winter while they were building their own houses, constructed from bricks made by themselves out of the local clay. They got land to cultivate. Many of them became agriculturists, and those who had not brought animals with them from eastern Thrace received animals, seeds and agricultural implements from the Greek government, which helped in every possible way.

Others became fishermen, others brickmakers, others charcoal burners—that is the general fuel in that part of the world—the women carpet weavers from Asia Minor started the same trade on Greek territory, and we hope to have that trade developed. Some grow tobacco. Some have undertaken the silk industry. They have planted sixty thousand mulberry trees, and they have, in fact, the greatest silk plantation in Europe at this moment.

I cannot begin to tell you all of the details, it would take too long, but to make a long story short I will tell you that in nine months these ten thousand people were made self-supporting and are supporting themselves now, so that instead of being a burden upon the Greek state their crops and their work now aid to strengthen the state.

In this way ten thousand people have been made productive citizens again, but there are one million left, and to settle them you, of course, need capital—money. Now the Greek government is very keen to have these people made productive again, and it is willing at once to do all within its power. It proposes to raise an international loan. It is willing to give all the security necessary. This security consists in revenues not already pledged for other loans and other assets—it offers that to the League and asks the League to be responsible for the loan.

The financial section of the League has examined the question and it finds it sound business. It thinks there is sufficient security for the loan—fifty million pounds sterling—and it will help Greece to raise the money, on the condition that the money shall go exclusively to the settlement of the refugees in productive work. That means that nothing must go to charity work, nothing for feeding or relief work, but it must only be used for productive work. It is controlled by a commission of four people. The chairman is Mr. Morgenthau from the United States, two members elected by the Greek government and one from the League. It means that this money is entirely controlled by this commission, and not a penny shall be paid for anything but that one purpose. So far I think it is all right.

One of the conditions was that Greek bankers should underwrite one million pounds, which was done at once. Then the Bank of England has said that it is willing at once to contribute one million pounds sterling, and is also willing to go further on the condition that the Greek government will have an election, which shall take place in December. So far it is all right. I hope that the loan will be raised, especially in England, and I hope in this country you will raise your proportionate amount in the same way that the Austrian loan was raised, but as I say, this money must only be used for productive work for the refugees, not for feeding them, not for relief work or charity, but, on the other hand, it is absolutely necessary to keep the people alive until the results of their efforts shall make them self-supporting. If you give them animals, land and feed, they have to plow their land, plant their seed, wait for it to grow and reap the harvest before they can support themselves, their wives and children, and that means they must be kept alive and fed in the meantime, and to feed one million people means expense and money.

The Greek government has promised to do all in its power to feed them. It says it can provide at least ten million drachmas to feed them. That is about two hundred thousand dollars, but that is not sufficient to feed more than one-third of them, and you will understand that after losing fifty million lira which should have been used for feeding the refugees, its ability to feed them has not become greater. The rest must be, we hope will be, carried out by charity organizations, and among the charity organizations of Europe I may especially mention the "Children's Fund" in Great Britain, which has promised to do its share. We are also doing our little share, as we are able, in Norway and Sweden, and I hope in Denmark, but we also hope the Americans will come in in this work.

The American government—that is, Mr. Hughes—sent a note to the European governments, the great powers, saying that the American Red Cross had to stop its work in Greece last June, but if a reconstructive scheme was produced America was willing to co-operate again and help to feed the refugees, and that, I have reason to believe, the Americans also are willing to do, and I hope, therefore, that this program will be carried out, and I may say in my opinion it is a great problem to solve, because to give money for a thing like this is not the same as charity work. It is not sinking your money in a bottomless pit, because although, when you stop, the people are just as far from the ultimate solution of their difficulties as they were before; yet it is just to tide Greece over until the refugees can be made self-supporting, and that means perhaps a year for some of them, perhaps a little longer; but it is a definite time when they can support themselves and their families and become productive citizens in the Greek state.

But if that problem is not solved, then I am afraid of the future, because it will mean that Greece will sink into financial and economic chaos. It will mean disturbances in Greece and Greek territory, and disturbances in Greece will mean disturbances in the whole Balkan peninsula, because we could not expect the other nations to keep quiet; and disturbance in the Balkan peninsula means disturbance throughout Europe. We have to remember that all recent wars started in the Balkan peninsula, and it may be so again. Therefore, I consider it of vital importance to Europe, and I may say for the whole world, because wars in Europe sometimes reach even these shores, and they may do so again; and therefore I think it is of vital importance to the whole world to remove this danger which so easily can be removed from Europe. So much for Greece.

The Religious Conditions in Germany

By Rev. Calvin Klopp Staudt, Ph.D.

IN TWO PARTS—PART I.

[Dr. Staudt was formerly of the American University of Beirut, Beirut, Syria. On his way back from the Near East last year he spent a number of months in Europe and for about five months studied religious conditions in Germany. He has just sailed for Bagdad where with Mrs. Staudt, he will be associated with the Union Mission which has undertaken the mission work of Mesopotamia. His chief work will be to open up higher education in Bagdad.]

THE question has often been asked, What is the religious situation in Germany to-day and what has been the result of the war upon the religious life of Germany? After having lived and traveled in this land for five months, with an interest in religious affairs, I have discovered that there is, on the one hand, a setback in religious instruction and an open opposition to the Church, and, on the other hand, signs of a new religious awakening and a deepening of religious life. Among the great mass of people there is much indifference, but a choice few are becoming real heroes of the cross.

The German revolution following the war brought about a separation of Church and State, and yet the two are not completely separated: the State has still some hold upon the Church; the Church still receives its appropriations through the State, and religious workers have to look to the State for their meager support. Telling an educated German of how our churches in America, together with their missionary enterprises, are supported entirely through voluntary contributions, he immediately remarked, "If we should adopt such a system few would pay." Notwithstanding, there are, however, a group of religious leaders who sincerely hope for the day of a complete separation of Church and State, believing that if full responsibility were thrown upon the Church, it would call for a more vital religion and a more sacrificial living.

In this separation of Church and State religious instruction has practically been abolished. It has virtually been taken out of the schools, and nothing else in an effective way has yet taken its place. Young people are growing up without religious instruction and without education in religion, a terrible situation when one stops to realize that religious instruction has always been a part of German culture and that religion is absolutely necessary for the German people.

All this came about in a most surprising and singular manner. The new constitution explicitly declares that religious instruction shall remain a regular course of study in the schools. One would think, and so for a time many of the Germans themselves thought, that the former status of religious teaching would continue with little or no change. But, not so. It soon became evident when this article was interpreted in the light of other provisions made by the constitution and through the bitter controversy which followed, that the death-knell of religious instruction in the schools had sounded. The Association of Teachers at once put itself on record as being unwilling to assume the responsibility of teaching religion or preparing themselves for it. Often where religious instruction was being given in the schools it was done perfunctorily and even to the detriment of religion, as when a teacher would place God the Father on a level with Wotan. The Saxon government required parents to file a statement if they desired their children to have religious instruction—"a plain violation of the law." These things combined with others had the effect of making the time-honored custom of religious instruction in the German schools practically null and void.

Then, too, there is great concern at present among real educators and religious leaders concerning the new type of vocational schools, known as Fach und Fortbildung Schulen. These have sprung up all over Germany, but especially in the industrial centers, and are very popular. Pupils are admitted into these schools while yet very young, and from henceforth all their studies revolve around the particular trade or profession for which they are being prepared. Special textbooks are prepared and issued for each trade and profession. Each teaches its own mathematics, its own literature, its own history, its own art. I was surprised to find a separate textbook in mathematics printed for even such a minor trade as that of barber, where all problems and principles are confined to this trade. The teacher in literature or history selects only those literary pieces and those historical events which have to do with one's trade. Thus the butcher and the baker and the candlestick maker not only study the technique of their own trade, but each also studies its own history, science, literature, art and mathematics.

I listened one day to a class of small boys in lithography, which revealed a knowledge of this subject in all its phases of chemistry, history, physics as applied to the trade, that was simply marvelous. For the sake of efficiency and of making a machine out of a nation there is nothing in the educational world like it; but it is fraught with terrible consequences. This type of education gives no opportunity for the unfolding of life, but rather stunts life: it is educational lopsidedness. It develops such a pride in one's trade or profession that nothing else is considered worth while; it gives no place for the appreciation of spiritual values; and it necessarily and consequently predisposes youth against religion.

A still more serious situation, perhaps, in the religious life of Germany to-day, is the strong opposition to the Church and religion on the part of the Socialists and Communists. During most of my stay in Germany I lived in Saxony, which was under a Socialistic and Communistic government, and I have seen many of the workings against religion.

The "Reds" openly attack the Church in their meetings and disseminate literature which is most unwholesome. They attempt to show that religion is a myth, that it "is nothing but the fantastic reflection in the minds of men of those external powers that dominate their daily existence." The Church, they say, is the tool of capitalists and organized Christianity an economic burden to society. They have their Sunday-schools, but in them they teach not religion, but atheism. In order to hold the young people, at the completion of their atheistic catechetical instruction, they have a ceremony which is patterned after the confirmation rite in the churches.

In the Volkshaus in Leipzig, I have looked over the pamphlets that are for distribution and the books that are for sale, and have noticed in addition to German writers many translations from the Russian Soviets and English and American radicals. This great Volkshaus is the great social center and gathering place of the working people and in it Socialists and Communists have their meetings and offices. On a Sunday morning, at the time of church services or directly after, I have seen more than once more young people pour out of this building than were to be found on that morning in all the churches of Leipzig; and not only pour out of the building, but sometimes also form a parade carrying their red flags, headed with the banner, "We are the young people of the working classes."

There is also an out-of-the-Church movement into the ranks of Socialists and Communists or into the simple class of freethinkers. Already there are twenty-five million Socialists and Communists in Germany. Statistics show that the withdrawals from the Church for the last few years averaged over three hundred thousand yearly—that is, from the Evangelical and Roman Catholic Churches, some of whom may, however, have gone into the dissenting sects.

Notwithstanding this unfavorable and depressing situation in the religious life of Germany, there is, on the other hand, however, a brighter and more hopeful outlook, especially in its bearing on the future. The churches are having difficulties in these times, it is only too true; but they are free, separated virtually from the State and no longer connected with the aristocracy or a handmaid of the ruling body. This freedom means new liberty and, I believe, new power. Ministers are beginning to speak the truth in the pulpit without fear or favor; they are inspired with a new zeal. I have not found in the pulpits of Germany any great prophetic soul, such as one occasionally finds in America and England, but I have listened to preaching where men literally poured themselves out before their congregations, to convince them of all their weaknesses, to shame them for all their sins, to warn them of all their dangers and to stir the hard fastenings of their hearts so as to let the Master come in.

These are some of the phrases I caught from great preachers in great cities, some having international significance. "We are not much beloved by other people. It is therefore the more necessary that we cultivate a better spirit of love among ourselves." "We used to say before the war, if we do not help ourselves no one will; we need to say the same to-day, but in a spiritual sense." "The great tragedy is not that we lost the war, but that we, the German people, are losing our souls." In the Dom Kirche in Berlin, where the Kaiser used to worship, Dr. Dietrich, shortly after the occupation of the Ruhr, in a sermon before a congregation where standing room was at a premium, in one of his climaxes exclaimed, "We failed to learn our lesson in 1917, and if we fail to learn it in 1923, I do not know what will happen."

In Frankfurt, in the historic church, where the National Assembly had met in 1848-49, the pastor one Sunday morning, as I listened to him, said, "We boasted so loudly of our Culture before the war and now we find that it is only a veneer."

The great task of the Church in Germany to-day is to save the nation spiritually and to check the moral deterioration of the people. It is also to meet the attacks of Socialists and Communists. Or as a Leipzig preacher put it one day in a sermon: "We have the enemies around our border, but we have also the enemies within; and the internal enemies of Germany are the more dangerous, for they are endeavoring to destroy our religion, our Church and our Bible." Weeks before an election for representatives to the Saxon Diet, special sermons were preached and resolutions from church bodies and the bishop read from the pulpit. The election became of vital interest to the churches and called for an issue which brought out the heroic in many a soul. Though the "Reds" again polled a majority of votes, yet a spiritual blessing came to those who entered the fight for the preservation of the things they held sacred. In short, it put steel into their souls.

I cannot agree with those who think a tide of atheism is going to engulf Germany, and who have nothing but dark colors with which to paint. I think in this struggle against the downward forces lies the hope of the Church. Her life was too easy and too long was she pampered. She is now coming out into the arena and is putting up a fight for self-preservation and the salvation of the nation.

Moreover, there is, on the part of some, in all the churches, a spirit of deep religious consecration and an intense longing for Christian fellowship. This is especially true among young people. While breaking away from the conventional forms of religion, they are, on the other hand, seeking the religious life and sometimes a practical expression in Christian service. Dr. Francis Clark, who has recently returned from Germany, has made the statement that the Christian Endeavor Societies in Germany have nearly trebled since the war began, and that activities multiplied in like measure. I have noticed that young people, apart from the regular church services, flock to religious meetings. A new missionary verein has also been founded to intensify spiritual life and do Christian work.

The Cincinnati League of Women Voters has initiated "a mile of signatures," petitioning the Senate to ratify Mr. Harding's request of February, 1923, for entrance into the World Court on the part of the United States. The League is enlisting all the church women in Ohio and is establishing auxiliary offices in Columbus and other cities. Any woman who reads this might send her signature to the Cincinnati League of Women Voters, 37 Wiggins Block, Cincinnati, Ohio. The World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches is planning to get every minister in the United States to sign a similar petition.

As our readers know, thirty-two political prisoners are still confined in American jails—this more than five years after the Armistice. The parents of the prisoners call on the churches to observe Sunday, December 23rd, as Armistice Sunday, a day for calling the attention of the Administration to the wrong that is being done these men. The strange perversion of ideas which are current in the Department of "Justice," is manifested in the reported remark of Attorney General Daugherty that the reason why one of these men, Frank Gallagher, was not offered release from prison last June, when commutation of sentence was tendered all others, was that he had been active in the organization of several strikes in Oklahoma during the war. But Gallagher is in prison solely for the violation of the Espionage Act. How can one send a man to prison for one thing and keep him there for something else? We rejoice that the President has referred the cases of the political prisoners to a competent commission, composed of Bishop Brent, General Harbord and Newton D. Baker.

What the Laity Thinks of the War in the Churches

“THE HOMILETIC REVIEW” recently sent out a series of questions to distinguished men and women in an effort to learn the opinion of the laity in regard to the present “war in the churches.” The replies are rather valuable as showing the direction of opinion among intelligent people.

Naturally, the replies lack the background which only theological training can give. Moreover, they represent the views of an intellectual élite, coming, as they do, from writers, editors, educators, business experts, financiers, and so on.

Professor Herbert Ernest Cushman, Professor of Philosophy at Tufts College, tells us:

The present theological fight has an exaggerated idea of its own importance. Such controversies come in cycles; the same subjects have been struggled over within every Christian church since the first ecumenical council. . . .

Note that both parties are rationalists (as we philosophers would define rationalism). The conservatives put strict limits to the reason; the liberals would go further. The philosopher is supposed to sympathize with the liberal theologian. But why? Liberalism in theology is a sickish dilution of orthodoxy. Fundamentalism is at least strong, even if it is blind. Liberal modernism can see farther than it dares to go; it is a coward at heart. The logical outcome of modernism is and has always been denial of freedom of will and cancellation of religion, i.e., scientific materialism. The logical outcome of fundamentalism is absolute blindness in the light of supernatural revelation—and this of course means denial of free will.

“A plague on both your houses!” “I will have none of you! Religion is fundamentally emotional, not an affair of the reason. Where is love in your controversy? You are theologians, not teachers of religion.”

Less aggressively, but with a somewhat similar confession of disgust, William C. Edgar, editor of “The Northwestern Miller,” writes:

In common with all the laymen whom I know, I have no interest whatever in controversial aspects of religion. The difference between the fundamentalists and modernists does not affect me in the slightest. The controversy and its causes impress me as being of no importance whatever in comparison with the real needs of the world of to-day, with all its vital and pressing problems, which require for their solution the application of the simple gospel of Jesus Christ. . . . I have neither the inclination nor the patience to consider such hair-splitting arguments and have only a feeling of disappointment and disgust for those who find no better employment for their talents than to argue about dogma or points of difference in the Christian religion while people are hungry for the essentials of the teachings of Christ, expounded without sensationalism and in language they can understand.

Lawrence F. Abbott, formerly president and now contributing editor of “The Outlook,” declares:

Such theological controversies do not interest me; a generation hence this controversy will be as dead as the controversy between Socinianism and orthodoxy in the days of Cardinal Newman. My idea of fundamentalism and liberalism in an ethical or religious creed will be found in the eighth verse of the sixth chapter of the Book of Micah. I do not believe that the Lord requires of us on this planet any more theology than that.

Of the many replies from people who take the conflict seriously a majority concur in expressing regret that it ever started and a conviction that it ought to be stopped at once.

Thus we find Arthur C. Bostwick, the librarian, declaring:

I deprecate the emphasis now placed on the controversy in the press. Other things seem to me more important. Stop the discussion and unite in fighting the enemies of Christianity.

Meanwhile, Roger W. Babson, president of the Babson Institute and author of “The Future of the Churches,” writes:

At first I took the conflict between the fundamentalists and the liberal element of the Church very much to heart. I felt that Mr. Bryan was doing a great deal of harm, and that it would result in driving the thinking young people from our churches. I still feel that Mr. Bryan is making a mistake, but already it is developing a reaction which may be more helpful than harmful.

Before the fundamentalists launched their campaign there was a latent liberal thought throughout every church, but it was not crystallized. We all believed and did not believe certain things, but we had not the courage or did not feel the need of frankly expressing our liberal opinions. The work of Mr. Bryan, however, and others, has made it both possible and necessary for the liberal element to come out frankly for a sane and safe religion. Thus, in every church thinking young people have to-day a group with which they can associate and to which they can directly tie, where a few years ago no such condition existed.

Frankly, the layman is not interested in theology. He believes that all people are children of God and that God must feel very badly to see His children squabbling among themselves, especially regarding something which none of them knows anything about. Most of us laymen believe that if Jesus himself were here he would be surprised and bewildered at these discussions of theology while great national and international problems were allowed to drift.

In a different vein, but to the same purpose, Alice May Douglas, the author, asks:

Since Christ is God indeed, what difference does it make as to what His natural birth might have been? Why waste time on that question? The vital point is Christ's spiritual baptism. The Bible is the greatest poem in the world. Nothing endures like true poetry, which never pretended to deal with absolute facts. As to evolution, every person who plants a seed practises it whether he believes it or not. The best thing for both factions in the controversy to do would be to work as never before for the salvation of souls and to let their differences of opinion take the sleep of the just or of the unjust, whichever the case may be.

Frank S. Hoffman, professor of philosophy at Union College, likewise counsels a suspension of hostilities:

With the whole earth so full of suspicion and mistrust, we should join hands as brothers and let all honest differences, for the present at least, sink into the background. Equally good Christians may differ in their opinions as to how Jesus came into this world and how He left it. The vital thing is, are we following to the best of our knowledge and belief His teachings and imitating His life and spirit, and also are we giving every other son of man equal opportunity to do the same?

To Booth Tarkington controversy in matters of belief seems futile in the main, yet he tells us:

I do not find myself immediately affected by the difference between the fundamentalists and the liberals, but the controversy seems very important to me because of the increasing prevalence of mechanistic doctrines and the necessity for all forces of all churches to combat them.

The only way to settle such a controversy is of course by good-will. In this case that would mean the good-will to understand and sympathize with an opponent. So much controversy is over definitions. I once had an argument lasting about eight hours with a man who called himself a "materialist," whereas I called myself a "spiritualist." We found at the end that we really meant the same thing.

William Lyon Phelps, professor of English at Yale and a prolific writer on Biblical subjects, remarks:

I do not care to take any side in the quarrel between fundamentalist and modernist, for two reasons. First, I deplore all quarrels and controversies, as they do no good and are quite out of place among Christian believers. Second, I am a member of the Baptist denomination, which has no creed of any kind, and which has plenty of room in its churches for the most conservative fundamentalist and the most advanced modernist, provided always the central truth—which is the divinity of Jesus Christ—is believed in, and His teachings adopted as the guide to the individual life, to the life of society, and to the management of international affairs.

William T. Bawden, assistant to the United States Commissioner of Education and a member of the late President Harding's church, is for peace and amity. Says he:

I suppose mine is the type of mind that is anathema to both sides of this controversy, for thus far I have been unable to get excited over it.

It is . . . no new experience to find wide divergence of views and convictions in the Baptist Church, nor is it a new experience to find persons of widely divergent convictions working together in complete harmony for common ends. I see no reason why this harmonious co-operation in earnest prosecution of the mission of the Christian Church in the world should not continue, indeed there is more reason now than ever before why it should. Those who obstruct this co-operation in any way assume a heavy responsibility.

George Foster Peabody, the well-known financier, refuses to recognize in the controversy a justification for schism, though he is far from discounting its seriousness:

The difference between the fundamentalist and the modernist followers of Jesus Christ does affect me deeply. I think its existence a serious hindrance to the obedience Christian disciples owe to His command, "Seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness."

The settlement of the controversy seems impossible except by an agreement to follow Jesus' counsel, "Let the tares grow with the wheat until the harvest." I recognize the sincerity of the convictions of both parties; therefore no other settlement seems possible. If those insistent upon a literal interpretation of the words of the Bible . . . have the courage of their claims, they will, of course, "split" the Church by a withdrawal, or drive out as inimical the "liberals." I do not believe they can accomplish this on any such scale as would include the greater number of Christian professors.

I think it clear that recent discussions have assured the practical settlement of the controversy in the Protestant Episcopal Church, for instance, where further questioning of the right freely to express one's convictions is not at all likely. This one fact is not unlikely to have a reflex influence upon other denominations.

Ralph Adams Cram, Episcopalian and architect of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, gives an interesting exposition of his views, declaring:

I think the contest between fundamentalists and modernists is a convincing proof (if further were needed) of the necessity for an authoritative and infallible interpreter of the Holy Scriptures. For fifteen hundred years such a source of infallible interpretation was recognized throughout the entire Christian Church. The plan of allowing personal and individual interpretation of the Bible has had no other issue than the present "fifty-seven varieties" of Protestantism, each one of which stands dogmatically on its own interpretation. To the fallible human understanding the Bible is a mass of contradictory statements, and it is possible for honest men, isolating one text from another, to build up an unlimited number of quite definite but mutually antagonistic and destructive systems. It is also possible (it has been done) to arrange as many standards of comparative values in the matter of dogmas and ethical principles. The result has been, is now, and always will be, dogmatic confusion and complete loss of unity.

The Holy Scriptures without the divinely ordained, authoritative interpretation of the Church, are a source of discord, and this state of things will continue until the nature and locus of this infallible authority is recognized and accepted.

The present contest is nothing new. The titles are different, that is all. If the result is a clearer demonstration of the futility of "private interpretation" it may prove to be a first step toward the unification of organic Christianity, which is the one hope we have for escape from the dangers that now threaten civilization.

Several of our correspondents, feeling that the controversy is a natural one, contend that it should be fought through dauntlessly to a conclusion. Thus, Katherine Bement Davis, formerly superintendent of the Bedford (N. Y.) Reformatory for Women, writes:

My own sympathies are with the liberals; but I believe that as long as the human race endures there will always be a group of liberals and a group of conservatives—those who wish to stick by the old traditions, whether it is religion or science or social customs. I believe the people most interested will have to fight it out for themselves.

Similarly, Harriet May Mills, the woman suffragist, observes:

Whatever lives must grow or decay. This is as true of the Church as of any other institution. The liberals stand for progress, which is the law of life. The fundamentalists stand for the old, the time-honored, and against whatever is new. . . . Which is right? As men begin to think and deal reasonably with the problems of religion they learn that many of the old creeds are outworn. They are the survivals of an unthinking, superstitious age. . . . Liberalism in religion is life, the result of study of history and the application of the principles of Christ to the conditions of to-day. "The letter killeth, the spirit giveth life." Fundamentalism means reaction; conservatism, devotion to the letter alone. The controversy is important because it is the old struggle of the centuries between progress and reaction. There is only one way to settle the controversy. That is for every man and every woman to do his own thinking and to grant the same right to every other man and woman. Liberalize the creed and let the conservatives permit the liberals to cherish their own faith and still remain inside the organization. The fundamentals are not dogmas or creeds. They are the eternal truths which Christ proclaimed to the world and which transcend any formulas that man can frame.

Mary Austin, author of "The Man Jesus," sees victory for the liberals:

That there are men within the Church willing to assert their independence of Christian dogma in favor of a direct relation to the source of Christian inspiration I hold to be the most hopeful indication that we may soon have a religion that will adequately meet the spiritual needs of the age.

As you know, I have made an intensive study of the life of Jesus, and, having made a list of what orthodox preachers consider the fundamentals of Christianity, as published in your first questionnaire, I find that three out of six were never mentioned by Jesus, the fourth is only inferential, and the fifth to be derived from the recorded sayings of Jesus only by making mystical one of His most literal human sayings, and interpreting literally one of the most mystical. As for the sixth, it seems to have been invented by a man who never was one of His disciples and was accepted with reluctance by those who were. I cannot see, therefore, how the religion of Jesus can be affected in any way other than favorably by pruning off these overgrowths. Also, it seems to me that one of the fundamentals of the teaching of Jesus was that we should have more and more light as we progressed along the path of revelation which His teaching opened to us. I regard it as a great and irreparable mistake of the Church that it has always tried to close the door to such progressive revelation.

As for the controversy itself, I regard it as relatively unimportant. The course of spiritual evolution can be slowed down by the dogmatists, but it can never be utterly stopped or turned aside.

Willis Boughton, owner of the Iron Mountain Farm at Warwick, N. Y., is as convinced that liberalism will triumph:

There should be no wrangle among Christians. If the dispute must continue to a culmination, the result will be as illustrated by Shakespeare in Julius Cæsar—the old must yield to the new.

Fundamentalism will have only a brief career, thinks Nathan Haskell Dole, author of "Young Folks' History of Russia." He observes:

Fundamentalism seems to me like hosts of other religious crazes which have made men miserable in the course of history, and it will pass away just as Salem witchcraft died in the light of sense. I am sorry for these blinded fellow-citizens and I wish I might impart to their misguided minds some of the serenity which a philosophy of life based on reason affords me. I find in the New Testament, amid a great deal that seems to me like the relics of a tribal cult, many helps toward decent behavior. The most important is this one text, "Love the Lord with all thy heart and all thy soul and all thy might, and thy neighbor as thyself." What else can possibly be required?

Of all the letters, only two advise separation. One is from Francis Jenkins Olcott, author of the "Young People's Outlook." He writes:

My position doubtless is that of many Christian laymen who do not question the credibility of the Book that bears on its every part the impress of God's hand, that coming down to us from the ages has taught men justice and judgment, has influenced nations, and has from the beginning condemned the evil of the world.

To a thinking mind, what weight against such a witness has the flimsy evidence of the modernists, who are continually forced to withdraw their attacks on the Bible—attacks both historical and philological. Lo, an attack! Behold, at a turn of the spade, the archeologist uncovers a refutation! The "higher critic" routed, fabricates new attacks, chiefly against the books from which Christ the Saviour quoted. But Christians rejoice because the Book of God has endured through millenniums, the Book of Him who is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

Nevertheless, Christian laymen stand in sorrow before the strange spectacle of prominent pastors of the Church of Jesus Christ undermining her foundation. They practically teach that the Bible lies or was written in part by ignorant men. They back their assertions with heathen mythology and with guesses more unbelievable than any product of savage cults. The Bible, say they, in spite of its network of falsehoods and mistakes, is spiritually true! . . . What wonder that young people under their tuition, after recovering from the sentimentality of modernism, grow indifferent—what wonder that atheism, business dishonesty, and crime are on the increase?

Who is to blame? asks the layman. Is the source of all this in the divinity schools? Where is the Christian to find a secure foothold in an incorruptible Church? Is the time ripe for the whole body of loyal Christians to go forth and become a Church in the wilderness?

The other letter advising separation bears the signature of Roger S. Galer, president of the Universalist General Convention. Says he:

A reconciliation or union of fundamentalists and liberals is in my judgment neither possible nor desirable. Reconciliation would involve partial surrenders by both parties of principles regarded as vital. The differences are the outcome of two opposing views or philosophies of life. . . .

Liberal concepts are receiving ever wider recognition in all orthodox churches, and will ultimately either force a division in their ranks or gradually win full acceptance.

We travel different roads and no compromise is possible. Manifestly, the struggle is inevitable, now or later. We believe the world is ripe for it now.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Reaching the Last Community

By Rev. Malcolm Dana, D.D.

Director of Rural Work for the Congregational Home Missionary Society

[During the last summer Every Community Service Endeavors were held in Idaho, northern California and Wyoming. These enterprises were under the auspices of the Home Missions Council. National and State denominational leaders, by dividing into teams, reached every community in each State. Many allocations of neglected areas or communities were made by which one denomination assumed the sole care of territory so allocated. The undertaking was the result of the example of similar work in Montana undertaken some years ago, and of the surveys of the Institute of Social and Religious Research, which showed the need for a facing of the problems of under and over-churching. The Institute co-operated in several ways with the enterprise of last summer. We have asked one of the secretaries who visited all these States to give his impressions of the work that was done. The article is most interesting, in that, while recognizing the good work done, it challenges attention to the fundamental problems of attitudes and conceptions. It is to be hoped that in the additional States which it is planned to visit with such an endeavor there may be a stronger disposition, at least on the part of some denominations, to face the more difficult side of the dilemma in which missionary forces find themselves.]

I HAVE been asked to give some of the impressions received from a participation in the Every Community Service Endeavors of the early summer. In complying with that request I have also checked up with observations made in twenty-three States during my travels this year in the line of regular duties.

The "teams" with which I was associated traveled 650 miles by auto and the same distance by rail in Idaho; 240 miles by auto, twenty-seven by stage, forty by boat and ninety-six miles by rail in northern California; and 535 miles by auto and an equal number by rail in Wyoming. Our way led mostly through rural regions. One-day "set-ups" were enjoyed in Portland, Seattle and Spokane for the purpose of encouraging similar Endeavors and the organization of local home mission councils. The survey work was of necessity somewhat superficial, but the effects of the traveling together of national, state and local denominational leaders throughout a period of five or six weeks and over great stretches of open country were remarkable. The men came to know and respect each other, and friendships were made which will last through the years. Seeing denominational sins in the presence of representatives of other denominations tended to bring about a disposition to at least try and prevent, throughout the future, the very evident sins of the past.

In such groups and about such business there would inevitably be two minds in evidence. The one would hesitate to speak of the evils of existing conditions, endeavoring to excuse, cover up or divert attention from certain practices which have discredited the common Christian enterprise, while the other mind, with a constructive and not destructive purpose, would bravely face those sins without attempting to blink, palliate or gloss over conditions which must be remedied before America can ever be thoroughly evangelized. The dark page of church history is the congestion of men and money and an overlapping and duplication of religious effort which is depriving large areas and groups of people of any religious care and privilege at all.

It would be a more agreeable task to mention only the encouraging signs of the times, but it is the negative side of the religious situation that needs a fearless and frank dragging out to the clear light of day. The Every Community Service Endeavors in six different States are themselves symptomatic of very slowly improving conditions, together with the fact that in the various groups along the way there are prominent leaders who are dominated by unselfish and unbiased enthusiasm for the Kingdom rather than a sole interest in denominations and churches. Their number is bound to increase, since co-operation is the plain will of God. Nevertheless, the traditional ecclesiastical and sectarian mind is strongly entrenched and matters of belief are stressed with divisive effect and at the expense of a really Christian spirit and action. At certain times and on certain occasions Christian leaders talk and act as though they conceded that brethren of other faiths were destined for the same eternal future as themselves, only to go out and argue and work as though they did not so believe. Suspicion and distrust still actuate those who should be swayed by a sole passion for promoting the Kingdom of God. Such feelings are the direct product of the long practice of wrong methods in the work of the churches. The following "impressions" are very frankly given:

1. The Protestant religious enterprise is largely dominated by denominational and church ambitions rather than by an entirely unselfish devotion to the best interests of the Kingdom of God.

2. Competition is still the order of the day, probably justifying the accusation that "more missionary money is spent at points of competition than of actual need—moneys collected for the latter purpose." This more, and not less, since the war, and the raising of the great denominational drives.

3. Allocations of "denominational responsibility" and "reciprocal exchanges" are increasing, but there is as yet no large or willing inclination to even consider "elimination" at points where there is inexcusable competition and where the multiplication of churches and consequent waste of home missionary moneys have become a veritable scandal to supposedly Christian endeavor.

4. All denominations report a lack of either money or men sufficient to carry out the work already begun and yet continue to plant churches competitively and in spite of the self-evident fact that vast areas and wholly unserved groups can be served only as money and men are freed from places where there is now a grievous overplus of religious privilege.

5. The home missionary policy seems to be still that of rushing into "strategic centers" to the neglect of isolated and needy communities where self-support is a remote possibility, and the work likely to be purely missionary to the end of the chapter.

6. Wherever there is serious overlapping and duplication of effort there is almost always a corresponding selfish lack of interest in nearby and outlying peoples. Farmstead visitation is the most neglected form of rural ministry.

7. The well-nigh universal economic depression through rural America makes the imposition of needless churches upon communities unable to support them a veritable "binding of heavy burdens upon the poor" and causes loss of interest and even resentment in the presence of religious practice, become a burden rather than a holy privilege.

8. There is a steadily increasing demand for the one "community church," with the people further along in such desires than the ecclesiastical administrators. Where the reasonable will of the people is repeatedly frustrated a church independent of all denominational connections and loyalties often follows—in point of fact, a new denomination.

9. Absence of the masculine and failure to win or hold the modern young people are both common to the country church. The explanation is that men care nothing about the fine theological and ecclesiastical disputations which split up otherwise united peoples into competing cliques, whereas in the business world the whole trend is toward co-operation and consolidation in the interests of economy and real efficiency. Modern young people are doing their own thinking and refusing to be longer held by intolerance; bigotry or sectarian insistence.

10. It is everywhere admitted that the church is above all things a serving institution bound to serve all of the people, all of their interests, and all of the time. The tragic exhibit the country over is the few churches which in personnel, equipment and program are adequate for community needs or in any way an outgrowth of intelligent study of those needs and opportunities. The few churches which are "going concerns" are lauded to an extent and in ways which show that they are the rare exceptions and not the rule. Church properties throughout rural America are in a deplorable condition of upkeep.

11. The average rural minister is not fitted for his job and has no great conception of the bigness of his opportunity. This is most largely due to the educational institutions which sent him out and which have little enthusiasm for the country or first-hand knowledge of its needs.

12. The countryside is cursed by wild-cat sects, whose preaching and work are as a rule utterly destructive, divisive and devoid of constructive or permanent effects.

I make no apology for my own profound conviction that competitive overchurching is still the unpardonable sin of Protestantism in America, producing churches selfishly engaged in maintaining themselves at cost of failure to take the things of Christ to nearby outlying peoples, and of so monopolizing men and money as to make it impossible to carry the gospel to places in a so-called Christian land where there are to-day no religious privileges at all. It is an unpardonable sin because it is entirely possible to know just how many churches a given community can and ought to support, and because any church which invades a community already fully supplied does so with a full knowledge that its own necessarily weak future can be assured only by deliberately stealing strength from churches already there. It would seem as though a peace conference of the denominations was needed in behalf of the countryside to end this uneconomic and unchristian war among denominations. If the matter of the expenditure of missionary funds in church competitions is not squarely and universally faced and conditions remedied by the friends of religion, some person hostile to both religion and the church is going to investigate and give to the public facts which may cause a scandal to religion and a disastrous falling off in missionary giving. And the latter at just the time when America is more a missionary nation than ever before and needs and is justified in receiving more and not less money for the redemption of the homeland.

Enterprises like the Every Community Service Endeavor are worth all the money, time and effort put into them. There is little virtue, however, in getting together, seeing and confessing our sins if we are not ready and prepared to meet the one condition of Divine forgiveness, viz., "go and sin no more."

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Climbs on Alpine Peaks*

THERE were many things said of the present Pope when his election was announced last year: that he was a great scholar, having been librarian at Milan and at the Vatican; that he was a great diplomat, having carried through to success some very delicate negotiations in Poland and other parts of Europe; that he was a great teacher, having been greatly beloved by the students in Milan; but not much had been said about his daring feats as a mountaineer. As a matter of fact, he had achieved a widespread fame among mountaineers as an intrepid climber of high and difficult peaks and had contributed widely read articles to the Italian reviews about his famous excursion across Monte Rosa, his ascent of the Matterhorn from Zermatt, and his ascent of Mont Blanc. The world discovered that this interesting man, suddenly made Pope, had been a bold mountaineer, animated with a keen love of adventure and endowed with high courage and unlimited powers of endurance.

The extended foreword by Mr. Douglas Freshfield, an eminent Alpinist himself, tells us that some of the expeditions made by His Holiness were fraught with considerable peril and were great tasks of courage. The author himself tells the story of his ascents so modestly that one hardly realizes how arduous and how full of peril some of the excursions were. He is an enthusiastic member of the Alpine Club, and there was great rejoicing in the club when Achille Ratti was elected to the Papacy. The club seemed to feel that anyone who could cross Monte Rosa by an unknown path, spending two nights fourteen thousand feet above the sea, amid ice and snow, with the temperature so low that even wine froze, was capable of enduring with patience and fortitude the trials besetting the Church in these critical years.

The story of the ascent of Monte Rosa from the Italian side, part of the way by an untried route, and the descent into Zermatt by the Swiss side is one of the most thrilling stories of adventure we have ever read. The Pope tells it in minute detail and in most graphic language. It is hard to believe that the body can endure such strain, but, as is apparent in every sentence, it is the old, old story of the indomitable will. There were four in the party, His Holiness, Professor Grasselli, and the two guides, Gadin and Proment. They were tied together by a rope through the whole ascent, but fortunately no one slipped. Much of the way they had to cut their every step in the ice. Gadin cut for twelve hours without stopping. His muscles had become like steel. Nothing could fatigue him. They lived most of the way on Suchard chocolate. Again and again they had to descend long distances and make a new attempt. They spent the first night on a ledge of rock just wide enough to sit upon. To have fallen asleep meant certain death. "In such a place and in such a temperature it would have been the height of impudence to allow sleep to overcome us. But who would have slept in that pure air, which pierced our marrow, and in face of such a scene as we had before us. At this height . . . in the center of the grandest of all the grand Alpine theaters . . . in that pure, transparent atmosphere, under that sky of deepest blue, lit by a crescent moon and sparkling with stars as far as the eye could reach . . . in that silence . . . we felt ourselves to be in the presence of a novel and most imposing revelation of the omnipotence and majesty of God. . . . How could we think of the fatigue we had endured, much less complain of it? We sat there absorbed in our thoughts when the perfect silence was broken by a sound like a mighty thunderclap. It was an avalanche which was breaking loose and falling below us, but too far away to cause us any trouble. Awestruck and amazed, we listened attentively to the terrible sound of destruction, the sight of which was denied to us, as the mass, ever increasing in volume, hurled itself downwards, with 'un fracasso d' un suon pien di spavento', as Dante says, till it came to rest on the lower glacier. When silence was first restored it seemed to us more profound and more solemn than before. And we were to have the opportunity of enjoying from that height the spectacle—everywhere a beautiful one—of the dawn of a splendid day; we were to witness the first diffusion of light, to see the loveliest tints growing in the east, the sun appearing in splendor between the summits, and its rays spreading like a fiery mantle over a thousand peaks, and creeping down a thousand slopes of ice and snow, lighting them up with a wondrous medley of splendid tints!"

The story of the ascent of Mont Blanc by the Rocher is also thrilling, as the descent was made by a new route. The Pope was not only a mountain climber, but an explorer, seeking new routes up and down these giants of the earth. The book is a real contribution to literature. How His Holiness, shut in by the walls of the Vatican, must now and then long for one more sight of his beloved mountains—for he loves them with a real love.

NOT EVEN A RAG DOLL

By WILLIAM WILLARD HOWARD

THE Baroness Berends-Situna took a scarf from her shoulders, twisted it over her wrists and around her fingers, and made it into a remote semblance of a doll. Little Natalia Filipova, waiting for me to focus a photographic lens on her, forgot all about me in the catching of a breath and stretched out both slender arms toward the doll.

At that precise moment the shutter, working on a time limit of one-fiftieth of a second, opened and closed.

This, then, is the intimate human portrait of Natalia Filipova, to whom the instantaneous appeal of an impossible doll was stronger than her fear of a photographic lens. What Natalia would have done if brought face to face with one of those mechanical walking dolls that you take by the hand and lead across the room, I hesitate to predict.

I present the picture of Natalia Filipova here not because Natalia herself is of more than passing interest as an individual, but simply as a type. She may be taken as a sort of composite representation of all the little girls among the members of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia now existing in heart-breaking poverty and distress in the independent states bordering on Bolshevik Russia. Natalia Filipova, with her arms extended toward a caricature of a doll is monarchist Russia's childhood.

I have gone over my notebooks, page by page and line by line, looking for some reference to the existence of a doll in any of the cellars, attics and other obscure places that I visited in my four weeks' investigation of the condition of Russian refugee children last August and September, but I cannot find so much as one memorandum of a doll of any kind. Even with these notebooks to prompt a rather retentive memory, I cannot recall having seen even a rag doll. I do not believe that there is one doll among the thousands upon thousands of Russian refugee children.

Possibly someone may ask, "Why don't those poor little girls have rag dolls?"

That is a natural question. Anyone would be justified in asking it. The answer is simple: There are not any rags! That is an absolute fact. The refugees are so desperately poor that every bit of cloth is utilized for wearing apparel. When a piece of cloth becomes detached from its rightful service in a garment it is used in making a cloth shoe. Little girls cannot have rags for dolls, because the rags are wanted for more utilitarian purposes.

I do not believe that in the length and breadth of the United States there is one little girl who has not some kind of doll—not one. If there were such a child any reader of these lines would supply the want in an hour. I would go without my Christmas dinner to buy a doll for such an emergency.

No, I am not asking for funds with which to buy Christmas dolls for the doll-hungry little girls of monarchist Russia—at least, not in that direct way. I have a much better plan. I am asking you to send to me $10, $15, $20 or $25 for a beautifully hand-embroidered, hand-sewn Russian Princess Dress for your own little girl, or for some little girl near and dear to you.

I will cable your money to Anne Louise Howard on the border of Bolshevik Russia and ask her to instruct the Russian gentlewomen who cut, sew and embroider the dresses to make the left-over pieces of cloth into dolls for their little girls, and to bestow the dolls as gifts on Christmas Day.

There will be plenty of time for this, if you act promptly, because the Russian Christmas day is twelve days later than our Christmas day.

I can promise reasonably prompt delivery of these dresses because Anne Louise Howard already is at work on a preliminary lot of two hundred dresses, all of which will be cut from the latest American cut-paper patterns. If you will send your little girl's measurements you will facilitate the selection of her dress. It might be well, also, to make generous allowance for growth, because these dresses will wear a long time.

The dresses at $10 and $15 will be in Panama cloth, which is a strong, durable and lustrous white cotton fabric suited for home and school wear. The dresses at $20 and $25 will be in native Russian linen, which is a soft, pliable, flax-colored fabric that should wear through a whole family of girls, each in her turn. These linen dresses will withstand any amount of rough-and-tumble wear and still retain their style and finish.

Please send orders and remittances quickly to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue,

New York City. The dresses will be delivered by parcel post or express, all charges prepaid.

Special Note.—Dresses in Panama cloth, with round neck and various length sleeves, for girls of one, two, three and four years of age, are ready for delivery now. In sending remittances for these dresses please send the bust measure and the length of the dress measured in inches down the center of the back; also length of sleeve.

DR. JOHN FOX ON OUR SHORT-COMINGS

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

"The Observer" in THE CHRISTIAN WORK (November 10) says that he wishes to know how many of his readers agree with him in his estimate of Professor Van Loon's "Story of the Bible for Boys."

May I speak for one? I might adopt the phrase that "The Observer" uses about the "Story" and apply it to what he says in his article, viz., "I am not sure whether I like what he says or not." Leaving out of view the shocking banalities of style in the book, and speaking of substance, only let me thank "The Observer" for this: "They" (Van Loon and H. G. Wells) "utterly misrepresent the Gospels and the Epistles to their readers." This is well said, but is that all that needs to be said?

The Gospels and Epistles are coherent parts of a glorious whole called the Bible. This is under fire now, as a whole, and in many of its parts Old and New Testament alike. Could not "The Observer" be a little more specific and tell his readers what he thinks of what Van Loon says about the Old Testament? On page thirteen we read, "The stories of the creation, however, which we find in the Old Testament were written more than a thousand years after the death of Moses." Earlier he writes, "Please don't ask me when the Bible was written, because I couldn't answer you" (page nine). This does not seem consistent, altogether. Later still (page 325) we read, "Like the book of Daniel, and the Psalms of David, and many chapters of the Old Testament, the Gospels bear fictitious names. They are called after the Apostles Matthew, Mark, Luke and John." (Were Mark and Luke apostles?) "But it seems very unlikely that the original disciples had anything to do with these famous literary compositions."

This is enough to suggest the attitude of Professor Van Loon toward both Testaments. In the Gospel according to Van Loon we could not sing with Phillips Brooks "O morning stars together proclaim the Holy Birth," nor in the Portuguese Hymn, "Did not abhor the Virgin's womb," nor a month from now is there left place or room for the Christmas melodies. Every trace of the Virgin Birth is carefully eliminated.

In like dreadful fashion Jesus was "crucified, dead and buried." That ends the "Story" according to Van Loon. No empty tomb; no visions of Angels; no Ascension; of course, no second coming to judge the world either pre- or post-millennial.

For one thing we should be thankful. Professor Van Loon does not solemnly mock God and man by pretending that he believes what he has just denied.

Old and New Testaments are stripped bare of any taint of supernaturalism. But now let me ask "The Observer," with all due respect, has he had any responsibility for all this? Have not the columns of THE CHRISTIAN WORK rung for years with

A Remarkable Opportunity to Secure a Beautiful Garment and at the Same Time Render a Beautiful Service

MR. WILLIAM WILLARD HOWARD went to the border of Russia seeking cargoes for his ships and found instead the ghastly tragedy of the exiled nobility and intelligentsia of old Russia. The plight of the Russian gentlewomen especially was pitiable. Mr. Howard immediately conceived the plan of helping these women by giving them employment at making hand-embroidery, hand-sewn Russian Princess blouses and one-piece gowns.

Mr. Howard brought home with him a supply of the most beautiful embroidered blouses ever seen in this country. These blouses sold immediately, so that a permanent relief work was put into operation under the supervision of Anne Louise Howard.

Another thousand, more exquisite than the first thousand, has just arrived. The work of embroidery on these blouses is so artistically done, and is so beautiful in color harmony and design, that you would buy one immediately could you see them. The accompanying illustrations give but a faint idea of their beauty.

Quite apart from the intrinsic merit of the blouses and gowns, each one of which is the original creation of the destitute Russian gentlewoman who made it, is the priceless opportunity of helping these distressed gentlefolk in a way that does not impair their self-respect or wound the most delicate sensibilities.

The prices range from $15.00 to $40.00. Do you not want to order one at once, either for yourself or for a Christmas present? What more beautiful and fitting Christmas present for your friend or daughter could be imagined?

ROCHE'S

the melancholy refrain of a Bible which is only partly true? One distinguished minister has in its columns ridiculed the ark of the Covenant "God carried round in a box."

If "The Observer" who fills his columns with reasons for accepting the assured results of scholarship, that is, the disjecta membra of the Old Testament torn to tatters and latterly of the New also, how can he blame Van Loon for carrying the principle somewhat further, a little more recklessly, a good deal more grossly, but at the root the same anti-supernatural gospel of the higher critics?

He is like a bumptious boy who awkwardly blurts out the family secrets of the "liberal" party. The more prudent members of the family would like to kill him for it. But the secret is out. His book is the kind of thing we may expect, if we do not repent and reverse our levers.

"The Observer" is, no doubt, horrified at the prospect. But how can he reply to Van Loon? "I am not sure whether I like the book or not," he says. Is that a satisfactory answer?

Wellhausen, it is said, had once a theologically-minded caller. "Well," said the famous higher critic, "I always said that the Old Testament was a fraud, but there was one thing I never could bring myself to say. I never would say as those Scotch fellows say that the Lord was responsible for the fraud." There are some American fellows who are following quite closely in their footsteps.

EXTRA DIVIDENDS

Many prominent American corporations have recently declared extra dividends on their stock. Among these are the United States Steel Corporation, which has increased the dividend on its common stock to 6%. The Vacuum Oil Company, Ingersoll-Rand Company, Eastman Kodak Company and United States Gypsum Company have all made extra dividend disbursements to stock holders. These heavy dividends evidence the large earnings which corporations generally enjoyed in 1923, and prove the confident attitude of business men generally toward conditions for the coming year. Of course, one may attribute extra stock dividends to the desire of companies to capitalize their surplus before Congress devises any new taxes.

GETTING EVEN WITH THE DINNER

"The Watchman-Examiner" is responsible for this tale:

On Thanksgiving Day the father of Dr. Samuel Upham, formerly of Drew Seminary, used to gather all of his children and grandchildren in the big parlor, after the dinner was over and the dishes were washed, and preach to them a regular sermon. On one of these occasions he preached a rousing sermon, showing up the errors of the old-time Calvinism of New England. At the close of the sermon his son, Samuel, said: "Father, don't you know that old, extreme form of Calvinism is dead?"

The sturdy old hero replied: "Yes, Sam, I know that, but we Methodists believe in punishment after death!"

PUTTING FIRST THINGS FIRST

Mr. Johnson invariably made long calculations about anything important that happened in his life. He became engaged, and his marriage was announced to take place on a Thursday. One day he informed his future mother-in-law that it must be celebrated on a Wednesday.

"Why?" she demanded, in surprise.

"I have been making a calculation," he said, "and I find that my silver wedding would take place on a Friday. That would never do, as it is the evening on which my lodge meets."—The Congregationalist.

A CALL FOR OLD DENOMINATIONAL MINUTES

The Institute of Social and Religious Research is about to study village and country churches, consisting of elements different in denomination, including federated churches, independent union churches, and such denominational community churches as have among their members persons originally of other denominations. One part of the investigation will consist of a comparison of the data given in denominational year books and minutes for the five years before union, and since that date. State minutes often contain facts not included in the general year book. Those making the study would be grateful if persons who have kept files of the minutes of denominations entering into such combinations would put these at their service, sending them care of Study in Local Church Union, Institute of Social and Religious Research, 370 Seventh avenue, New York City. The areas to be covered are New England, the North Atlantic states, the Middle West, the North Central states, Colorado and the Pacific coast. To insure obtaining information of sufficiently early date, minutes are desired extending back to 1905; but partial files will gladly be accepted. Unless the pamphlets are dispatched soon after the receipt of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, it might be well to send in advance a postal card giving location and dates of the minutes available, for material sent cannot be returned. It is also requested that those acquainted with cases of union falling within the scope of the study will report location, denominations and address of minister or other informant. City or suburban cases need not be reported, or cases listed in the "Handbook of the Community Church Movement," or federated churches having one element Congregational, which are marked as "federated" in the Congregational Year Book. The widespread interest in this important and rapidly growing movement encourages those making the study to hope for willing co-operation.

AN OLD LAND-MARK GONE

Across from the editorial rooms of CHRISTIAN WORK on lower Fifth Avenue workmen are demolishing an old land-mark, one of the last to go on this part of the avenue.

Here, many years ago, Edward VII, then Prince of Wales, while he was in New York City, was entertained by Miss Mary Lenox Kennedy, a niece of James Lenox, founder of the Lenox Library.

When the Prince of Wales visited this country three years ago he called upon Miss Kennedy and saw the old and yellow ball gown which she had worn at the time she entertained the Prince's grandfather.

An apartment house will be erected in the place of the old building.

A CZECHOSLOVAK CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL

The singing societies of the Jan Hus Presbyterian Church, composed of eighty children and young people, will portray some of the festivals of the Czechoslovaks at Aeolian Hall, New York City, on Saturday evening, December 22, 1923.

Some years ago in Aeolian Hall and in Town Hall these societies presented an entertainment called "An Evening with the Czechs." It was received with great enthusiasm by the American public and press. The program this year will be an entirely new one of folk songs and dances, and a special feature will be made of a Christmas festival in which the Christmas story will be told by means of Czechoslovak carols, which are beautiful for their simplicity, and distinctive in that they have sprung from the people just as truly as the folk songs and equally express the musical soul of the people.

In order to make the occasion even more realistic the singers will appear in the beautiful national costumes and the songs will portray national customs and festivities at which such songs as these are invariably used.

The program will consist of two parts, as follows:

1. A Wedding Festival (after the wedding ceremony and feast the people, young and old, gather and rejoice with the bride and groom with folk songs and dances).
2. A Christmas Festival—(a) The Shepherd Scene; (b) The Manger at Bethlehem.

The Cosmopolis Press of New York offers a thousand-dollar prize for the best play, motion-picture scenario or short story adaptable into a play or scenario on the American jail as a force in the creating of criminals and in the fostering of crime. The judges of the contest include Ludwig Lewisohn, editor of "The Nation"; Minnie Maddern Fiske, the actress; Carl Van Doren, literary editor of the "Century Magazine"; Dean George W. Kirchwey, formerly of Columbia University; Ida Clyde Clarke, associate editor of "Pictorial Review," and Jesse Lasky, of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. The list will include also a theatrical producer, not yet selected.

The contest will be open to residents of all countries, provided the manuscripts are written in English. It will close October 1, 1924.

PLANNING FOR SQUARE MEALS

William had become the proud owner of a pig, and insisted on having all the care of it. After a few weeks, as the pig did not seem to thrive, his father said to him:

"William, I'm afraid you are not feeding your pig enough. It doesn't seem to be fattening at all."

"I don't want to fatten him yet," answered the young stockman. "I'm waiting until he gets as long as I want him, then I'll begin to widen him out."—The Watchman-Examiner.

ARMENIAN COURSES AT THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

So far as we know the University of Chicago is the first institution in this country to give courses in Armenian. The trustees of Mr. Charles R. Crane's Friendship Fund have appropriated two thousand dollars a year for three years for such courses. They have also granted the university five thousand dollars a year for three years for courses in Russian. The teacher of the Armenian courses will be the Rev. Antranig Arakel Bedikian, of the Protestant Armenian Church in New York.

The World of To-day

THE PASTORAL LETTER OF THE EPISCOPAL BISHOPS

Last Sunday the Episcopal churches in this country were ordered to read from their pulpits a Pastoral Letter which the House of Bishops of their Church drew up at Dallas, Texas, November 14th and 15th. The letter had much of wisdom and real religion in it. But in it the Bishops undertook to answer the challenges which have been made them of late to assert their own faith in the Virgin Birth. Perhaps the theological atmosphere of Texas had something to do with their theological intransigence. At any rate, in the course of the Pastoral Letter the Bishops wrote:

It is irreconcilable with the vows voluntarily made at ordination for a minister of this Church to deny, or to suggest doubts as to, the facts and truths declared in the Apostles' Creed.

To deny, or to treat as immaterial, belief in the creeds in which at every regular service of the Church both minister and congregation profess to believe is to trifle with words and cannot but expose us to the suspicion and danger of dishonesty and unreality. . . . To explain away the statement, "Conceived by the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary," as if it referred to a birth in the ordinary way, of two human parents, under, perhaps, exceptionally holy conditions, is plainly an abuse of language. An ordinary birth could not have been so described, nor can the words of the Creed fairly be so understood.

Objections to the doctrine of the Virgin Birth or the bodily resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ are not only contrary to the Christian tradition, but have been abundantly answered by the best scholarship of the day.

It is not the fact of the Virgin Birth that makes us believe in our Lord as God; but our belief in Him as God makes reasonable and natural our acceptance of the fact of the Virgin Birth as declared in the Scriptures and as confessed in the Creed from the earliest times.

The Creed witnesses to the deliberate and determined purpose of the Church not to explain but to proclaim the fact that the Jesus of history is none other than God and Saviour, on whom, and on faith in whom, depends the whole world's hope of redemption and salvation.

So far from imposing fetters on our thought, the Creeds, with their simple statement of great truths and facts without elaborate philosophical disquisition, give us a point of departure for free thought and speculation on the meaning and consequences of the facts revealed by God. The truth is never a barrier to thought. In belief, as in life, it is the truth that makes us free.

William Lawrence, the Episcopal Bishop of Massachusetts, was conspicuously absent from the meeting. One has only to read Bishop Lawrence's own words to perceive that he could have not agreed with any such insistence on the doctrine of the Virgin Birth in its baldest and most material form. Like the Presbyterian General Assembly in its doctrinal action last May, the Protestant Episcopal Bishops transcended their authority in trying to interpret any doctrine of the Church. The only source of doctrinal statement in the American Episcopal Church is the General Convention with the bishops, the clergy and the laity agreeing. In New York, Dr. Leighton Parks laid aside his ordinary church vestments when he preached his sermon last Sunday and donned the robes of a doctor of theology in order to emphasize the fact that he spoke to his people as such. With tremendous vigor he assailed the unlawful action of the Bishops in attempting to interpret doctrine for the Church and challenged Bishop Manning to bring him to trial. The rectors of other New York churches spoke not dissimilarly. Probably in scores of Episcopal churches throughout the country men asserted the liberty of their church. Every Christian minister and every Christian layman has an inalienable right to the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free.

THE PROMISE OF A NEW HERESY TRIAL

The action of the Episcopal Bishops at Dallas certainly was provoked partly by statements of Dr. Percy Stickney Grant, Bishop Brown, whose extreme position many Episcopalians and others try to discount by saying that he is of unsound mind—a fact by no means determined—and by those of more obscure men. One of these more obscure men, Rev. Lee W. Heaton, rector of Trinity Episcopal Church, Fort Worth, Texas, in a sermon last Palm Sunday, said:

Consecrated Christian men differ much in their interpretation of the ancient creed, and each succeeding generation must reinterpret for itself "the faith, once for all delivered to the saints." For instance, there are those who cling with unquestioning minds to the doctrine of the Virgin Birth as a statement of physical fact, while others have been moved to analyze it and have discovered new spiritual truths that transcend what the form of words thus so imperfectly express. There are those among us who believe that Jesus was in all things and in every way both God and man; the incarnation of God and the son of Joseph. This is my own opinion, and there is room in the Church for those who must reconcile theology with religion.

Bishop Moore, of Dallas, took note of the statement and now proposes to try Mr. Heaton for heresy. Probably the Bishop's decision was partly due to the presence in Fort Worth of that mighty Fundamentalist, J. Frank Norris. Mr. Norris is pastor of an immense Baptist church there. Strangely enough, he has been able to "put the screws" on other communions. It will be remembered that it was due to his attack on Professor Rice that the Southern Methodist University allowed the latter to leave its faculty. The Episcopalians are a comparatively weak church in Texas. It would seem that they also are more or less afraid of his influence. Why the Episcopal Church should take an obscure man for so important a test case is perhaps not difficult to see. Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts, the venerable and eminent Dr. Leighton Parks of the great St. Bartholomew's Church in New York, Percy Stickney Grant and other men of eminence in the Episcopal Church hold the same views as does Mr. Heaton. If the Bishops are spoiling for a heresy trial, why do they not, in the language of the streets, "take somebody their own size?" Are they afraid? Fortunately, the Modern Churchmen's Union, with a membership of five hundred Protestant Episcopal clergymen, has come to the defense of Mr. Heaton and will see to it that his trial is not put across in a corner. The modern scholarship of the whole Episcopal Church is prepared to support him.

THE PRESENT INTENSE INTEREST IN RELIGIOUS DISCUSSION

This manifestation in the Episcopal Church is only a parallel to what has been going on in the Baptist and Presbyterian churches. The Baptist Fundamentalists, led by the Baptist Bible Union of North America in union with the Baptist Fundamentalist League of Greater New York and Vicinity, have undertaken a campaign to get the Baptist Conventions to adopt a confession of faith. The Bible Union describes the confession as a revision of the New Hampshire Confession, which they attempted to foist on the Northern Convention at its Indianapolis meeting a year and a half ago. It is more objectionable than the New Hampshire confession. It specifically declares that the Church does not believe that creation was by evolution, but that the Lord made each species "bearing seed after his kind." (Just how the Fundamentalists explain the fact that if one plants, for instance, the seed of a Baldwin apple or of a Burbank potato he may get some very wild and poor product, we do not know.) The Baptist Bible Union declares that it will continue to urge the adoption of this creed until it is successful, that it is entering upon a campaign that may take years, but that it will persist until it succeeds. Among the Presbyterians the most conservative are beginning to hold meetings to discuss the situation. The whole controversy is helping to educate people in regard to the real thinking of the leaders of the Church. Nearly half of the first page and nearly all of the second page of the greatest American newspaper, "The New York Times," on Monday, December 17, was filled with matters concerning religion. That is proof of the interest in religion which has been stirred up by the present open discussion. The whole situation, we believe, will develop most helpfully.

THE DE LA HUERTA REBELLION

Since Mexico drove out Porfirio Diaz in 1911, she has had seven presidents and almost as many revolutions. The present president, Alvaro Obregon, took office in 1920 after a successful revolution against General Carranza. His term comes to an end in 1925. He had picked for his successor Plutarco Calles, his Minister of War. Three weeks ago Adolfo de la Huerta, until recently Obregon's Minister of Finance, with General Guadalupe Sanchez, started a revolt at Vera Cruz, the chief port of Mexico. The revolutionists in two weeks gained support in seventeen of the twenty-eight states of the republic. The federal district of Mexico and some of the greatest states are still loyal to the Obregon government. Obregon has really accomplished a good deal in keeping some sort of order in Mexico. He had brought about an agreement between his country and the United States, was straightening out the troublesome oil situation, and was making foreigners feel that it was safe to invest money in Mexico. De la Huerta brings a typical catalog of charges against his former chief; that he has corrupted deputies and senators with promises and gifts, surrounded himself with political mercenaries, nullified the action of the Supreme Court of the nation, sought to control the election machinery, armed political agitators and, to quote his manifesto, "has not failed to establish the most transcendental and disturbing immoralities, which are being committed from the pinnacle of power." De la Huerta promises to abolish the death penalty, to guarantee life, liberty and property to all natives and all foreigners, to make everything right between — employer and employee, and to supply "land and justice for all." The rebellion provokes again the question whether Mexico is really fit for self-government.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE RELEASE OF THE WAR-OPINION PRISONERS

Thanks to the report of the special committee consisting of Newton D. Baker, former Secretary of War, Bishop Charles H. Brent of Buffalo, and General J. G. Harbord, President Coolidge has ordered the release of thirty-one of the thirty-two men still confined in our Federal prisons on account of offenses in connection with the war. They will receive their release in time to spend Christmas at home. Twenty-two of these men were convicted at Sacramento in January, 1919, and sentenced to ten-year terms; two of them were convicted in Kansas City in December, 1919; and seven were convicted in Chicago. One man, Nicholas Sogg, a Mexican, convicted of aiding an American to escape the draft, did not receive a pardon. At this writing, the report of the committee has not been made public. We welcome this tardy justice to these men. We Americans can hold up our heads a little bit higher because no longer are we the one people who remain so savage and so bitter that we have not released those whom we imprisoned because they disagreed with the mass of the people in the days of war.

AMERICAN PARTICIPATION IN THE REPARATION INQUIRY

The long discussion of an international conference to take up the reparations problem has eventuated in an agreement by France, Great Britain and the other Allies to appoint two commissions under the authority of the Reparations Commission; one to consider measures to put Germany on her feet again financially; the other to learn how much German capital is in countries other than Germany and where it is. The Allies have invited America to participate unofficially in the commissions, the German government uniting with the Allies in asking America to take a place on the first commission. Our Government has accepted both invitations. The American members of the first commission are Charles G. Dawes and Owen B. Young. Charles G. Dawes, the eminent Chicago banker, was former Budget Director of the United States. Owen B. Young is vice-president of the General Electric Company, and like Mr. Dawes a financier with a very wide understanding of international conditions. Probably a third American will be appointed on the other commission. The Germans, it seems, have really given up, not only nominally but actually, their resistance in the Ruhr and the new government under Chancellor Marx appears to be ready to take up conversations with France and Belgium in a spirit that augurs considerable hope.

FOOD LOAN FOR GERMANY

Germany produces only about four-fifths of the food that she needs. Even if the food were evenly distributed among the people and the public had the money to buy bread, the country would not have enough to prevent widespread starvation. Secretary Hoover has recommended that Germany be given foreign commercial credits to the amount of approximately seventy million dollars in order to buy the necessary food. He suggests that at least half of that amount be raised through bonds floated by private banking interests in this country. The administration is sympathetic to the plan, and it is possible that the War Finance Corporation will provide a portion of the funds. In order to float such a loan it would be necessary that it should be a first lien on some tangible German resources. That fact may make it necessary for the Reparations Commission to pass on it, for as it is, Belgium holds a first lien on the resources of the German government; the armies of occupation hold a second lien; under present circumstances the claim of France comes third. If this short-time loan goes through, the French claim to reparations would drop to fourth place. But it seems that a better spirit is beginning to prevail between France and Germany. Perhaps France might give consent to the loan gladly in order that Germany may keep well enough to be able to go to work to pay her debt.

THE NEW TYPE OF MISSION WORK IN TURKEY

The American Board, as we all know, is keeping up its work in Turkey, but its clientele in that land is in large part a new one. The flight of the Christians from Anatolia meant, of course, loss of practically all the native assistants to our missionaries. At Aintab, for instance, although the Governor announced that the helpers at the hospital would be safe, nevertheless the eye specialist, the laboratory worker, the evangelist, the collector and seven nurses felt that they must go. Only a handful of native Christian workers remained in a city of thirty thousand. The only other native non-Moslems in the city consisted of the small Jewish community and about twenty Christians at the Franciscan monastery. During the exodus, the number of patients at the American Board hospital dropped off materially, but last January, in spite of severe weather, clinics became larger than usual. Through February the increase continued. In March, Drs. Shepard and Hamilton examined 718 new cases in the clinics alone, a larger number than had been examined by three doctors in any month of the preceding year. One Friday in March, Dr. Shepard saw 120 patients between eight a.m. and two p.m. The hospital has had to turn away many patients because the workers simply could not attend to them. For the last year, ninety-six per cent. of the patients at the clinics have been Moslems. Such a record suggests great hope for the future of missionary work in Turkey.

PART OF THE EXPLANATION OF THE HIGH COST OF LIVING

Mr. Benjamin F. Yoakum, who for many years was chairman of the Board of Directors of the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad and who has held office in other companies, is devoting a great deal of time to a study of the costs of distributing food and other farm products. In recent articles in "The New York Times" and "The Nation's Business," he points out that the potato farmer gets but a third of what the city consumer pays the retailer. With the average farm price for potatoes fifty-six cents per bushel, the consumer has paid an average of two dollars a bushel. A survey made by the Bureau of Markets in New York City, with a corps of 125 market inspectors, showed that the retailers were making thirty to fifty per cent. profit on bread sold to consumers. Hartford, Connecticut, with a population of 138,000 has a thousand food dealers; or a food-dealer population of five thousand. That means that every twenty-eight people in Hartford support one member of the family of a food dealer (not to mention his employees). "There are about 3,793,000 food dealers engaged in selling foodstuffs of every kind produced by the 6,500,000 farm families in the country." This means that there is one family supported by selling the food produced by about every two farm families in the United States. Although these figures would be changed slightly if the size of families could be figured more exactly and the volume of exports and imports of food handled by the dealers could be taken into account, nevertheless Mr. Yoakum uses the most reliable data now available. He contends in an article in "The Nation's Business" for November "that when the business interests of the country realize that it is costing $2 to distribute foodstuffs, including cost, profits, commissions, etc., to each $1 paid the producer they will realize that it is of paramount importance to their business and the continuation of the country's prosperity that they throw their influence and force towards co-operative work with the farmers, that they may carry on their business with a profit to themselves." He recommends that farmers organize co-operatively to sell their products and declares that "the next big thing of national importance is to push co-operative consumers' associations in large consuming centers." He predicts too that "producers' and consumers' co-operative associations will become nation-wide, and will exert an influence which will carry power sufficiently strong to force the recognition they desire, eliminating the enormous burden that the farmers and consumers are compelled to carry."

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

INEFFICIENT MANAGEMENT

Studies of waste that have been made by engineers during the last few years make apparent the error of supposing that the competitive system of industry and trade operates automatically to evolve and maintain high efficiency in management. A high official in a great woolen concern said to a subordinate, "Don't forget that we are here to make profits." To which the other replied: "Yes, if you mean long time profits, but if you mean to work the plant for all there is in it without reference to the future of the industry it is all wrong." It is evident that either from short-sightedness or lack of social conscience, many concerns operate on the latter basis, and in so doing defeat their own ends. This, from "Industrial Management" for November:

Many industrial executives keep their noses so close to the grindstone of production that they fail to see that the stone needs dressing or that the belt which drives it is slipping.

No factory manager would permit a competitor to come into his factory and put dark glasses on all his employees, thus impairing their ability to see their work. Yet dirty, smoky windows and skylights, cleaned but once every three or six months, dingy walls and insufficient artificial lights do this very thing in many plants.

Sabotage is an ugly word representing an uglier thing. Yet the results of premeditated sabotage, scattered, infrequent and detectable as they are, are far less harmful than the almost universal, unconscious sabotage of neglected maintenance which reaches out its destroying hand in thousands of busy plants, stopping machines, halting production, piling up unnecessary costs, cutting into the profit margins and chipping away, bit by bit, ceaselessly, the sum total of invested capital in every industrial enterprise.

A well known and conservative industrial engineer insists that if the managers of industry would make use of known devices and methods of conserving materials and power and raising production standards, industry could be made so profitable that even the unskilled wage earner might have an income equivalent to $10,000 a year.

THE PLIGHT OF THE ATLANTIC COAST FISHING INDUSTRY

Old Gloucester, Massachusetts, once was the port for four hundred fishing vessels. Now only two hundred of these ships are engaged in fishing. Many splendidly equipped trawlers lie at the wharves. Fishermen now sell their catch of mackerel to dealers for one and a half cents a pound, but the consumer pays forty, forty-one and forty-two cents a pound for the same fish. "Occasionally a fine catch is dumped into the harbor for want of a market at any price," writes E. C. Lindeman in "The New Republic." The industry is so inefficiently organized that though two hundred million pounds of food are brought annually into Boston, where forty-two dealers are stationed presumably to distribute fish, eighty-five per cent. of all the fresh fish brought to Boston are sold within a radius of a hundred and fifty miles. "Carload lots of refrigerated fish are still to be shipped from this port." Professor Lindeman lays the collapse of the industry to the fact that, though methods of production have increased in efficiency, methods of marketing have remained static. In desperation the Fishermen's Union of the Atlantic has sent for Aaron Sapiro, attorney for eighty farmers' marketing associations, to assist them in organizing a co-operative marketing association. Dealers, captains, vessel owners and fishermen are giving support to the proposal. The association would give to the fishermen a selling agency which they themselves own. It should stabilize the industry by introducing efficient marketing methods and by increasing the distribution, and, let us hope, would lower retail prices likewise.

THE CHURCH AND THE PROFIT MOTIVE

The Rock River Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church recently adopted the following significant memorial, addressed to the General Conference of the Church, which is to meet in 1924:

Whereas, a major controversy of our time centers in an industrial system based upon the profit motive;

And whereas, rapid and far-reaching changes in social and economic life are creating demands for new ethical standards;

And whereas, it is a function of the church to provide moral and spiritual leadership to this generation and to give discriminating judgment upon the ethical issues involved in the economic controversy;

Be it therefore resolved, that we call upon our preachers and people to give impartial, zealous and thorough study to the moral and spiritual issues involved in the economic order;

And be it further resolved, that we memorialize the General Conference of 1924 of the Methodist Episcopal Church to place the Methodist Book Concern upon a basis of literary and educational service, and that its standard of success shall be ministry rather than profit.

* The Conference has begun right in urging the Church first of all to consider its own business undertakings and their motive.

Christmas in Song and Story

THE debt of art, literature and music to Christmas, no less than that of worship, is immeasurable. Without its entrance into human existence, Raphael could not have enriched the world with the Sistine Madonna, nor Milton with "The Hymn to the Nativity," nor Haendel with "The Messiah," nor Dickens with "A Christmas Carol." We should never have acquired the rich heritage of story, song and sweetest sentiment that now cheers the shortest and darkest days of our northern hemisphere, nor the genial legends of Christian saints and benefactors, nor the purification and hallowing of pagan superstitions, nor the gladdening laughter of gleeful children.

The little child has the first claim to consideration while we linger in Christmas. Francis Thompson, in daring contrast to the habitual aloofness of English poets dealing with sacred subjects, ventured upon tender and startling intimacy in his poem entitled "Little Jesus." He said:

Little Jesus, wast Thou shy
Once and just so small as I?
And what did it feel like to be
Out of heaven and just like me?

Didst Thou sometimes think of there
And ask where all the angels were?
I should think that I would cry
For my house all made of sky;
I would look about the air
And wonder where my angels were.
And at waking 'twould distress me—
Not an angel there to dress me.
Hadst Thou ever any toys,
Like us little girls and boys?
And didst Thou play in heaven with all
The angels that were not too tall.
With stars for marbles? Did the things
Play "Can you see me?" thro' their wings?
And did Thy mother let Thee spoil
Thy robes with playing on our soil?
How nice to have them always new
In heaven, because 'twas quite clean blue!

Didst Thou kneel at night to pray
And didst Thou join Thy hands this way?
And did they tire sometimes, being young,
And make the prayer seem very long?
And dost Thou like it best that we Should join our hands to pray to Thee?
I used to think, before I knew,
The prayer not said unless we do.
And did Thy mother at the night
Kiss Thee and fold the clothes in right?
And didst Thou feel quite good in bed—
Kissed and sweet and Thy prayers said?

Thou canst not have forgotten all
That it feels like to be small;
And Thou knowst I cannot pray
To Thee in my father's way.
When Thou wast so little, say,
Could'st Thou talk Thy father's way?

So, a little child, come down
And hear a child's tongue like Thine own:
Take me by the hand and walk,
And listen to my baby-talk.
To Thy Father show my prayer
(He will look, Thou art so fair).
And say, "O Father, I, Thy Son,
Bring the prayer of a little one."

And He will smile that children's tongue
Has not changed since Thou wast young.

Rose Terry Cooke puts it thus: "Here comes Father Christmas with sound of fife and drum! With mistletoe about his brow full merrily he comes." Shakespeare had reported that some say that against "that season coming wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated the bird of dawning singeth all night long. No spirit can walk abroad. The nights are wholesome. No planet strikes. No fairy talks. No witch hath power to charm, so hallowed and so gracious is the time!"

Saint Nicholas, whose Dutch name of Saint Nicolaes or San-Claas has become Santa Claus, stands out from the holy host as the saint of Christmas. He is the pious bishop of Ancyra, now known as Angora or Enguri, or of Myra, who gave dowries to poor girls, restored some murdered school-boys to life and became the particular patron and saint of children. He is the French child's great and good benefactor, bringing bonbons for the good and rods for the naughty. In Germany he acts as advance agent for the Christ-child, investigating the children's behavior and promising rewards that Kriss Kringle (this term being a corruption of the German compound Christkindlein) brings at Christmas. In Holland the character given to Santa Claus is colored by folklore about Odin or "Old Nick," and at New York, after it became English instead of Dutch, the features of the children's festival that was held on December 6th were transferred to Christmas, or the 25th of December. So lately, even, as 1850 conservative Dutch families at New York observed Saint Nicholas's Day instead of Christmas Day, but gradually the latter became the children's festival, Saint Nicholas nevertheless retaining his ascendancy. In the lands of continental Europe, Christmas means merely the day on which the Christ is considered to have been born, but in America observance of the dear day centers upon Saint Nicholas and his gifts. The reindeer represents the steed descended from Sleipner, Odin's horse, on which Santa Claus rides through Holland. The Christmas tree, however, is German. Scandinavian mythology describes this tree as "the service-tree" that sprang from the blood-drenched soil where two lovers had been slain. On certain nights of Christmas-tide mysterious lights that no wind could extinguish flamed in the branches of "the service-tree," a feature suspiciously suggestive of the northern lights. Germans ascribe the origin of the custom of having a Christmas-tree to Luther. He was trying to describe to his children the beauty of a snow-covered forest under a glittering sky sparkling with stars. Accordingly, he betook himself to the garden, cut down a little fir, brought it to the nursery, put candles on its boughs and lighted the tapers. The custom maintained itself along the Rhine for two centuries, spread suddenly through the whole of Germany about 1800, and had half a century later spread over Europe and the United States.

It is entertaining to see what a big boy Luther was at heart. He so delighted in Christmas and so dearly loved children, that he wrote this carol expressly for them:

Good news from heaven the angels bring
Glad tidings to the earth they sing;
To us this day a child is given
To crown us with the joy of heaven!

All hail, Thou noble Guest, this morn,
Whose love did not the sinner scorn!
In my distress Thou cam'st to me;
What thanks shall I return to Thee?

Ah, dearest Jesus, holy Child,
Make Thee a bed soft, undefiled,
Within my heart, that it may be
A quiet chamber kept for Thee!

Praise God upon His heavenly throne,
Who gave to us His only son.
For this His hosts on joyous wing
A blest new year of mercy sing.

This, then, as Alexander Smith described it in "Dreamthorp," is Christmas: "Everything is silent. Through the wintry sunshine the bells rang from the tower of the church. Villagers trooped up the walk in their best dresses and faces. The clerk read the beautiful prayers that seem so much more beautiful at Christmas. The feeling that at this time breaks the barriers which birth, custom or wealth rears between man and man strikes down the barrier of time between the worshiper to-day and the worshippers at rest in the grave. On such a day, bearing these prayers, we feel kinship with the generations devout that heard them long ago. The clergyman, whose life has been as full of kindly deeds as autumn's field with wheaten ears, reads in that silvery voice which is sweeter than music those chapters which deal with the Saviour's birth. Everyone is familiar with the story, but that day it seemed quite new to all. Then the service sent us home to what roast-beef and plum-pudding slender means permit; to gatherings around cheery fires; to half-happy, half-sad recollections of the dead and the absent."

When my fire reaches a size and warmth adequate to Christmas, we indulge in "Dreamthorp." It is a book of the heart, and something in it strikes the chord of kinship. It is a palimpsest or twice-written manuscript whose original thought gains new sweetness from the blessed memories that overlie it. The volume opens of itself to the essay on Christmas, and this leads to Milton's marvelous hymn about the birth of Jesus. The prelude declares:

"This is the happy morn
Wherein the Son of heaven's eternal King,
Of wedded maid and virgin mother born,
Our great redemption from above did bring.
O heavenly muse, shall not thy sacred vein
Afford a present to the infant God?
See how from far, upon the eastern road,
The startled magi haste with odors sweet! . . .
Join thou thy voice unto the angel choir
From out His secret altar touched with hallowed fire.
It was the winter wild
While the heaven-born child,
All meanly wrapt in the rude manger lies,
Nature in awe to Him had doffed her gaudy trim. . . .
But He, her fears to cease,
Sent down the meek-eyed peace.
Waving wide her myrtle-wand,
She strikes a universal peace.
No war, no battle's sound,
Was heard the world around. . . .
Kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they knew their sovran Lord were by.
The winds, with wonder whist,
Smoothly the waters kissed.
The stars with deep amaze
Stand fixed in steadfast gaze.
Such music sweet their hearts and ears did greet
As never was by mortal finger struck;
Such music as, 'tis said,
Before was never made
But when of old the sons of morning sang.
Ring out, ye crystal spheres!
For, if such holy song enwrap our fancy long,
Time will run back and fetch the age of gold.
Yea, truth and justice then
Will down return to men."

No man since Luke has better than Dickens uttered the soul and heart of Christmas. In "A Christmas Carol" he sweetly and reverently wrote:

"I have always thought of Christmas—apart from the veneration due to its sacred name and origin, if anything belonging to it can be apart from that—as a good time: a kind, forgiving, charitable time: the only time in the long year when men seem by one consent to open their shut hearts freely and think of people below them as if they really were fellow-passengers—not another race bound on other journeys. Though it has never put gold or silver into my pocket, it has done me good and will do me good. God bless it!"

Amen! and Merry Christmas to each and all of you!

The Yoke of Jesus

THERE is no doubt that every human life has a great burden to carry, nor does it grow less as life becomes more serious, but rather greater. The only true help must come from within, from the adjustment of the soul to its task. It is this adjustment that is meant by the yoke—the yoke is that by which the bearer relates himself to the burden. If the yoke is an easy one, the burden becomes comparatively light, whereas if the yoke is irksome, a much lighter burden hurts and wounds and is a constant irritation.

There are two burdens which every man must carry, if he is to live a true man's life at all—the burden of forming character, and the burden of social duty. In addition to these, many lives are heavily laden with sorrows, with disappointments, with troubles of various kinds. Some, in these latter respects, are more heavily burdened than others, but very few, if any, entirely escape them. It is of the utmost moment that we should be adjusted to these burdens, so as not to be crushed by them. As we watch the ways of men we see how marvelously some people carry their burdens, and how utterly incompetent others are, even in less difficult circumstances. The difference is a difference of adjustment. Jesus was wishful to teach men how to carry life's burdens.

Think, first, of the burden of forming personal character. As soon as man becomes conscious of his moral nature he knows this burden is laid upon him. With a mixed nature, with an inheritance which is still a factor in his constitution, with a germ of divine life in him which is ever struggling up through earth to the light of God's kingdom, man has definitely to undertake the culture of his moral and spiritual nature. Many try to shirk it, but that involves surrender of manhood. The true life must undertake it. Jesus himself had to bear this burden, as the story of the Temptation in the Wilderness proves. The yoke by which He related Himself to it was the belief that the burden was the will of God for Him. He thought of it in that way, and the thought contained the promise that His Father would be with Him in the struggle. Upon that yoke of faith in the goodness and the help of His Father, He placed this burden of character-forming.

It is when men face it without this yoke that they fall into despair. They weary of the struggle, they give up the quest. To perfect character is too toilsome an effort. They may have formed habits which they know they ought to break and feel they cannot; the moral urge meets with so much opposition that it is beaten back. And then the moral nature itself appears to them as an enigma. All this is changed if we can learn from Jesus that the burden of personal character-making is laid upon each one of us by God, and that God is with us in the bearing of the burden. We must come with all our faults and failings and temptations and lay them down on the faith that God will help us through. If we do this there are no temptations that cannot be overcome, no evil habits that cannot be broken, no bondage from which we cannot escape, no past that can hold us down, no devil that can keep us captive.

To be always aware that the resources of the Infinite Life are open to us in the realization of character is to find the burden light. Think, again, of the burden of social duty. The yoke by which Jesus adjusted Himself to this burden was that of an intense realization of His oneness with humanity, and a true, genuine all-pervading love. It is only with such an equipment that we can face the ever-growing demands of social duty in our age. We have got to abolish the difference between villadom and slumdom, to bring the denizens of darkness out into the light, to make the weak strong, and teach the ignorant and protect the innocent. Large numbers are unable to adjust themselves to this duty. When it means curtailment of privilege or luxury or leisure, many fight against it. But it is not to be shirked, being a vital issue; if we are to save our civilization, this burden must be carried. The yoke of Christ is the only thing that will make it light. We need to be meek and lowly of heart ourselves. If we strike towards the world an attitude of personal expectation and attitude of demand for special personal privileges and advantages, we are setting about living in the wrong way. Lowliness of heart of the Jesus-kind means willingness to accept service as our portion and the ability to find in service our joy.

What Jesus did for men, and what He bore for them, however heavy it may appear to a spectator, was not really heavy to Him because He loved the doing of it, because His life was identified with the lives of others. A story is told of a little girl in China who was carrying her big baby brother on her back. When somebody said to her that the burden was too heavy for so small a child, the girl replied: "This is not a burden, it is my brother." The point of view made all the difference. If we have a strong volume of love in our hearts, the service of humanity will be gladly undertaken. Out on the wider fields of human service we want men and women to-day filled with the love that Jesus had for men, so that the work which has to be done may be done without a feeling of irksomeness or secret rebellion, but with a gladness of heart and with the joy of God.

Never in any age was the task of social duty so vast as it is to-day, and it is destined to grow larger. The old prophecy that God will wipe away all tears from the eyes of His people is to be largely fulfilled on earth through the service of man to man, not merely in some after-life. It is for us to be wiping away the tears now, to be lifting the bowed hearts of men, helping them with their burdens, and thus leading the world into the pathways of the light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

Think, again, of those other burdens which are very often given us to bear, the burdens of disappointment, broken hopes, of defeated plans, of irksome conditions, of circumstances which we cannot change, but in which we must nevertheless realize our best selves or fatally fail. In such circumstances some people sink into discontent and futile rebellion against life. Others take hold of these things at the other end and make them serve the very purposes of character. They are able to regard them as opportunities for new conquests, and so they turn out to be enrichments of character. That was Christ's way, and the sooner we can make it ours, the better. Through the burdensome and troublesome things of life, a most wonderful victory comes to any man, if he can take the right point of view in regard to them, and put himself in the right attitude.

In Evelyn Underhill's poem, "La Cathedrale Engloutie," the builder, when his great cathedral has been engulfed by the flood, asks:

"Shall I complain
In this my bitter fate?
Cry out against the smart?"

E D I T O R I A L

In his cathedral he had made an altar of God's pain; he had tried to imitate in masonry the secret process by which God is forever giving Himself in the great world; shall he forget the truth he was trying to portray in his altar, now that he is disappointed? No, he sees that it is in the most utter sacrifice that would spend all its hoarded loveliness God finds the way to extend the conquest of the spirit. So to the bleak altar he will bring his gifts, and that which he has intended to lift up priest-like to heaven in adoration of the everlasting Beauty, he will now give that it may leaven the deep corruption of the ocean floor. What if his high-towering dream had not been set above the flood? Was not the Master-Builder confiding to him the heavenly task of failure, thus to hide within his rebel heart the saving Rood? That was the homeward-turning thought that, from the slime of disappointment, shot up like a spire to seek the stars.

"Lo, in the scars
Of this your overthrow
See, saith His Voice, and know
The Brand divine
By which I mark those builders who are Mine."

It was his behavior in disappointment that marked him as a divine builder. We can learn to give up the things we love most in order to do saving work in greater depths of life. If we realize our home in God, and fill our hearts at that fountain we shall carry strength into what we have to do and what we have to suffer. Then success and failure, joy and sorrow will be divine. T. R. W.

The Federal Council at Columbus

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

THE annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America attracted an unusually large number of delegates to Columbus. The Columbus Council of Churches and the Ohio State Council of Churches were joint hosts of the committee and outdid all former hosts in hospitality and in thoroughness of preparation. They had interested the whole city and state in the coming of the distinguished delegates and had awakened the press—a hard thing to do—that the official representatives of American Protestantism were in their midst. The result was an unusually large attendance of citizens at the meetings and an unusually large space in the Ohio papers.

The Council got additional public attention through an address by Fred B. Smith on Tuesday evening at a meeting of secretaries of Ohio councils held preliminary to the Federal Council gathering. The public was invited and got some good advice—better than the most sanguine expected. Mr. Smith went straight to the point and told them that this whole Fundamentalist controversy was wicked at a time when the suffering world needed the united ministry of the Church; that all over the country ministers were mumbling over platitudes meaningless to themselves and everybody else, instead of preaching a gospel; that the day had gone by forever for emphasizing denominationalism, and the only way we were going to convince the man in the street that the Church was doing anything was by a Church where all communions were working together. "I refuse to believe that the Holy Spirit created eighteen different kinds of Methodist churches, thirteen kinds of Presbyterian, fourteen kinds of Baptist. If He did, He is in a pretty small business." Many of the leaders of the churches here to attend the Council heard Mr. Smith, and to say that he set them thinking is to characterize the effect of his address very mildly. It served another good purpose. It tuned up all the sessions of the Federal Council to the note of reality. Practically every address and discussion turned on the immediate tasks of American Protestantism. While there was frequent reference to the theological controversy now going on in the Church, there was no attempt to drag it in as an issue. On the other hand, when reference was made to it, it was always to maintain that men of every shade of theological opinion could work together harmoniously for the Kingdom of God.

I am not altogether sure that this is true. I am not sure that I could work for the Kingdom of God in co-operation with some of the Fundamentalists who have been spending the last week in Dr. Straton's church, New York. I followed their speeches with much interest and their conception of the mission of the Church is so different from mine that we have little common work to do. I believe the Church is in the world to make a Christian civilization and to persuade men to live under the dominance of the Lord. They seemed to believe that the Church is in the world to save men out of the world, to defend certain interpretations of doctrine and the Bible, to prohibit certain habits they name un-Christian, to prepare men for the bodily return of Christ, and to anathematize all who do not literally accept their interpretations of the Church, the Bible and the Faith. I can work harmoniously with men of every shade of theological opinion for the Kingdom of God, as I am doing every day, but I cannot work with men who have no interest in the Kingdom of God and who spend their time attacking everybody, even the most devout and consecrated Christians who do not see eye to eye with them.

Thus, co-operation became the theme of all the meetings. Rev. John M. Moore, of Brooklyn, chairman of the Administrative Committee, gave a masterly survey of the co-operative movement in America during 1923, and it was a good thing to have it put before the gathering because it was so encouraging. It was good to find that there are so many men who hold quite different theological opinions who can rise up to a common plane of endeavor, and that there are so many communions that can do the same. The Wednesday afternoon session was devoted to the same theme of co-operation, only it was illustrated by the success in evangelism and community organization. The Federal Council is to be congratulated on having such a man as Dr. Charles L. Goodell at the head of its Evangelistic Commission. A great preacher of the Gospel, he is also a great inspirer of the churches to more zealous preaching of the Evangel. Many a pulpit is preaching a more intimate Gospel with the note of direct appeal in it because of the work he is doing. As to the movement for community organization, everybody present was surprised to hear what progress was being made in the organization of local church councils (formerly called local federations), and of the renewed life and increased activities of those already established. Fred B. Smith and Dr. Roy B. Guild are giving all their time to this work and now Harry Holmes, of England, who has been a perfect genius in co-operative movements, has been added to the force and will devote himself, as a sort of field director, to the smaller communities. Mr. Holmes was welcomed with great cordiality and made a very happy impression upon the Council.

The Wednesday evening session was devoted to the consideration of how the Federal Council could be of largest service in helping the Church to fulfil its social mission. As this discussion went on it must have seemed a happy coincidence to many that it was being held not more than a hundred feet from the pulpit where the social gospel received its first impulse in America. For it was Washington Gladden who, with Josiah Strong, was its greatest prophet. Now the application of the Gospel to the economic, industrial, political and international spheres is one of the chief concerns of the Church and receives always chief consideration in its congresses. The Commission on Social Service is one of the most active groups in the Federal Council and has done much to stimulate this widespread interest in the social gospel. I can remember when such a meeting as that held Wednesday night would have been sparsely attended and coldly received. It was one of the most enthusiastic sessions of this present congress. At the Federal Council's gatherings nothing more is heard of conflict between personal salvation and the redemption of society. There is no conflict, and Wednesday night's session brought this out most strikingly.

On Thursday morning the deliberations took a new turn and became very intimate. The Federal Council asked the leaders of the denominations to say frankly what changes they would suggest in the work of the Council and what enlargement of its program they would recommend. The interesting thing was that the delegates were so enthusiastic over the great work the Council was doing for the churches that they had practically nothing to recommend, except that the Council continue along its present lines of activity, expanding its program as much as possible. The outstanding feature of this session, perhaps of all the sessions for that matter, was Dr. Robert E. Speer's address on what the Council needs from the denominations in order to be able to serve them more adequately. It was one of the most statesman-like addresses of recent years and should be distributed by the thousands, especially among those communions which are hesitant in their co-operation with the other churches, and among those communions which remain outside the Council because of their distrust of the other communions. It was an irenic, brotherly appeal to the communions to trust each other more and for the individuals holding divergent theological attitudes also to trust each other more.

The Thursday meetings were all significant as showing how the Federal Council is more and more touching every sphere of our national life. Thus, in the afternoon, Dr. George E. Haynes and others told what the Council was doing to solve the race problem in America; Dr. William Adams Brown earnestly called for a more thorough and united study by the various communions on the meaning of Christianity for our whole contemporary life; in the evening Fred B. Smith, Dr. Daniel A. Poling and Senator Ferris of Michigan spoke on Christian Citizenship.

The final sessions on Friday were devoted entirely to the consideration of the obligation of the Christian churches of America to help the European churches in their impoverishment and weakness; to establish the most brotherly relations possible with China, Japan and Latin America; to care for the hungry refugees of Asia Minor and Greece; to develop larger fellowship with the Eastern churches; to make America take her part in helping to solve the great world problems and take her rightful place in the family of nations. There should be a most hearty response to the pleas made by Drs. Macfarland and Goodrich for the Central Bureau for the Relief of the Evangelical Churches of Europe. It was set up last year by the Federal Council and some of the European federations which met in Copenhagen. It now has an office at Zurich, Dr. Adolf Kellar is giving his full time as European secretary and Dr. Chauncey L. Goodrich, lately of the American church in Paris, has been made American secretary and has arrived in America and begun his work. This bureau has a vast field of usefulness, not only in co-ordinating the work of the various denominations assisting the European churches, but in stimulating the American churches to much larger gifts.

A word should be said about the session devoted to closer fellowship with the Eastern churches. Such a session possessed great significance because even the meeting together of the two groups is a new thing in history. If I mistake not, the first time representatives of the great Eastern Church and of the Western churches sat in council together was only three years ago at a meeting in Geneva called by the Federal Council to consider a world conference on the life and work of the churches, and also in the meeting of the World Conference on Faith and Order held a week later. Since then fellowship has been more and more common in Europe and in America. Four of the archbishops were present in Columbus and took part in the meetings, and the responses they made to the addresses of Drs. Montgomery and Emhardt were of a most cordial nature. All this would have been unthought of ten years ago. The addresses by Drs. Willet, Gulick, McDonald and Lynch on the American Churches and International Life naturally centered on the immediate task of getting America into the World Court. The Council was unanimous in this regard and expressed itself in no uncertain terms in resolutions which will be printed in THE CHRISTIAN WORK next week.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

Columbus, Ohio, Dec. 15, 1923.

Bonar Law was the son of a Presbyterian minister; Stanley Baldwin, the present Premier, is the grandson of a Methodist minister. On his mother's side, Mr. Stanley Baldwin comes of a gifted family. His great-great-grandfather, a Macdonald, settled in Ireland after the defeat of the Highland clans on Culloden Moor. His great-grandfather, on the direct invitation of Wesley, entered the Methodist ministry, his grandfather was also a Methodist minister, and so is his uncle, the Rev. Frederick W. Macdonald. Of his mother's sisters, one became Lady Burne-Jones, another Lady Poynter, while a third was the mother of Rudyard Kipling. There is a good deal in family, after all.

Mr. Shibusawa, the President of the League of Nations Association of Japan, in a letter of thanks to the people of America, tells us how many millions of books in the libraries of Japan were destroyed and wonders whether the millions of American people who have books could not do something to replace those which were lost in Japan. That makes another Christmas suggestion.

THE OBSERVER

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

The Books of 1923 I Have Liked Best

IN TWO PARTS—PART I.

I HAVE received several letters asking, in substance, what were the best books published in 1923. I hesitate to answer that question, because no one man should presume to set himself up as judge on such a question. A symposium on that question would be very interesting and I am going to ask Mr. Van Dyke, our Literary Editor, to write several eminent men in various professions as to which is the best book of 1923. The answers ought to be very interesting. But I did receive a letter yesterday asking me what book I, myself, had enjoyed most in 1923 and suggesting that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK would probably enjoy reading the answer as much as the writer of the letter. If anyone is interested it will be rather pleasant to recall the books which impressed me most, although if I enjoy a book well enough to remember it I go back to it again continually. There are certain books, among them some novels, that I read through every year.

I will take two numbers of the Observer for this purpose, remembering to-day the books dealing with religious thought and problems of the time and reserving next week for the biographies and novels. I am perfectly frank in saying that, to my mind, the most original and stimulating book I have read this year is James Harvey Robinson's "The Mind in the Making" (Harper's). Professor Robinson makes history an absolutely new thing. It is not man's deeds that are real history: it is his thoughts, opinions, principles of conduct, ideals, concepts. Every page of this book sets my mind whirling. Is this true or not, I was continually asking myself. I wanted to preach fifty sermons before I was through with the book, so stimulating and challenging is it. The fundamental thesis is that men are slaves to tradition, and when they do think beyond the shackles of the past they dare not break those shackles and move out up to where their thoughts have gone. The prophets, the liberators are those who dared keep up with their thoughts. "Tradition and Progress," by Gilbert Murray (Houghton, Mifflin Company), is as charming as a picture in the gallery, or a symphony. It combines pure Hellenistic beauty of thought with beauty of style. I think it is generally conceded that Professor Murray is one of the best writers of English as well as one of the most original of thinkers. While several of the remarkable essays deal with the contributions of the ancient Greek thought to our own day, most of them are thoughts on contemporary life by one who is not only the foremost Greek scholar of to-day, but who is also one of our best philosophic minds. It is hard to surpass for pure beauty of English and suggestive thought such chapters as "The Religion of a Man of Letters," "Literature as Revelation," "The Soul as It Is and How to Deal with It," and "The National Ideals." I wish some of our great universities would insist on Oxford sharing with us this great and charming man for a year.

Early in the year "The Rising Tide of Faith" (Fleming H. Revell Company) fell into my hands. I turned to it with interest because I saw that its author, the young Bishop of Pretoria, South Africa, was the son of my friend, the great Bishop Talbot of Winchester. I had heard of this brilliant young son. I found "The Rising Tide of Faith" exceedingly interesting, because it was an endeavor, and a most successful one, to restate Christian doctrines for the man in the street, and show their reasonableness. As a matter of fact, the chapters first appeared in a daily newspaper and were read by thousands. They might well have been, for they have all the directness and intimacy of a modern daily journal. The Christian doctrines are as profound and big as the sun, but they are just as simple, too, as is the sunlight. Only two Sundays ago I heard a preacher telling his congregation to read this book.

I read everything Dean Inge writes as religiously as I read our President's message. One has simply got to know what he is saying and thinking. He is the Dean Swift of our time. The second volume of "Outspoken Essays" (Longmans) is not only as brilliant and suggestive as the first, but is of special significance because it contains the Dean's confession of faith—given here because of repeated calls upon him to state what he believes and why. It is one of the most remarkable documents of a generation and worthy of very careful study, because, perhaps, there is no man living who is quite so responsive to certain tendencies of our time as Dean Inge, nor one who is voicing them as is he.

Last spring I heard that the Houghton Mifflin Company were going to publish the present Pope's account of his climbs in the high Alps. I knew that Achille Ratti was a famous climber and a prominent member of the Alpine Club, but I did not know what a fearless and intrepid soul he was until I read his book, "Climbs on Alpine Peaks." The chapter describing the ascent of Monte Rosa from the Italian side, the two nights spent on the narrow ledges of the awful precipices, miles above the earth, amidst ice and snow and biting winds and falling rocks, the descent on the Swiss side, is one of the most thrilling chapters of adventure I ever read.

Early in the summer, Irving Fisher's "League or War" appeared (Harper and Brothers), and I was dazzled by the, what I might call, "inevitability" of the argument, that the future is either going to be 1914's and worse, recurring until the world has committed suicide, or such a combination of nations working together in mutual co-operation for goodwill. The League means order and peace: national isolation means war and anarchy: co-operation means Christ: isolation means chaos. It is a really great piece of argument—and how the dedication lingers in one's mind, "To the memory of my daughter Margaret, one of the many million radiant young souls torn from this earth by the World War!"

While on this subject of War and Peace, another book made a great impression on me, as I know it has on many other readers. (The New York "Times" devoted much space to it.) "The Reformation of War," by Colonel J. F. C. Fuller, author of "Training Soldiers for War" (E. P. Dutton and Company). I had cold shivers from the first page of the preface to the end, and yet I had to read. I could not believe I was reading a book of this century or age, but I am afraid Colonel Fuller is expressing feelings widely held. The book is an exhaustive treatise on the art of future warfare. Gas is to be the great weapon and will wipe out whole cities easily. But the book is based on certain fundamental convictions, and these made my blood boil as I read—and yet the nations are all acting as though they were the true ones. Let me quote a few lines and then see if you do not feel you ought to read a book whose every page bristles with such sentences: "I intend inquiring into the nature of future warfare, not because I love or hate war, but because I believe that war is of the inevitable, and that the greatest of all heresies and delusions concerning it is to suppose that the Great War of 1914-1918 is the last of all wars. That it may be the last of its kind I full-heartedly agree to, so much so that I believe the nature of the next war will be totally different from the last; so different that, even if great nations go to war in 1950, the recent war will appear to those not far distant fighters as a struggle between barbaric hordes, a saurian contest; not medieval, but primeval, archaic, a turmoil, which in the history of the evolution of warfare is more distant from that day than the Marne was from Marathon."

Two or three weeks ago I devoted this page to a running survey of Professor William Lyon Phelps's recent book, "As I Like It" (Scribner's). I have greatly enjoyed Professor Phelps's brilliant comment upon Letters, Art, Music, the Drama, Manners, Religion, Society—everything. Perhaps one reason is because I find myself so often in agreement with him; but it is not that so much as a certain sanity that many of our present-day critics lack. Professor Phelps preserves the Puritan sense of spiritual value with an appreciation of the ebullient spirit of joy and freedom that possesses the modern world. The one thing the world needs to be freed from, to-day, is the faddist, and the ultra-conservative, and ultra-liberal, who keep us in constant agitation and ferment to no purpose.

The last two books I shall mention appeared together just this fall—"God's Freemen: A Tract for the Times" and "Freedom and the College." I read them through with one sitting for each. I could not put either one of them down until I had finished. "God's Freemen" (The Pilgrim Press) is by Professor Nathaniel Micklen, of Selly Oak Colleges (England). He is the author of the very successful book, "The Galilean." In "God's Freemen" he makes Erasmus, Luther, Calvin, Baxter and many others of the Humanists and Puritans not only live again, but especially shows what is of permanent value in their message and what they mean for to-day. But I do not know a more charming writer than Dr. Micklen or one who has greater capacity to make the sages and heroes "live" again. The book is really fascinating. Naturally, I turned to Dr. Meiklejohn's "Freedom and the College" (The Century Company) with intense interest, for I supposed that, coming so soon after his forced resignation from Amherst College, it would in a sense be an Apologia. This it is. It contains his famous article from the September "Century," "To Whom Are We Responsible?" as well as the final baccalaureate address which attracted so much attention. But the most interesting chapter is "The Theory of the Liberal College" his inaugural address as President of Amherst, delivered in 1912. Here one finds Dr. Meiklejohn's fundamental theories of education. And it is all wonderfully interesting—so interesting that one, who has any real interest in education, turns every page in a flurry of expectation. Furthermore, Dr. Meiklejohn knows how to write.

I have been very personal and frank in this letter, but I was asked to be. Perhaps many of my readers will wonder that I liked these particular books and not others which they liked. I should be glad to hear from any such, and to know which books they enjoyed most, and why.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Our Star: a Christmas Sermon

By Rev. E. Griffith-Jones, D.D.

Principal of the United College, Bradford

[Professor Griffith-Jones has been principal and professor of Dogmatics, Apologetics, Homiletics and Practical Theology at the Yorkshire Independent College, England, since 1907. He was chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales in 1918-1919.]

"Where is He that is born King of the Jews? For we have seen His star in the East and are come to worship Him."—Matthew 2:2.

THE critics have been very busy recently with the stories clustering round the birth of Jesus, and many who cling firmly to the fact of the Incarnation find it hard not to relegate these charming narratives to the region of myth—or at least of legend. This is not the place nor this the time to enter on this vexed and difficult question. Whether historical or not, these stories are full of meaning; they are at least a part of the homage of the imagination of the early Church to the memory of her Lord; they are a part of the "Glory of the Son." He was the fulfillment of all the hopes that clustered round the thoughts of the coming Deliverer. In the heart-throbs of the mother, in the spiritual outlook of the devout souls who waited in the Temple, or fed their sheep on the hill-slopes, in the strivings for an unknown ideal among the wise and reverent of all nations, there was a great and glorious expectancy, and He it was who satisfied and surpassed all these yearnings of the spirits of men.

"We have seen His star!" We must betake ourselves to a very different world of thought from our own in order to enter into the meaning of such a word as this. We must think of a time when men, looking into the mystery of the midnight sky, found in the language of those glowing orbs a visible sign of the influence of unseen spirits on human life. Every man had his star, whose influence guided and controlled and determined his life on earth. We have ceased to believe in astrological destinies to-day; the "sweet influences of the Pleiades" are to us only another name for the beauty of their shining, and we go our way in peace, caring nothing for the vaticinations of the quacks who forecast our future from the accidents of our nativity. Yet every man has his "star." Jesus had His star. You have your star. I have my star. Something grows upon us like a point of light out of the Unseen. Our life is not all earth-bound. Its center is beyond the starry systems of the sky. God's thought and purpose for you and me is our star; our ideal destiny is our star; anything in us that recognizes a heavenly influence, that acknowledges a celestial destiny, that links us with the power and grace of our Maker and Redeemer, is our star. Our star is the symbol that for each of us there is heavenly work to do on earth and a heavenly crown to gain when earth's journeyings are done.

I love to think of those star-led men in this sweet story wending their way to the cradle of the Infant Christ. They stand for all the devout and sensitive spirits who gaze upwards for the guiding light of their life, and who, while their toil-worn bodies are on earth, have their thoughts and their conversation in heaven. They stand for the men and women who see visions and dream dreams, but who are not content with seeing and dreaming, but take toilsome journeys and fulfil lowly tasks on their way to the realization of their dreams. It is a great thing to look at beautiful things from afar, to be filled with stirring ideals, to dream great dreams. But if our stars lead us to nothing? Or if we refuse to follow? Or if, following, we grow tired of the weary journey, and turn our back on the beckoning light? Then we shall miss our Christ, and our eyes shall not see His salvation. It is those who seek who find; it is those who strive after great things who attain; it is those who, when their star is risen upon them, follow it across rocky deserts and sandy plains, nothing doubting, who come at last to Bethlehem and the Holy Babe.

Or shall I say that this star of ours stands for all the gracious illusions of life, which lead us to our true realities? God has that way with men. He does not plant us face to face with life's ultimate realities at the start. He lures us on; He sets guiding lights in our sky; life is full of pointing hands and beckoning fingers. It is the only way with creatures such as we are, who can value no realities except they come to us after long waiting, and many efforts, and bitter disappointments. Life is thus a tissue of illusions, but they are illusions on the way to realities. The pathway to truth is through deserts of make-believe, and across mountains of error, and over salt seas of uncertainty and fear. Yet it is when we cross these deserts and mountains and seas that we are able to recognize and value truth when we see it, and to offer our gold and frankincense and myrrh at its shrine.

How the path to knowledge has been beset by illusions! Century by century the thirst for scientific truth has been tormenting the hearts of the wise and the teachable, and their way, so far, has been from one illusion to another, and even to-day the wisest of all wise men will tell you that their knowledge of the great cosmos may be only a larger illusion. Does that make them give up the quest? Some, indeed, give it up and cry with mocking Pilate, "What is truth?" Others halt doubtingly and become scientific sceptics. But still the star leads on, breaking now and again through scattering clouds and over storm-swept seas; and still the chosen spirits follow its lead, feeling sure that each headland takes them nearer to port, and that every discarded system and explanation is a step towards God's ultimate truth.

How the pathway of love is beset with illusions! What sweet imaginings cluster round the cradle! Every mother thinks her son the sweetest infant God ever made, and she paints her starry picture of what greatness will some day be his, when he has come to his own. We smile at each fond anticipation, and straightway fall into the same charmed circle of illusion ourselves. Nay, let the young mother dream her dreams as she croons her lullabies over her darling, and forbid her not. That child may break her heart some day; meanwhile, the sweet illusion of motherhood makes hardship pleasant and dreary tasks a labor of delight and transforms the prose of early training into the poetry of loving service. So does God set a star in the mothers' sky, and in the sky of all who love. It shines over all troubled waters; it bejewels nights of disappointment and failure and the long darkness of waiting; it leads on ever towards the hour of banquet and of song.

And what illusions have beset the path of religion! Ever do we see the star shining afar with eager hearts uplifted to it, and view the long journey towards the goal. Abraham saw Christ's star, and was "glad." We can see it shining in the sky of the "Old Dispensation" from point to point, and moving across the centuries through the troubled hours of that long night of waiting which beset the people of God. Lawgiver and prophet, psalmist and seer, saw that star and followed it on till they fell exhausted, but with their faces towards the light. "These all died, not having received the promises; but having seen them and greeted them from afar." They died in faith. There is to me nothing in history more moving and impressive than this upward and forward look of Israel; this obstinate religious expectancy; this unconquerable hope of the coming Deliverer, which throbs and pulses through the Old Testament. "But we had trusted that it had been He that should have redeemed Israel." What a world of pathos this word suggests of the age-long hope which kept the better life of the nation aflame when all else was dark and despairing. Ever the Star of Bethlehem. Over wide deserts of time, across the long centuries of oppression, failure and despair shone that star, and here and there among the generations there were always eyes lifted up to "greet it from afar."

We speak of Christ as though He had suddenly come in the reign of Herod. He had always been coming. There must be a shadow-Christ in the Old Testament before there ever could be a real Christ in the cradle of Bethlehem or on the Cross of Calvary. You can see that "shadow-Christ" on almost every page, and it is a shadow that makes bright everything it falls upon. It is a shadow in the heart of which beats a star. Abraham, Moses, David, Amos and Isaiah all saw it, and as the night of misfortune and sorrow fell on the people of Israel, the star glowed more clearly. "And beginning with Moses and all the prophets, He expounded to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself."

So the shadow-Christ melts into the real Christ, and we "beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

For God's stars always lead us to our goal. There are those who say of all the dreams and visions of humanity that they are doomed to disappointment and the sorrow of disillusionment. "God," says Renan, "is a great satirist, who plants in His children's hearts hopes that lead to nothing, ideals that are never to be realized, destinies that cannot by any possibility be fulfilled. Nature cajoles and cheats her offspring and stirs them to great efforts after illusory goals that fly ever onward as they are approached. The wise acknowledge this benign 'trickery,' even while they allow themselves to be deceived by it; the foolish follow without knowing." True, there are "wandering stars" that lead astray, hopes that deceive, ideals that mock us as we follow. But I find in the star that led to the cradle of Jesus the assurance that God's best surpasses all that men have ever dreamed of it. The substance is better than its shadow; the cradle and the Babe within it are worthy of a homage that the star can only faintly suggest. "We have seen His star in the East—far away from here; but we are come here to worship Him." "And when they were come to the house they saw the young Child with Mary His mother, and fell down and worshiped Him: and when they had opened their treasures they presented unto Him gifts: gold, frankincense and myrrh." Happy worshipers who had faithfully followed so far and found Him whom they desired to see; who, indeed, is the Desire of all nations!

God leads us, it is true, through illusions and from one illusion to another, but not that He may land us in final confusion. If we follow the gleam long enough, and far enough, we shall come to the Grail at last. God is not mocked by men who would make shadows as realities; neither does He mock us by making us miss the reality which we would fain read through its shadow. Christ's star is not Himself, but He Himself is where the star finally leads and rests. And though God lead us through circle after circle of illusion, from one desert of expectation to another, there is a time when illusion must cease and faith be swallowed up in its fulfillment. "He that spared not His own son, shall He not with Him freely give us all things?" "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered the heart of man, the things that God hath prepared for them that love Him." Follow your star, brother, and you will reach your Bethlehem!

But what of those who see not their star, or who, seeing it, refuse to follow? The star had shone in the East for all, but only the wise men (and we may be sure they were few as well as wise)—they alone saw it. Perhaps more saw it than followed. There are possibilities both ways. Certain it is, that most men are still either star-gazers and nothing more, or are too busy following "will-o'-the-wisps" on earth to look up into the steadfast heavens for their true star. I fear that it is still the few who are wise enough to discern God's light in their sky, and follow whithersoever it goeth, sure that in the end it will lead to Himself. What men miss who fail to realize that heaven is theirs as well as earth, and God as well as man! The amazing contentment of the world in and with itself is the greatest tragedy of the soul. I am not afraid of the troubled doubter, the sincere sceptic; for such doubt is but faith in eclipse, and out of the darkness any moment the star may shine which will lead them to Christ the Lord. But to the man who keeps his eyes on the ground when God's sky is above him, who eats the husks which the swine devour, forgetful of the Father's house and its outspread feast of love, who makes this life all when "heaven is his for the asking"—what shall we—what can we say of them? Alas! they are doomed to lose the lesser good they seek and fail of the greater good they despise; and so both ways they miss their mark. There is a star for you all, brothers and sisters; my star for me, your star for you—a star for each and all of us. Let us arise and follow our star! It will lead us into strange places, perhaps; over many a craggy height, down into many a deep and shadowed valley, through many a haunted forest; but it will ever be on towards the goal of our desire, towards the divine fulfillments of our life. Perhaps, having followed it far, we may for a time miss the star, because we have wandered out of its way, as did the wise men when they turned towards Jerusalem. But as they once more saw the star, when they turned towards Bethlehem, and rejoiced with exceeding great joy, so we shall recover the power of vision when we tread the lowly path of duty. The good man is often in doubt; he is often a wanderer out of his way; but he has that in him which is never satisfied till at last he bends in lowly homage before Him "whose glory flames from sun and star," and is the fountain-light of all true insight and happy illumination.

Are we following our star? Its light shines only on the path of duty. When these men forsook its guidance and wandered toward Jerusalem, they lost their star; and they only found it when they returned into the true way again and faced towards Bethlehem. It is easy to miss that heavenly radiance. Nearer objects obscure it; earth-born fogs rise and hide its face. Yet when the vision fades, faith must still hold on her way. Let us not faint nor fail because of the length of the journey and the toil and sorrow of the pilgrimage. It is worth while keeping on with lowly tasks when heaven's light shines on our appointed way, and if for a while we have to walk in darkness and cannot see our way, it is still worth while to walk on at a venture, sure that if only our hearts are faithful to the quest the light will soon return and we shall be brought to our heart's desire. We cannot always command the light, but we can always be true to our ideal end. Only those will ultimately fail who lose their way because they have ceased to seek the highest, and "love the darkness because their deeds are evil." God's pilgrims will all find their way home at last.

The recent meeting of the American Child Health Association at Detroit showed the Association to be busy on tasks which gradually are turned over to the public and so become parts of the general work of our local governments. The Association, realizing that only professionally prepared workers can be counted upon to do things effectively, has helped colleges and normal schools organize courses of instruction especially adapted to the needs of a health personnel. It offers fellowships and scholarships to selected doctors and nurses and health instructors. Probably in nothing has its work been more distinctive than in its literature of health, with its adjuncts of posters, primers, cards and alphabets, fascinating and artistic. In the old days, discussion of health was dull reading. The Association has also devised health clowns, health fairies, health plays and health pageants. It has helped to make people realize that we ought to inculcate health habits in young children. The Association also performs a valuable function in scrutinizing experiments in health instruction and frankly appraising them and doing what it can to give them the publicity they may deserve. In the words of Dr. George E. Vincent, president of Rockefeller Foundation, "The American Child Health Association is a fine and inspiring example of sound sentiment under the control of the scientific spirit."

The Archbishop of Jerusalem

By Henry S. Huntington

EIGHTEEN months ago Panteleimon Athanassiades, Greek Orthodox Archbishop of Jerusalem, came to this country to do what he could here to help lift the two million dollar debt on the Jerusalem Patriarchate. That debt, as we all know, threatens its property in Palestine, especially the famous shrines. The shrines, to be sure, may not all be of very special interest to Occidental Christians. Queen Helena, Constantine's mother, learned the site of the Holy Sepulchre by revelation when it had been forgotten, apparently, for a century or two. To be sure, some very eminent archeologists agree with her. But to most of us Occidentals, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is tawdry within—not worshipful. It is Gordon's Calvary, outside the city wall, that reaches the heart.

True, the Church of the Nativity at Bethlehem is far more appealing than the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. But Oriental taste grates on the simpler ideas of the West.

However, in the Holy Land, as everywhere else, it is people who are of supreme interest. The men who lead in the Church in Jerusalem to-day are worth knowing about. They speak in behalf of seventy thousand Christians who have clung to their traditional faith despite five hundred years of Moslem pressure. The very fact that these people clung to their faith proves that they possessed character. Their villages show more prosperity than do those of their Moslem neighbors. They lead in business. On the average in almost every way they excel the Mohammedans among whom they live. If for no other reason, just because he is archbishop of the native church in Jerusalem, Panteleimon is interesting.

But we must hasten to say first of all that Panteleimon is not a native Palestinian at all. The Greek Church all through the old Turkish Empire has proved a means for the Greek government to work its propaganda. The higher ecclesiastics in the Greek Church are not married. That means that they are drawn from monasteries. These monasteries are mostly in Greece. The Greek Church has commonly placed Greeks in the great places in the Church. So dissatisfied were the Palestinian Christians with the predecessor of Panteleimon that they practically drove him out of the city. Then the Greek Church authorities appointed the new man in the hope that his liberal spirit would satisfy the native element. He has pleased them better than did his predecessor, to be sure, but the native Christians have thought that he also favored unduly those born in old Greece. Nevertheless he is Archbishop of Jerusalem and his background and his ideas will have much influence in directing the development of the Palestinian Church in the near future.

Panteleimon is a solidly built man of middle height, some fifty years old. Probably the eighteen months he has spent in this country has had its effect on his dress and appearance. His full iron gray beard is cut fairly short. The typical Greek priest in Palestine and in all the Near East, so far as I know, wears long hair. Archbishop Panteleimon, however, to-day appears as might any man of his station in Europe or America. On informal occasions he wears a frock coat; at public affairs he puts on a robe such as he might wear in Jerusalem and hangs about his neck two gold chains, at the end of one of which hangs a medallion of the Madonna, at the end of the other a great gold cross.

Born at Argos in old Greece, and determining to go into the Church, he resorted to the famous monastery on Mount Athos. There he spent two years reading the fathers of the Church, Polycarp, Origen, Jerome, the whole long list. Later he spent seven years at the Convent of the Holy Cross, outside the walls of Jerusalem. The first four of those years he studied Latin, Greek, mathematics, physics, chemistry, physical geography, the subjects of our high school and college. Like every other student, he had to compose poems in ancient Greek, in hexameters and iambics, and finished the four years with a thesis in Latin and one in ancient Greek. The last three years at the Holy Cross he studied theology and philosophy: rhetoric, ethics and dogmatic, the theology of the fathers, psychology, ancient and modern philosophy, metaphysics, the science of the soul.

Most of those subjects were taught in about the same fashion as they would have been five hundred years ago. But among his teachers one stood out, Chrysostom, who is to-day Metropolitan of Athens. Chrysostom was brought up in Germany. There he had imbibed ideas quite different from the dogmatic notions of his fathers. Christianity, he believed and taught, did not consist in the acceptance of a creed, but consisted in love of one's fellows. Another, Professor Vassilakis, took a similar view. Vassilakis lives and teaches in Paris to-day. Meletios, the dispossessed Patriarch of Constantinople, was a fellow student with Panteleimon. They and some others of the more mature students caught the new idea of Christianity, and accepted it.

For ten years Panteleimon was director of St. Dimitry's Gymnasium (that is high school) at Jerusalem and for two years of a commercial school at Jaffa. At St. Dimitry's he tried to teach the two hundred day pupils and seventy boarders his conception of Christianity. Perhaps some of them caught it. At Jaffa many Moslems and Jews attended the school. One of the Archbishop's main hobbies is music. In his commercial school he organized a band of forty instruments. Its director was a Jewish refugee who had played the bandmaster in Russia.

How does this Archbishop of Jerusalem define Christianity? Speaking for himself and not as a representative of the Orthodox Church he would say, "Christianity is the rule of practical living. It is socialism. Christ was the biggest Socialist. He was the first man who said all men are equal, are brethren. As brothers, they should live in love with one another, because you cannot hate your brother."

So when Panteleimon preached in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, he devoted his sermons almost wholly to the practical side of life. (So at least he felt.) He spent little time on themes of doctrine. He liked to talk about the love of one man for another, for as he says, "If love does not reign in men's hearts, this world is not possible."

But how much can the Greek Church in Palestine carry out these ideas in its relations with other churches? Archbishop Panteleimon believes that a council of the Orthodox Churches through all the East is possible to-day and will indeed soon be a reality. That would include the Orthodox churches of Serbia, Greece, Russia, Bulgaria, Turkey and Palestine. But he does not believe it possible to form a council in Jerusalem which, for instance, included the Armenians, that is the Gregorian Church, and the Protestants. "The differences in nationality and the radical differences in doctrine would prevent it," he says. "The Armenians could not join it because they believe that Christ had one nature, he was only God; but the Orthodox believes in Him as God and Man." So he would find theological fissures which prevented the coming together of the Orthodox Church and the Protestant communions in Palestine. But he agrees that these churches could work together for the common good against the liquor trade or in behalf of cleaner moral conditions.

The first gift for the preservation of the Holy Places came from a Jew, Nathan Straus, brother of the one-time Ambassador of the United States at Constantinople. The Archbishop would have no objection to having a Jew in the membership of the American Committee in behalf of the Sacred Places. He shrugs his shoulders and says, "It would be rather a good thing, for the Patriarchate always has been friendly toward Jews in Palestine. It exists for the good of the people there and the Jews, being there, come within its goodwill and charity." He adds that his church has never hesitated to render assistance to Moslems, as well as Jews.

To westerners the native Palestinian type of Christianity seems external and formal. "But," he says, "beside the outside symbols the people have a deep faith in Christianity." He goes on to explain, "It is due mostly to their oppression under the Turks for five hundred years that they do not show the fruits of their religion in their outward lives." To the mind of some Levantines, the effect of Islam has entered not only into the every-day lives of the Christians, but into the Church itself. A great deal of the music of the Greek Church is similar to Islamic music. When the Greek Orthodox priest chants his prayers it is almost exactly like the chanting of the Imam. But to return to Panteleimon, he goes on, "You would be surprised to see how Christian life is found in these people. It appears in their love for the stranger within their gates, in their hospitality, in their care for the poor. "To be sure, he would agree that the number of Orthodox who hold such views as his as to what really constitutes Christianity is small. Perhaps two hundred years ago Panteleimon could not have spoken as he does to-day, or even thirty years ago. He would not even have thought then as he does now. But to-day, especially among the educated priests, not a few think just as he, and those laymen who have received their education in the Protestant schools likewise have grown liberal of mind.

As for the presence of the Protestants in Palestine, Panteleimon holds that it is good that they should bring education, but that it is not good that they should separate men from their church—and many of those who become liberal in mind drop out of the Greek Church. Indeed the Protestants in Palestine practically all came from the Greek Church originally. The Roman Catholics do not lose their people so. They have had enough schools so that they could educate their own young people. The Greek Church with a far greater population has not had the means to provide schooling for all those who wanted it.

Two elements in the church life of the United States have especially impressed him, the music and the Sunday-schools. "The forms of your music," he says, "are better than ours." As for our Sunday-schools, he was greatly impressed at Tacoma, where he saw five thousand children gather in one Presbyterian school. The Roman Catholic Bishop; the Greek Catholic Bishop; himself, of the Greek Orthodox Church, and the Presbyterian minister all were present and spoke. So he has in his mind to work out a system of Sunday-schools in Palestine when he goes back six months hence.

We of the Occident sometimes are a little too suspicious of these men. We describe them as wily. Their experiences as leaders of the race of under dogs undoubtedly has made them so in some cases. But truly a new breath passes over the East. Meletios, as Patriarch of Constantinople, entered into friendly relations with the Protestant churches there such as never would have been dreamed of fifty years ago. The Copts in Egypt and the Greek Church, in scattered places in the Levant, are actually starting Sunday-schools. Panteleimon's liberalism is genuine. It means something when the Greek Patriarch of Jerusalem writes in a letter that reached this country only a week or two ago that he would be glad to have one or two Americans on the Permanent Committee for settling all the affairs of the Patriarchate and co-operating with it. Panteleimon is a real index of the change that is taking place in the Holy Orthodox Church.

Dr. Worth M. Tippy, Secretary of the Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council made a rapid trip to sixteen Washington churches during the hour of morning worship one Sunday last month. Of these sixteen, five—the Church of the Covenant (Presbyterian), First Congregational, Calvary Baptist, Mt. Vernon Methodist Episcopal South and Vermont Avenue Christian—were crowded to the doors. The Luther Memorial, First Baptist, Epiphany Protestant Episcopal, St. John's Episcopal and Foundry Methodist had large congregations. New York Avenue Presbyterian, Ascension Episcopal and St. Thomas' Episcopal had fair congregations. The Church of the Father (Universalist), the Church of the New Jerusalem and Hamline Methodist had small congregations. The average was large. These sixteen churches are in the heart of the city, and part of them in the older part of town between the Capitol and White House on the north side. Dr. Tippy estimates that the residential churches are more largely attended than the downtown. It is known that the two Jewish synagogues and the Catholic churches are largely attended. Dr. Tippy also observed that the churches bear evidence of prosperity in other ways. The buildings are well kept, the interiors bright and the people friendly and aggressive. If religion in other cities is as strong as in Washington, the situation and the general condition of the churches is hopeful.

"Influence of War on Religion"

An Interview with Archbishop Soderblom

By Rev. Junius B. Remensnyder, D.D.

[This interesting interview appears jointly in the "Boston Evening Transcript" and THE CHRISTIAN WORK. Dr. Remensnyder has long been one of the Archbishop's most intimate friends and was one of the lecturers under the Olavs Petri Foundation at Upsala University, upon the Archbishop's invitation.]

ARCHBISHOP SODERBLOM'S personality is remarkably impressive. He is of the blond, Swedish type, combining natural dignity with a kindly and winsome countenance. His spirits are blithe and buoyant. Master of seven languages, he writes and speaks English with great fluency.

He declared that the supreme motive of his heart, in this world crisis, was to bring the teachings of Christ to bear upon the chaos, as the only hope for a righteous and peaceful adjustment. He believes in the League of Nations (unless something better can be devised), of which he said that the United States was the father, its author being ex-President Wilson, and Europe the mother, and the father should not discard the child because it was weak and puny, and its mother too sick and distracted to nurse it into life and strength.

The theme that burns in his heart is the destructiveness and horror of war, of which he quoted Napoleon as saying that war was fought to settle difficulties, but that it settled nothing, but did unsettle everything. This the Archbishop said was illustrated by the effect of the war on Europe, which it had so changed for the worse, spiritually, economically and nationally, that we can scarcely ever expect in our generation to see the old prosperous and peaceful Europe return.

In view of all this, he asked me to give this message to the American people, who, in their broad-mindedness, freedom from prejudice and unequaled might, he thought, could do more than any other people to heal the wounds of the nations and to bring back a peaceful world.

He desired that his thoughts be conveyed under the caption, "Influence of War on Religion." And to make no mistake, he wrote out his thoughts in these very words:

"Man is very much the same in all epochs and in all countries. Most people think first of their pleasures, business and profits. And when desolate and starved by war they have no room except for the craving for bread. Very few men and women in all times seek first for the Kingdom of God and His righteousness.

The outward circumstances and changes of history do not essentially change men's minds, and, moreover, men are not changed in crowds, but individually. The only change that really counts is the new heart, of which the Bible, the Saviour, and true Christians know something, because that change means a change of man's will from the worldly to the spiritual.

"Of course, catastrophes, as the great World War, make a sudden and visible impression upon men. In the crisis of their terror they will resort to religion and the church will cry, 'Arise, O God, and save us!' But this war piety, caused by fear and vehement calamity, is very transient, a storm that rolls big waves without touching deep water.

"If any difference can be stated between pre-war and after-war religion, it may be expressed in two words, progress and atonement. Western humanity before the war believed as blindly in progress and mechanical, rational evolution as any superstitious race has ever worshipped an idol of its own construction. But the war has proved that these modern dogmas have failed. Many thought that civilization was going by itself comfortably to heaven, but they see that it goes to hell, that it must take an extraordinary order to be saved.

"Is evil real? The Christian struggle against evil may be more recognized by modern thought than it was before the war.

"But at the same time the message of the Christian religion, atonement, vicarious suffering, redeeming love and the stigma of sacrifice has become evident as never before to many minds that despised such Christian ideas as superstitions and antiquities. They now see that these experiences touch the deepest realities of life.

"The lessons of the war make it a wonder how reason and theology ever could deny such facts as vicarious suffering. Men and women suffer not for their own sins, but for the sins of previous generations, and for the sins of their nation or of other groups of society than their own. And, secondly, if they endure that suffering with patience and courage, if they undertake it as a severe task but as a necessary sacrifice, the suffering becomes a potent moral factor for improvement and reconstruction. Such a practical solidarity is realized more or less in human life everywhere and at all times. But the world tragedy has made it a great and overwhelming but humiliating truth to our proud western civilization as a whole. Here our epoch touches that vital Christian truth, the mystery of redeeming love. Belief in natural progress has failed. Man must proceed over the ruins of his showy temple, and come back to trust in God."

Such is the message of this great spiritual leader to so-called Christian America, and it will be seen that his remedy for war is no superficial one, but that of a profound thinker who goes to the core of the wound.

International Co-operation the Only Way

By Dr. Fridtjof Nansen

PART III.

AFTER all, there is another danger spot which is graver and more dangerous in Europe at this moment, and that danger spot is to be found in Germany. I mean especially, of course, in the Ruhr. The condition in that district is at this moment actual war in all but the name. The Ruhr is the industrial center of Germany. It is there that the future of Germany, more or less will be decided.

It is a danger. The condition in Germany now is a danger to Europe. It is imminent and fundamental, and it is of interest that that danger—that which is going on there—is of concern to every country in the world, and the future of every country in the world is actually at stake, so far as I can understand, in connection with that problem at this moment. But how is it dangerous?

First, perhaps the greatest danger is that the seeds of a future war are inevitably being sown every day, and that makes the difficulty of preventing a coming war immensely greater. At this moment in Republican Germany there is a revival of the spirit of rèvenge and hate which is growing every day, and which is much, much worse than it was during any time of the war; and this again creates a revival and re-creation of monarchism and militarism on a large scale in all classes of Germany, and moreover it is the cause of civil disorders in Germany, and will result in the disappearance of the German market for many years, and with it the other markets which are influenced by the German market, and the disappearance of these markets from the world, even for a short time, will inevitably cripple the trade of the whole world.

The whole world is one in the present age—we are all in the one boat to sink or to swim together. In order, therefore, to ward off the danger to Europe some way must be found to solve the German reparations problem and satisfy France.

The whole Ruhr question, which is a burning one, in my opinion, was and is a necessary consequence of the defective provisions of the Treaty of Versailles. It has been much discussed lately whether, according to the treaty, the occupation of the Ruhr is legal or not. I consider this a question of minor importance. If it is legal, I can only say, so much the worse for that treaty. I was never a great admirer of it.

I regret very deeply that this whole affair so entirely has overshadowed the real state of things, and has brought people to forget what France has suffered in the past. While all condemn the occupation of the Ruhr, and all Germany suffers and is cruelly treated, most people, even many of the Germans themselves, seem to have forgotten what has happened. They have forgotten their attack on Belgium at the beginning of the war. They have forgotten the devastation of great territories in France, and they have forgotten how French and Belgian factories have been purposely destroyed. We should try to be fair to both parties in the great struggle in which the greater part of Europe became involved in 1914. Every country, including France, spent its lives and treasure, and for that, of course, no compensation can be made, but the soil on which the struggle was mainly waged was France, and the devastation remains. It is truly contrary to all natural feeling and reason that the loss caused by devastation in the area of the common conflict should fall upon and remain the loss of that particular country amongst the belligerents in whose territory it happened to be. So far as I understand, the justice and the necessity of reparations cannot, therefore, be disputed.

Let me add that I saw the devastated regions some few months after the Armistice was signed, and words cannot express my feelings when I looked on the formerly beautiful regions of France—the fields devastated and the neat villages reduced to heaps of stones and ruins. There is raging within me a feeling of the absurdity of war.

Last summer I traveled through those same regions again, and words cannot describe how I felt—the wonderful work that had been performed and was being performed by the industrious French people—my admiration of the manner in which, from first to last, she overcame dangers and difficulties which well might prove overwhelming for a less industrious race, and at the same time what an enormous expenditure this restoration work really meant. In my humble opinion, therefore, France and Belgium have the priority claim for compensation.

But still more important than the legal rights of France—still more important, I am tempted to say, than justice itself—is the future of Europe—the future of the world. With all deep sympathy for France, I am absolutely convinced that the policy of force, in the long run, cannot succeed in achieving either economic or political results. Such a policy of force is bound to end in failure, and those who have been trying it recently are already finding out that it is not likely to achieve for them the results they expected.

I feel tempted to remind you of some words by the old Chinese philosopher who thousands of years ago spoke about the life of man. He says when a man is born he is soft and flexible and fragile, but when he approaches death he becomes rigid and strong. In nature, too, trees and plants during their first growth are soft and flexible, but when near their death they are hard and dry. Thus we see that rigidity, strength and hardness are closely connected with death, while life means softness, flexibility and meekness. In the long run, therefore, a nation being cursed by brutal force or hardness—it is not in accordance with the laws of life—there will be no solution of the problem, and particularly of the problem of the Ruhr and reparations, and there will be no peace in Europe until force is abandoned and an agreement reached which is consented to by all parties concerned, and which all the parties concerned genuinely desire to carry out; but it is of vital importance that such an agreement should be reached as soon as possible, and before it is too late.

If Germany breaks up into its various parts, what hope will there then be of a settlement—of a solution of the problem being found? I think then the hope would be gone. Why? Just because I see no possibility of helping a Germany which has been split up into small countries. There would be no more reparations. That hope would be gone. But at the same time there would be no possibility of international co-operation with them, no international help, no international loan. An international loan could be given to the German Empire as a whole, but I doubt if it could be given to the fragments, which have no assets to offer. It means that the time for a solution would be gone, and what the effect on Europe would be no one of us knows, but I am afraid a new Germany would arise out of the ashes, and that the new Germany would be built on one idea, and that one idea is called revenge.

But we hope to save Germany before it is too late—before this happens. For my part, I greatly regret that the problem of reparations has not been dealt with through the League of Nations, which is the only existing machinery of international co-operation, at any rate. I am satisfied that in the atmosphere and with the machinery of the League a settlement might have been arrived at years ago. I believe that Germany herself might have secured settlement of the reparations questions to be taken care of by the League, provided she took the necessary steps. I think she should have applied for membership in the League in 1921 when, with absolute certainty, she would have been admitted, and the whole subsequent history of Europe in that case would have been quite different from what it is now. But it could hardly be doubted that even the difficult question of reparations could then quickly have been solved when Germany would have been dealing on an equal footing with the other members of the League. It is not to be expected, however, that any international machinery, however good, could deal with the great European questions which interest and affect the vital interest, and indeed the whole future of at least four great powers of Europe, unless at least one of those great powers had asked the League to take action.

The fact is that none of the great powers have made any such suggestion to the League. There is, therefore, no ground for blaming the League for inaction, and whether the great governments should be blamed or not depends on each man's personal opinion. If, however, the main line of settlement can be agreed upon, I think there is still good hope for a solution, even in this moment. I think that it is of the most vital importance for the future of the whole world that the international conference proposed by Lord Curzon and Mr. Hughes should take place as soon as possible. If not, I am afraid we all, and also France, when it will be too late, will regret that it was not done.

It is hardly necessary to say that the conference will be of no importance unless America joins it. Why? Is it, you think, that we in Europe believe that America must come and save us? No. That does not put it quite correctly. We, on our Scandinavian peninsula, could perhaps get along, to some extent, without this question being solved, but we think it is absolutely necessary for all nations to take part in the solution, and especially America—not to save Europe, but to save yourselves and to save the world, because the world will suffer if it is not saved.

I cannot doubt but that if the various governments met and discussed this difficult problem that it would be impossible for them to separate without having found a solution of it, and if the powers concerned can agree upon the line along which a solution ought to be worked out I think we have splendid evidence that a solution can be found. We have an illustration in what has been done for Austria. I think if Germany is willing to accept the solution in the same way as was Austria, Germany can and will be saved.

The situation of Austria a little more than a year ago certainly was much more difficult than that of Germany is, or ever was. Austria, a country with a capital city much too big, and a hinterland much too small seemed to have very small possibilities for economic existence. In fact, nearly all economic experts at that time would tell you that the future of Austria was hardly possible because she had not the resources to continue a national life.

The fact is that many nations—amongst them your great nation—tried for three years to help them. They completely failed. Then the League of Nations tried it for one year, and the League of Nations completely succeeded.

During those three years the several nations spent between four and five hundred million dollars in the attempt. The United States also spent something. The result was that the financial and economic condition of Austria were in worse chaos when they finished than when they began. Then Austria appealed to the League of Nations for help. She took up her troubles with the Council. It was handed over to the finance section of the League and it proposed a solution. An international loan was raised, and in a year Austria was saved from chaos, so that it is again one of the solvent nations of the world. The fact is, that during the last year while those negotiations were going on the Austrian crown has been the most stable money in Europe, thanks to the work of the League. This shows what can be achieved by international co-operation when you have the machinery for it.

It can well be said that the first method, that of the action of isolated nations, entailed the cost of four to five hundred million dollars with a result which was nil. The second method, the League method, as you may call it, has cost nil and has resulted in the restoration of Austria.

I cannot help thinking that if similar international co-operation could be attained for Germany it would be much easier to save her than it was to save Austria. You may tell me that, after all, Austria did not have the enormous debt of reparations to pay that Germany has. That is true. Even if it was reduced, still it will be an enormous debt to pay, but it will of course be distributed over a great many years, and I think if you even take into consideration the reparations to be paid, the resources of Germany are so immensely greater than those of Austria that it will be very much easier to find a solution, provided, of course, Germany is willing to accept the provisions. Those provisions will be a little hard for a nation to accept because it means international control of incomes and revenues. Austria had to submit to it. But I think even a great nation, when it is standing on the verge of the abyss to go down or be saved, would choose to be saved, even though it be through international co-operation.

Should it be through the League? It seems that the League machinery is there. It has worked extremely well in various cases, and there is no other machinery; but if you can create a better one, please go ahead and do it, and no one would welcome it more than we who are in the work. But the League is there and can be used at any moment. I know that many in this country will tell me that the League is dead. I have heard several times that the League is dead. It reminds me of a story I heard about a boy who had received a present of a small kitten, which was so small that it had not opened its eyes. On his way home the boy got very curious. He would like to see the eyes, and he tried by all possible means to make the kitten open its eyes. He did not succeed, and in his despair he drowned the kitten. He came back by the same way the next morning, and he saw the kitten lying dead in the water, but to his astonishment he found the kitten had opened its eyes. He said, "While you were alive you would not open your eyes, but now you are dead you can see." I can only say that if the League is dead it is certainly the most active corpse history has ever known.

I think we ought all of us to remember that the world is an interlacing world. It is one world, and only one, and we all are members of it.

Mankind—at least the whole of civilized mankind—is one. You cannot really split it up even into nations. At least, its interests have a far greater share of identity than of difference. Science, art, intelligence, morality, certainly mark no boundaries. You cannot destroy or maim any intellectual center in the world without crippling the whole intellectual life of the world. It is by co-operation which one receives from another that the world advances and makes progress.

The whole of history teaches us that one sea is more dangerous for people than any other, and that sea is isolation. That means stagnation. You say it is not necessary to mix up in the political and financial difficulties of another world—another continent. It is true there is an economic side of the question, but at this moment more and more countries are economically united, and there are more every day. It must bring a new spirit into the international affairs of the world. It is not sufficient to try to erect barriers to war, not even to provide means for sentiment. We must do more. We must take away all causes of war. Into international life we must bring the spirit of brotherhood, friendship and co-operation, and when we feel that we are one, not only with our lips, but in our hearts and actions, we must know and really feel that we cannot ruin one part of the body of humanity without the whole body of humanity suffering for it. National conduct should be guided by reason, justice and brotherhood. These motives in the end must be superior to brute force in all forms.

I repeat it, what is now needed in the world above all things is good-will and confidence between nations. Could you bring that about, the world would progress to-morrow in quite a different way than the way it is doing to-day.

In the Andes, at the highest point of the frontier between Chile and the Argentine, thirty thousand feet above the sea, there stands a colossal bronze figure of Christ, the one hand stretched out in blessing—that means good-will—the other hands holds the cross, the sign of fate—that means confidence—and beneath is written, "These mountains themselves shall fall and crumble to dust before the people of Chile and the Argentine will forget their solemn covenants sworn at the feet of Christ," and on the other side is written, "He is our peace who hath made both one."

Could not we bring forth such a spirit to rule the world and so insure a better world?

We need to remember the last words of a dying Roman emperor: "Thou hast conquered, oh Galilean." There is still hope for a fallen world, "for the things that are seen are temporal, but the things that are not seen are eternal."

The Religious Conditions in Germany

By Rev. Calvin Klopp Staudt, Ph.D.

PART II.

The German Young Men's Christian Association is in many places doing a noble work. The work in Ulm, Leipzig and Dresden, where I saw it at its best, is scarcely surpassed in any of our American Associations. In Dresden I was present one Thursday evening in a Bible class where over fifty young men had gathered around long tables with their Bibles, being led by a layman, a man whose interpretation of the Bible was sane, scholarly and exceedingly devotional and practical. He gave to those young men, coming from various walks in life, just exactly what they were hungering for and what they needed. The members of this Bible group meet regularly every week and are drawn by no other motive but the motive of mutual helpfulness. Other Bible groups are held on other nights. At the Leipzig Y. M. C. A., great meetings were held in the auditorium every Tuesday evening with an address, usually, by one of the members of the theological faculty of the university.

And what is true of the German youth in general is particularly true of university students. Though it is claimed that there is a slight falling off of students enrolled in the Theological Department, due, as one can readily understand, to economic reasons—German clergy receiving only a pittance of a salary—yet one is surprised often to find classes in theology and philosophy crowded and sometimes overflowing. Professor Girgensohn was compelled to seek a larger auditorium for his lectures in theology, and in Dr. Litt's class-auditorium a vacant seat was seldom to be found as he spoke, with a slight intermission, for two hours twice a week on philosophy. The only explanation of this strange phenomenon, it seems to me, is that the aspiring German youth has been driven to serious thinking about God and reality and seeks the guidance of men who have thought deeply on this subject. As in the days of Luther a certain number of young men have become deeply mystical and introspective.

An announcement of an address on a religious subject never fails to attract attention. In the University of Leipzig it was announced on the bulletin board one day that the Bishop of Saxony would speak in one of the classrooms on the subject "Christianity and Our Times," to which all students were invited. On the evening of the address it soon became evident that this, the largest class-auditorium in the University, could not hold the crowd which was clamoring to hear the speaker. We were obliged to withdraw into the unheated university church, on a night when the snow was lying on the ground, the air damp and the thermometer low. And yet, despite all bodily discomforts and the menace to health, that cold cathedral, where Tetzl once preached, became also crowded to the doors by the young men and women of the university.

I happened to get a seat in the chancel of the church, thus giving me an opportunity to survey this throng of university students. To say the least, it was deeply impressive and touching to look into the faces of these young people—most of whom were undernourished and some even to the extent where their health was being impaired, and read in those stern and earnest faces an impelling hunger and thirst after true knowledge and spiritual values.

The speaker began by depicting the religious situation in Germany and the present religious crisis, and then went on to show that three things must be done. First, our Christianity must become more ethical; a higher morality must take hold of the people; secondly, a finer spirit of brotherhood, of helpfulness and of service must be developed in the churches; and lastly, we must live more deeply and vitally the Christian life. He closed by making a stirring appeal, pleading that all should live the Christ life; and then announced that he would remain in the vicinity of the university for three or four days with the express purpose of giving personal help to students in their religious problems.

Then, too, a new note is being struck in the teaching of religion and theology, and that is the introduction of sociological problems and Christian sociology. Studies which have to do with the Christianizing of the social order found no place in the curricula of former years. Germany may have been twenty-five years ahead in studies on higher criticism, but she certainly was twenty-five years behind in studies which have to do with the application of the Christian ideal to society. In the University of Leipzig, in the Winter Semester of 1922-23, there were no courses in the Old and the New Testament interpreting Scripture in the light of its social teachings; but before that Semester was over there was posted on the bulletin a special announcement that during the following Semester a course on the social teachings of the Old Testament prophets would be offered. A similar course, I understand, was also to be given in the field of New Testament science. Professor Adolph Deissmann, an eminent German scholar of the University of Berlin, when asked about the religious life of Germany after the war, lately said: "We are less dogmatic, less destructive, I think. . . . Attention is also given to certain neglected sociological problems in the light of the New Testament and the necessity of the Christianizing of the political life." In the university library in Leipzig, I noticed on the shelf of new books a great display—mostly American—of volumes dealing with Christianity and social service.

Now, it seems to me, that Germany is suddenly "born again" into the study of Christian sociology, and that she has found a new fulcrum in teaching religion. And it is by no means strange that there should be this sudden conversion. Under the old régime no one presumed or thought of teaching religion from the social point of view; and those who tried to engage in the uplift of the oppressed and the working classes, were at once termed Socialists. And the rabid attack of the German Socialists on the Church has grown in large measure out of a one-sided interpretation of Christianity. The way to win back again the better element of those who have gone astray is to teach and practise this new phase of religion.

The new birth into Christian sociology may also mean one day a new birth for the German people. Of all the peoples of the world, the Germans need the power, the restraint and the unifying force of religion; and, in like manner, they need to learn the value and efficacy of social science and the Christianizing of the social order and of political life. This is important for Germany itself and from the standpoint of international relationship.

Another encouraging feature is the establishment of a Religionslehrer-Seminar, a school of religion for lay workers. This school was founded in Leipzig shortly after the war. It has a three years' course, a fine corps of teachers, most of whom are from the university faculty, and the spirit and atmosphere of the school is everything that could be desired. The school has been supported by contributions from German people and by foreign gifts. There are students in this school from all over Germany, and I found one even from Alsace and another from Brazil. Despite the economic depression this school has maintained a steady attendance of from fifty to sixty students, and should the economic situation clear up it would become a most popular institution, and others of like character would likely be established.

The primary aim of this school of religion is to train up an army of men and women who can give the highest type of religious instruction to children who are now being deprived of religious instruction in the schools. Indeed, it is similar to the present movement in America, where men and women are being trained in religious education to carry on week-day religious instruction.

The religious outlook of the future of Germany, despite a multitude of disheartening features, is rather hopeful. Religion, as during the Protestant Reformation, may again work wonders and become a great blessing to the people. The hope, however, lies, not in the masses, but in rare souls and in a group of intelligent young people. In the timely words of Professor Rudolf Kittel—one of the most eminent scholars in Germany and an honored and respected citizen, who is said to have saved the University of Leipzig during the German revolution—in his opening lecture last winter to his students on the Book of Isaiah, as he referred to the Prophet's teachings on the holy seed and the remnant: "The godless will not heed, but the remnant who understand God will bring in a new life for the Fatherland. Isaiah is a man who not only spoke for his own time, but he speaks for us to-day. Nothing can help but God alone. It behooves us to serve God with all our might in the right way. And in the remnant, the holy seed, lies the hope of the new nation."

THE ABLE McLAUGHLINS

By MARGARET WILSON. Harper and Brothers, New York. $2.00.

This is far more than a story; it is a movie of the winning of the farms and towns of Iowa from the prairie. Especially, it is a picture of a quarter-section of Iowa prairie and its inhabitants, in 1866. It is to be thought of along with the "Covered Wagon" or "The Virginians." Many of its incidents still linger in the memories of hardy pioneers of several States. Some of them must have happened again and again in different places—for example, the story of the meek little woman who would not muddy her shoes, but who made a stingy husband build her the best house in the township. These incidents are part of the folk-lore of the American people. For Americanization of newly-arrived immigrants the reviewer recommends, among other things, compulsory attendance on the movie mentioned and compulsory reading of this book. If that were done, we would have more love of America. For that matter, some citizens who think the Hudson is the western boundary of the United States may find this prize novel of the Harpers a reminder that courage, love of education, and high ideals did not end with 1620, nor with 1776.

What Can America Do?

WHAT can America do? In the face of the appalling distress of Europe, that is a question which thousands of our countrymen are asking. And, lacking a complete and satisfying answer, multitudes are doing nothing. But in this paralysis of uncertainty which seems to hold many, while the Government hesitates and financiers are undecided, it is heartening to Christian people to know that the churches, acting through the Federal Council, have mapped out a path of service which reaches a point of gravest need, and which more and more is attracting the co-operation of men of good-will.

It is more than a year ago that the full seriousness of the effect of after-war conditions on Protestant Christianity on the Continent began to be realized in this country. That the situation might be fully understood and relief brought where necessary, at the suggestion of the Federal Council, a conference was called at Copenhagen in August, 1922. A large company of delegates from thirty-seven church groups representing twenty-one European nations assembled, and there was quickly revealed a condition of things really alarming. While the Protestant element numbering fifteen million in but five countries was able to maintain normally its religious life and work, fifty million Protestants in fifteen countries were more or less in distress. At once the most effective thing was done. A Central Bureau for Relief of the Evangelical Churches of Europe was organized and its stability assured by the promise of the Federal Council to supply two-thirds of the sum necessary for its maintenance. Officers of the bureau were appointed, all from neutral countries, and the able and devoted leader in federative church activity abroad, Dr. Adolf Keller, although already he carried heavy responsibilities as pastor of St. Peter's Church, Zurich, Switzerland, accepted the position of executive secretary.

No sooner was this channel of relief established than aid began to flow in from countries near enough to realize the need. Little, however, was sent from America, because America did not know. In a brief visit to this country early last summer, Dr. Keller vividly brought home to all who heard him the critical situation of European Protestantism, but his stay was not long enough to bear large fruit in material aid.

Meanwhile, the situation abroad has grown steadily more threatening. At the moment, the most acute distress is not in countries where the physical effects of the war are most obvious, as Latvia, where one-quarter of the church buildings were destroyed, or France, where the work of reconstructing places of worship is still far from complete. In other countries, political and economic consequences of the war are still felt, the effect of which is devastating to Christian institutions. In some countries the abrupt suppression of state subsidies or the confiscation of endowments has left the support of the churches to a desperately impoverished people. Again, the new boundaries imposed by treaties following the war in several instances have left isolated groups of Protestant Christians in the midst of alien lands where hostile legislation has reduced the income available for the churches, closed the schools and hampered religious observances, thus working powerfully for the extinction of the faith. Before the war there were four million Protestants in Hungary. Now two million of them are scattered and oppressed.

And in almost every country of central and eastern Europe the depreciation of the currency has wrought pitiful havoc among Christian institutions. Endowments of hospitals, orphanages, deaconesses, schools, have shrunk to nothing, and such institutions are closing by scores. The cost of printing has become prohibitive, so that in one country alone three hundred religious publications have been suspended. Pastors' salaries have been reduced in some countries to two dollars per month, and hundreds of them are working long hours in the fields or in the mines or in factories to keep body and soul together, able only to give the left-overs of their time to their chosen work of the pastoral care of a people as poor as themselves. Pastors' widows and retired pastors are quietly starving. Among such people "there is a silent dying," writes one careful observer.

In some instances the hostile attitude of the authorities makes the situation still more discouraging. Thus in Saxony a communistic government has refused emergency relief to pastors and their social workers, and it has seized the income from property belonging to the Church. "We have the greatest interest in the fact that the Church is weak and in its remaining weak," is the declaration of the Ministry of Religion. No wonder, as Dr. Keller writes, "Black hunger reigns in the homes of the pastors." Another careful observer, an American, recently returned from abroad, in his report says: "The situation in some areas" (later he mentions Hungary in particular) "is too pitiful to be fully credible to those who have not seen it with their own eyes."

To meet a crisis so full of the gravest possibilities for the Protestants of Europe, the Federal Council, this autumn, took two measures which greatly increase the importance and effectiveness of the Central Bureau. The first was the appointment of Dr. Keller as representative, abroad, of the Council's Commission on Relations with Religious Bodies in Europe, with such provision as will enable him, within the next few weeks, to withdraw from the pastorate of his church in Zurich and to devote himself entirely to the growing work of the Central Bureau. For this position of large influence Dr. Keller is finely qualified. An outstanding pastor before the war, he, by his character and ability, has won in more recent years a position of strong leadership in all interchurch movements uniting the Christian bodies of Europe and of the world. In the Continental Section of the Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work he holds the position of secretary. To the enlarging work of the Central Bureau he brings abilities of a high order, wide experience and great devotion, together with a fairness of mind and a sympathy which win the confidence of the people of all nations. Twice he has visited the United States. After his first visit he wrote a book on American Protestantism. It showed unusual grasp and discernment. A third visit is expected, shortly, in which, during an extended tour, he will speak of the great cause he represents. [Dr. Keller is just reaching this country.]

REV. CHAUNCEY W. GOODRICH

The other action by the Federal Council was the appointment of Dr. Chauncey W. Goodrich American representative of the Central Bureau for Relief. He had just returned from a six years' pastorate of the American Church in Paris. The whole experience of Dr. Goodrich has fitted him for the position of a sort of "liaison officer" between the churches of America and the Continent. After his graduation from Yale, where he was president and afterwards graduate secretary of the Student Christian Association, and later from Union Seminary, he held pastoral appointments in New York City, Orange, N. J., and Cleveland. Later he was called to his first pastorate of six years in Paris. He returned to this country with slightly impaired health; he was for a time in New York, and then he accepted the pastorate of the College Church in connection with Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me. Again, during the war, he was called to Paris for a second pastorate. Dr. Goodrich will interpret to the churches here the needs of the sister European churches, based on personal observation and direct contact.

While the primary task of the Central Bureau is to secure relief in a great emergency, its influence is felt helpfully in another direction. In many ways it is tending to mould the divided Protestant elements of Europe into unity. Through the example and encouragement of the Federal Council in America, church federations have been formed in France, Switzerland, Germany and Spain, and in other countries there is a distinct movement in that direction. In these separate groups, through their relation to the Central Bureau, there is being fostered a growing consciousness of their common Christian purpose and their essential unity.

The countries represented, to which gifts are distributed, are: Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Esthonia, Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Jugoslavia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, Russia, Spain and the Ukraine.

The American office of the Bureau is at 287 Fourth Avenue, New York.

Some Cincinnatians have started a Radio Bible Service Bureau. The Bureau has prepared a sheet of brief daily Scripture selections and prayers, and urges broadcasting stations to send them out. According to the statement from Cincinnati, some stations have begun to use the service.

The United States has been negotiating a new commercial treaty with Germany. Although under the Jones Merchant Marine Act, goods carried in American vessels should receive preferential tariff, yet the new treaty proposes no discrimination against German shipping. During his administration, President Wilson refused to carry out the provisions of the act. It would have required an abrogation of some twenty-three important treaties. We are glad to see that the present administration has the same determination to play fair with all nations in regard to shipping. It remains to see now what the Senate will do with the treaty.

Rev. J. Frank Norris of Fort Worth, Texas, eminent among Fundamentalists, occasionally himself indulges in a certain sort of higher criticism in regard to the Bible. When he preached in Brooklyn, the other night, in connection with the mission which the Fundamentalists conducted there and in Dr. John Roach Straton's Baptist Church in New York, he took occasion to urge young ministers who might be Fundamentalists to stick to their doctrines, even though to do so might mean lower salaries. "Lazarus," he added, "did not have enough salary to pay funeral expenses, and dogs were his pallbearers." Of John, the Baptist, Mr. Norris remarked, "He did not have enough clothes to come down to Jerusalem!" Mr. Norris is a man who might do, and no doubt does do, an immense amount of good, witty, magnetic, earnest, honestly caring about people. Fundamentalist or not, he would help men and women by his human qualities. Of course we should be glad if he understood more clearly some of those whom to-day he denounces. But a wider understanding of our fellows is a very common need.

The Challenge of the Hour

By Samuel Zane Batten, D.D.

[This article appears as a chapter in Dr. Batten's pamphlet, "Why Not Try Christianity," published by the George H. Doran Company, New York.]

THE world changes and men change with it. The world changes and ever new questions come to the front and make their insistent demand. In every age the Gospel, so far as it has been followed, has proved itself to the power of God and the wisdom of God, in that it has answered men's need and met every question as it arose. To-day we are brought face to face with some urgent questions, and these are here to challenge our faith and prove the Gospel's power. In our time, the Gospel has its fortune to make or to lose in the wider fields of man's social, industrial and international life. In the significant words of Sir Edward Grey, "The condition of the world is an ultimatum to Christianity."

First, here is the challenge of the social question. In our time, we have found that humanity, through the toils and sacrifices of other generations, has come into a great heritage of achievement. But, owing either to neglect on the part of many or to greed on the part of a few, the control of that heritage, in large part, has fallen into a few hands, and these not always the wisest and most deserving. The consequence is, as Benjamin Kidd says, the great mass of people are born into the world to find that the best places are already pre-empted and held in perpetuity; and so they find themselves without any real opportunity in the world and a fair equity in the national heritage.

I shall not attempt to mention the various plans that have been devised first and last to solve this problem and change the situation. But I come right to the heart of the question and ask, Why not try Christianity? Why not go back to the fundamental Bible teaching and say that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof? This earth he has given to the children of men to be their heritage and their home. Why not accept the Bible teaching that all souls are God's, and so one soul has as much right to be as another? Why not say with the teachers of Scripture, that while men may have possession of the earth, one man has no right to gain a monopoly of the earth and deny his brother man a right to opportunity? Why not accept and teach the great principle of the Jubilee law, which Jesus announced in the Nazareth synagogue He came to fulfil in the acceptable year of the Lord? Why not teach the primary Christian truth, that man is a steward in all he is and in all he does, and so nothing that he handles is really his own; that he is hence under obligation to use his talents and his property in such a way as to advance the Kingdom of God and promote the cause of justice? This is not socialism, for the reason that it is a thousand miles deeper, more radical, more fundamental than any socialistic program. All this is no new demand; but it is the old truth which has been sun-clear from the beginning.

Second, we have the challenge of the industrial situation. There are many persons who miss the real meaning of the industrial issue and see only the surface symptoms. On the surface it seems to be a question of hours and wages, control of industry and the distribution of its products. But this is only the outward and visible sign of a deep and human trouble. We have strife in the industrial world because there is injustice in society, because human relations are broken and dishonored, because there is a frightful discrepancy between the Christian ideal and the social order.

The industrial system of to-day is the product and result of forces and principles with which Christianity has nothing to do. Nay, worse, these forces are in direct opposition to the principles of Christ. It has been taught that selfishness is the basis of economic activity; that each party is expected to get all he can for himself and give as little as necessary to the others; that men are "free to do one another to the death, provided only the arena be a market and the instrument bargain;" that competition is the law of trade, and it is useless to complain of men because they are self-seeking. So long as such principles are accepted, that long we will have strife and confusion. So long as the industrial order rests upon such assumptions the goodly fellowship of the apostles could not operate our present system and make its workings just or satisfactory.

The first thing is for us to deny and repudiate these pagan principles of our economic order, and to affirm and substitute Christian principles. "Competition is put forth as the law of life. That is a lie," says Maurice, "and the time has come for us, in word and deed, to repudiate it." The next thing is to affirm that men are brothers before they are employers and employees: we must bring them together as men and adjust the relations between them in terms of justice and love and brotherhood. This was Jesus' method and Jesus' remedy. The Master, when importuned to take sides in a dispute concerning property, disavowed the function of a judge and divider in such matters. But in the next words He shows very clearly that He is concerned with the spirit which lies behind disputes and causes division. So He charged men to beware of covetousness and to cultivate a spirit of brotherliness. The real causes of industrial strife are an unbrotherly spirit and a greed of gain. The effective remedy is found in a substitution of the spirit of brotherhood and justice for the spirit of greed and pride. We admit that there must be some radical changes in the order and method of society, that this spirit may be created and may have full sway. But these changes in society will come about as fast and as far as the spirit of brotherliness and the passion for justice prevails. The various plans proposed to bring industrial peace, such as profit-sharing, compulsory arbitration, industrial democracy, may or may not be the final word; they may or they may not work out the results desired.

Thus, beyond any changes in the machinery of the industrial system, there must be changes in the attitude of men themselves. We can never solve the industrial question by any half-way measures. Nine-tenths of our efforts miss the mark for the reason that they ignore underlying causes. We can never bring peace to the industrial world by any meddling with wages, hours of labor, recognition of the unions and system of profit-sharing. This is merely lopping off a few branches and leaving the root untouched. The Church must strike at the heart of the problem and lay the axe at the root of the tree. The Church must take away the love of gold and bring men under the sway of a new motive. There must be the substitution of the spirit of service for the spirit of greed; there must be a willingness on the part of all to regard others as brothers and to be brotherly toward them; there must be a sacrificial attitude of mind which will lead men to look not primarily on the things of self, but to seek the good of all. We must go down and down beneath all mere questions of hours and wages, dividends and boss-ship, and bring men together face to face as men; and we must then adjust the relations of men in terms of justice, love and brotherhood. We must learn to apply the Gospel across class lines, to deal with one another as brothers and partners. The world has tried strikes, lockouts, boycotts, legislation, and the result is confusion and strife. Why not try Christianity, with its brotherhood, its justice, its co-operation? The finest evidence of the Gospel to-day is a company of men, employers and workingmen, sitting together as brothers to consider the affairs of the enterprise and to work together as partners. And all this ought to be self-evident to those who confess faith in Christ.

Third, here is the challenge of the great World War. The World War is one of the greatest calamities that has ever befallen the human race. It is impossible for any man to appreciate the magnitude of this calamity or to measure its tragedies. Fully eight million men have been killed or have died of wounds; another eight million have been injured in various ways and are crippled for life. This is sad enough; but this is only the beginning of the tragedy. The war has cost the nations billions of dollars, and little children generations hence will be born under the shadow of this war debt; billions of money that ought to have gone for education and health and human well-being must be spent to pay the interest on this colossal debt. But even more tragic than this is the fact that millions of homes have been broken up and millions of children must begin life without a father's care and counsel. Many millions of children are being cheated out of an adequate education and a fair chance in the world. But quite as dark as all this is the fact that national enmities have been intensified, and for generations men of one race will suspect and hate men of other races.

This great war raises some very serious questions. Could not Christianity have prevented this war? The real causes of this war are not far to seek or hard to find. They are the greed of nations, their ambition to extend their boundaries, to gain new markets, to control the strategic points of the world's trade. For generations the nations of Europe have been sowing the wind, and it is not strange that they should reap the whirlwind.

The foreign policies of the so-called Christian nations have been practically untouched by the Christian spirit. Those policies might have belonged indifferently to Moham-medan, Buddhist or pagan peoples. "Diplomacy," says Professor Gilbert Murray, in defending the foreign policy of Sir Edward Grey, "in the past twenty years was an out-law's market." Little or no attempt has been made to teach the brotherhood of mankind or to interpret the Sermon on the Mount across international boundaries. Not only so, but the underlying principles of our civilization have been purely gentile and pagan. The nations have been looking each on the things of self and no one on the things of others. Each has been trying to secure the largest share of the earth, to control the world's trade routes and to checkmate its competitors; each has sought after the things that make for national advantage and have not taken thought for the things that make for world peace. The stronger nations have regarded backward peoples as legitimate objects of exploitation. They have sought to control smaller nations in the interest of trade and finance. Thus far the only way that the smaller nations could be safe at all was to come under the sovereignty of some stronger nation. The nations have believed in the God of heaven, but they have not believed in the one Father of all. Each nation has had a tribal religion, a national God. In a partial way, they have believed in justice and brotherhood, but they have never believed in these principles in the relation of nation with nation. These policies and practices foredoom the world to be a scene of confusion and warfare. So long as self-interest determines the policies of the nation, that long nations will fight when their interests collide.

Then why not try Christianity as the remedy for war? The world has tried diplomacy, and it has failed. The world has tried battleships and armies, and they have failed. Why not try Christianity? Why not believe in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of mankind? Why not say that God hath made of one blood all nations of men; that He has given each nation its heritage and its right to be, and so it has the right to its own territory and life. Why not say that injustice and land-grabbing on the part of a nation is even more cruel and wicked than injustice and stealing on the part of an individual? Why not declare that the nations calling themselves Christian must give up their ambitions of trade control and economic imperialism, and bring international trade under the control of morality and law? Why not insist that nations equally with individuals are under obligation to practice the Golden Rule and do unto others as they would have others do unto them? Why not affirm that nations are here, not to be ministered unto, but to minister and to serve the cause of humanity? Why should not the churches know of the political treasons that are plotted and the imperialistic ambitions that are driving men into war? And why should they not testify against these things in the name of the Lord, disfellowship the men who do these things and say that they are the enemies of the Kingdom of God? The Church must testify against this evil spirit, this greed of nations, and then call men and nations to repentance. The churches must make men and nations know that when they covet and steal the territory of weaker peoples they are sinners and pagans. The churches must refuse to sanction and bless these unholy wars of greed and conquest; they must make the nations know that they fight as pagans and not as Christians; they must honor the spirit of Christ and must keep His name out of these unholy quarrels. The churches must insist that they who name the name of Christ shall have done with iniquity; they must refuse to absolve and bless the nations that follow the policies of Cain; they must testify that the way of justice, love and brotherhood is the way of security, life and peace.

The world to-day is in a desperate condition. It is like the sick woman of the Gospels who had tried many things of many physicians, but was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse. The world has tried ecclesiasticism, and all history records its failure to save men or to unite the people. The world has tried science for its many ills, and science has no power to save men; nay, we have seen science turned against man and devising means for destroying men. The world has tried education, and while education has done much, it has left the heart untouched and the moral will untrained; it has no power to charm away the selfishness of men and send them to seek the Kingdom of God and its righteousness.

The nations have tried diplomacy, and all the world knows the result. The diplomats of the world have played with the lives of men and the destiny of nations as though they were pawns on a chess board. Diplomacy failed to avert the most disastrous war of ages; and diplomacy failed at the Peace Conference to give a just treaty or to ensure world peace. If man's extremity is God's opportunity, there is just one thing for the world to do: come to Jesus Christ and try the Gospel. The most important task before our generation is to think out the meaning of Christ's life and teaching in relation to social, industrial and international affairs, and then to set about the work of applying His principles all along the line of life.

This question really has two aspects, both of which are essential and must be taken together. Why not try CHRISTIANITY? Not a part of it, not a substitute for it, but Christianity itself, in its length and breadth, its reality and power? And why not TRY Christianity to the full; that is, find out what Christianity means, and then apply it to every detail of life and every relation of society; bring its spirit and motive to bear upon every question, and go just as far as Christ goes?

The Church and the Press

By Rev. T. J. Brabner Smith

Chairman of the Commission on Publicity of the Chicago Church Federation

[The following paper was read at the Conference on Church Publicity held recently under the auspices of Chicago Church Federation and Advertising Council of the Chicago Association of Commerce.]

THERE is an increasing number of church leaders and newspaper men who are keenly conscious of the need of a closer co-operation of the Church and the Press.

In the Church there are both ministers and laymen who are constantly berating, belittling and, in more cases, bleating constantly about a decadent press. Among newspaper editors, publishers and writers there are a few who do not see much in the Church that is worth while printing as news or as news articles in the press.

Occasionally one hears among church members in local, district and national meetings some individual or class or a certain group break out with a vehement attack on the public press, but on all such occasions saner minds prevail. This epidemic of vehement attack by church members that the newspapers are propaganda for some powerful interest fails to move the Church seriously as a body and fails entirely to stir the Church into action against the newspapers, because they know that this spasmodic attack is groundless. This is specially true of the Associated Press, and I presume it is true of other press associations.

A better understanding of the newspapers by the church members and of the church work by the newspapers is evident to all serious thinking public leaders. The Church sometimes fails to realize the opportunity to reach and influence church members and those outside the Church through the secular press. The Church must use the newspaper more and more, and consider it a brother in the struggle for the betterment of the community and not as an enemy. Newspaper men should remember that the Church is a growing concern, and that it is among men really the biggest business on earth; that its activities at home and abroad reach into all the social, private and business lives of three-quarters of the citizens of the United States. In 1921 there were 243,478 churches, and in 1922, 253,057, an increase of 9,579. A remarkable increase is also noticed among the ministers. In 1921, 199,331, and in 1922, 214,385, an increase of 15,054.

Of church members there were in 1921, 46,242,130, and in 1922, 47,407,251, an increase of 1,165,121. Of Sunday-schools there were in 1921, 109,154, and in 1922, 204,464, an increase of 5,310. Of pupils in the Sunday-schools in 1921 there were 23,944,438, and in 1922, 25,189,418. The churches raised for all purposes, in 1921, $488,424,034, and in 1922, $518,317,578, an increase that year of $29,983,494. Many newspaper writers know that the growth in church membership, compared with the growth in population, shows a marked increase. In 1890, the population in the United States was 62,947,714 and the church membership at that time was 21,699,432. According to the official report of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ, the church membership in 1922 was 47,407,250, in a population estimated at 108,000,000. While the population was increasing sixty-eight per cent. during thirty-two years, or at an average rate of 2.125 per annum since 1890, the church membership was increasing 118.4 per cent., or 3.7 per annum, showing a small but steady advance of church members compared to population. This steady advance is further shown by the fact that in 1890 the church membership was thirty-four per cent of the population, but in 1922 it was forty-five per cent. In 1922 the church population of the United States, which includes members and adherents of some form of religious faith, was 77,958,470 Protestant, 456,054 Eastern Orthodox, 604,082 Latter Day Saints, 1,600,000 Jewish, 18,104,804 Roman Catholic, a total of 98,723,410. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ reckons Protestants as 2.8 times the communicant figures and Jews as four times the figures they give, which, as a rule, is the number of heads of families of pew holders.

These church facts are not generally known, or if known, are not recognized by many journalists. Neither has the Church awakened to its greatness or its opportunity. With such a membership and such vast amount of property the Church should be given a greater prominence in the newspapers. The newspaper owners and writers must remember that their wares do not reach all the members and adherents of churches, but the newspaper does enter into millions of homes of church members. It is of vital importance to the church leaders that the newspaper which enters the homes and offices of this vast number of members should be of such a quality that it will uplift and strengthen the moral and spiritual fiber of the members and adherents. The Church is under a great responsibility for its membership because of the influence of the press in the home; also, the newspaper owners and writers have a great opportunity as well as a tremendous responsibility.

With very few exceptions the majority of newspapers are not what the founder of Christianity would think ideal. What would Christ say of the modern newspapers? It is true that many of them are reaching out for better material. The newspapers are not solely to blame for the lack of church news. On the Church there is great responsibility to supply the newspapers with real, up-to-date information on its activities. When the churches cease to criticize the newspapers and begin constructively to co-operate with the public press and supply it with material prepared in a proper manner we shall have a high moral tone in newspapers. Editors and press representatives find it very difficult to secure either by 'phone or by personal request information from church clergy, officials and laymen. But there is a growing co-operation.

"It is not true that the newspaper men consider church news trivial, the criminal news important," says W. J. Smith, of "The Chicago Daily News." An increasing number of newspapers are employing church editors and other papers are eagerly seeking men and women who can give church news. Most of the great daily and weekly papers have religious editors or religious columns, and they seek religious news. When these millions of members of churches demand that the newspapers be what they should be according to a Christian standard, and when members of churches who own, control or write for the daily papers apply Christianity to the daily newspaper, the problem will be solved.

We predict that the time is coming when the church editor will be the most important editor in the newspaper office, and when religious news and news of the churches and the clergy will be considered first-class news, the most important news for the public press. If the daily newspapers are not co-operating with the Church and the community it is because the Church and the community does not demand it or does not co-operate to make an ideal newspaper. How is it that the newspaper fraternity should be considered as indifferent to the clergy and the church people? Is the Fourth Estate made of men of a class by themselves? In fact, most of the newspaper owners and writers are members of the Church. If the community and the newspaper fails it is because the Church has failed at some point in doing its part to help and co-operate with the newspaper. The church, the newspaper and the community need to join together in the spirit of co-operation, in the name of Him who "went about doing good" and is "Lord and Master of us all," and who said, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel." The world surely includes the newspaper and the community.

Children and the Church

BY ANGELO PATRI

THE church is the house of God. The words spoken there are the words of God—His message to men. The service the church offers to all who come within it is the service of God. Surely this, then, is the place for children. Surely, then, the church has a strong influence on the lives of children.

Few mature people will deny that this is, and should be, true, but the excuses and reasons they offer for not supporting the church either by their presence or their money are varied and numerous and illuminating.

"Sunday is a day of rest. It is the only day we have to take a few minutes' longer in bed." Well, what time did you get to bed the night before? The show lasted until after eleven, the supper until after twelve, and by the time you got home it was close to two o'clock. There was a choice between going to church in the morning or to the show on Saturday evening, and you choose the show.

"The sermon is so dull that I cannot keep awake. Besides, the dullness, it is so impractical. What is the use of preaching the loveliness of sacrifice when every one of us has to scratch like mad for a living? I say it's hypocritical to talk about the brotherhood of man on Sundays and act the 'me-for-myself' the rest of the week. I'd rather go to the woods and get my spiritual renovation there. The woods were God's first temples."

Of course. And you seek out a retired place and meditate on the goodness of God and your unworthiness and resolve and plan for a better and closer relation to the things of the Spirit, a kinship with God.

You have the children with you and you teach them that they have come out to the open in the solitudes to feel their nearness to the Father of the universe, and you explain to them a little of their duty towards Him, and through that relation their duty to their neighbors.

There are many, many children in this land growing up without an appreciation of what the church stands for, without the standards of living that the church instills, without even the knowledge that there is an Infinite Spirit of Rightness that rules the universe—a Spirit whose law is fixed and inexorable, stern and clean and searching as undying fire.

We may quibble about the creeds and the ritual and the discipline, but deep within us lies the knowledge that beyond them all lies something the human spirit needs and must have if life is to be endured. What right have we to bring up children without that knowledge? What right have we to teach them to ignore the church, the only place we have allotted for such instruction?

Punishment does not hold children; easy compliance does not hold them; laws and conventions do not hold them. These are external and material. The knowledge of the love and fatherhood of God, His never-changing rightness and unfailing justice and all-powerful love does hold them. These are of the spirit and inherent in every child.—New York Evening Post.

The colored people of Hampton, Virginia, for nearly thirty-five years have conducted a building and loan association, which has handled in receipts $1,173,723.19; made loans amounting to $850,355.94; earned in dividends $310,579.63; and made 1,835 real estate loans. The directors have been public-spirited, representative men, who have been willing to subordinate their own financial interests to the welfare of the association and to render valuable service without pay. They have consistently insisted that the association should do a legitimate building-and-loan business and refrain from combining their program with that of banking or any other alluring side-line. Of the total income of $24,438.03 for the past business year, the net profit was $18,219.35. The right colored men can do business conservatively.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Anger, Its Religious and Moral Significance*

THIS volume is a psychological study of the value and limits of anger. The author, who is the professor of psychology at the University of California begins with a discussion of the place of anger in morals. He comes to the very reasonable conclusion that anger is only a secondary power, non-creative in itself, but which is of real value when properly directed in carrying out the impulsions of our primary qualities. He points out that there are four emotional impulsions; two creative, love and self-interest, and two supporting powers, anger and fear.

The sanity of Professor Stratton's position may well be illustrated by the following brief quotations from this part of his book:

"The error of the strictest sect of the Freudians is not that they find in us the emotional traits of animals, but that they fail to find in us all the animal traits there are. The beast has more range of emotion than they discover in man."

"In our American life, especially, we shall be wise if we keep free the channels of strengthening emotion. In the face of business anxiety and of minds tense for success, we have not too much healthful recreation. What passes for recreation is often too close to a goad or an anodyne; it lacks hearty and lasting cheer. For we must, in the end, look to the psychic cost of our refreshment. No pleasures are worth the having that leave a great seeded field of discontent to choke the steady enjoyment of work and family and friends. And yet contentment need not be bovine; it always calls for some noble dissatisfaction. This latter, then is reorganizing, not crippling, and without it there settles on the mind a cankering discontent.

"It now lies with the directors of religion, in a more conscious way than hitherto, to give to the emotions a quality that is invigorating and restorative."

The second part of the book is a study in comparative religions in which the author points out the presence or lack of anger in the great faiths. He makes three groups, as follows: The Irate and Martial Religions, Judaism, Zoroastrianism and Islam; The Unangry Religions, Taoism, Vishnuism, Buddhism, Jainism; The Religions of Anger-Supported Love, Confucianism, Christianity. In each one, he points out from a consideration of the sacred books the character of the religion, and draws some very illuminating conclusions. Curiously enough even in Buddhism, which is of course one of the unangry religions, the imagery of the personal religious life is always that of combat. Direct references are made at the foot of the pages to the exact quotations from the sacred books justifying the statements in the text.

The third section of the book is a study of anger in the growth of religion. In this section perhaps the most interesting chapter is that on the geography of anger. Professor Stratton confesses the uncertainty of any definite conclusions in this realm, but declares his desire to try his feet upon "confessedly quaking ground." He concludes, "There seem to exist, then, obscure racial and geographical differences in regard to anger and pugnacity, and these have left their deep mark upon religion."

The final division of the study concerns the future of anger in the West, and here Professor Stratton comes to certain common sense decisions about the value of anger as supplying the "final increment of vigor in the effort of most men." He points out that anger is a "highly unspecialized impulsion; it has no immediate interest of its own, but arises to protect and further any interest that you feel." "There would seem, then, to be both the possibility and the need of bringing our anger-responses into the service of the interests that deserve to be supreme, and in particular of making pugnacity obedient to good-will."

The volume closes with a list of fifteen splendid rules for the fighting mood. We recommend this book as not only a great stimulant to personal thought on the possibilities of human nature, but as a much needed book of counsel in the situation which now confronts the whole Church. A little good moral indignation directed by good-will will undoubtedly help to clear the murky atmosphere.

RURAL EDUCATION, by Orville G. Brim. The Macmillan Company. 293 pp. $2.00. A review by Dr. Edmund deS. Brunner.

This is the first volume of a series on the theme edited by Miss Mabel Carney of Teachers' College, New York. In her introduction the editor points out the necessity of an up-to-date study of the subject. The average rural school term is but seven months compared to nine in the city. Relatively, rural children make a twenty-five per cent. poorer attendance record than those in the city. Half of the rural school teachers have never completed even so much as a four-year high school course. With these facts as a background Dr. Brim begins his book with an inquiry into the purposes of the rural school as related to children, adults and organizations. These purposes he finds to be conflicting. They must be evaluated and tested according to the nature of "good life" in its individual and social aspects. Education must bring to the rural people a knowledge of the larger relations of life and must socialize rural-urban relationships. It must keep rural democracy forever studying, discussing, growing. It must not limit its approval to the child to the task of keeping him upon the farm, but must make him see rural in relation to total life. Such a program requires more than the formal and often barren classroom. Library, conference room and workshop are also needed. In the final chapters these principles are related to the selection of subjects, the preparation of teachers and community organization. The book is filled with quotations, states many points of view with fairness, but comes to clear-cut conclusions.

A Remarkable Opportunity to Secure a Beautiful Garment and at the Same Time Render a Beautiful Service

MR. WILLIAM WILLARD HOWARD went to the border of Russia seeking cargoes for his ships and found instead the ghastly tragedy of the exiled nobility and intelligentsia of old Russia. The plight of the Russian gentlewomen especially was pitiable. Mr. Howard immediately conceived the plan of helping these women by giving them employment at making hand-embroidery, hand-sewn Russian Princess blouses and one-piece gowns.

Mr. Howard brought home with him a supply of the most beautiful embroidered blouses ever seen in this country. These blouses sold immediately, so that a permanent relief work was put into operation under the supervision of Anne Louise Howard.

Another thousand, more exquisite than the first thousand, has just arrived. The work of embroidery on these blouses is so artistically done, and is so beautiful in color harmony and design, that you would buy one immediately could you see them. The accompanying illustrations give but a faint idea of their beauty.

Quite apart from the intrinsic merit of the blouses and gowns, each one of which is the original creation of the destitute Russian gentlewoman who made it, is the priceless opportunity of helping these distressed gentlefolk in a way that does not impair their self-respect or wound the most delicate sensibilities.

The prices range from $15.00 to $40.00. Do you not want to order one at once, either for yourself or for a Christmas present? What more beautiful and fitting Christmas present for your friend or daughter could be imagined?

DAY OF PRAYER FOR MISSIONS MARCH 7, 1924.

The first Friday in Lent is observed annually throughout the United States and Canada as the Day of Prayer for Missions. The Council of Women for Home Missions and the Federation of Woman's Boards of Foreign Missions through a joint committee each year publish a program for the day. The theme for this year is "The Spirit of Power."

A card entitled "A Call to Prayer" has been issued as a preliminary aid. This card will be found very useful in preparation for the observance itself.

The program, "The Spirit of Power," is by Mrs. De Witt Knox, who has furnished many previous programs. In the five parts, entitled Praise, Prayer, Purpose, Practise and Power, all hymns and Scripture passages are printed, so that groups not having Bibles and hymnals at the place of meeting, nevertheless have the full text.

Suggestions as to hours, leaders, speakers, etc., and useful information in regard to the Federation and Council are printed on the back. The program is priced, as usual, at two cents each; $1.50 per 100.

BETTER THAN THROWING MONEY AWAY ON ARMS

In his message to Congress the President, speaking of the Army and Navy, said: "Both of these services should be strengthened. . . . Additional planes are needed and additional submarines. . . . We want no weakness that invites imposition."

The News Bulletin of the Foreign Policy Association makes the following comment on the recommendations:

"We may have been imposed on in recent years, but our handling of the situation had something to do with it; and neither submarines nor airplanes will be used to collect our foreign debts or to get our just share of the costs of the Army of Occupation. Nor will we go to war to force a more favorable treaty with the Turks. The Japanese bogey has been laid for many years to come by a tragedy for the relief of which we poured out our instant dollars and our unfeigned sympathy. Is it England, France, Mexico or Canada that we fear? Our present Army and Navy are not paltry affairs. Could not the additional millions be used to better advantage in building up an adequately trained diplomatic service, the need of which has many times been stressed and to which the President briefly refers?"

FOLLOWING ANDRE

Somehow or other Major André seems to be more or less of an American hero. The automobile traveler on the west side of the Hudson next summer will find a tablet at Haverstraw-on-the-Hudson marking the spot where Benedict Arnold held his rendezvous with the British major. The inscription on the tablet runs:

"Between the boulder and the river is the place where Benedict Arnold first met Major John André, Adjutant General of the British Army, to plan for the surrender of West Point to the British. Major André landed from the Vulture the evening of September 21, 1780. Early the following morning the conspirators repaired to the home of Joshua H. Smith, about three miles to the north, where Arnold finally agreed to surrender West Point for ten thousand pounds and a commission in the British Army. From the Smith house André attempted to return to the British lines. He was captured at Tarrytown and tried, convicted and executed as a spy at Tappan, October 2, 1780."

HOW TO AVOID BAD INVESTMENTS

The Government's Counsel to Investors

Every investor should be "on guard." This applies particularly to the small investor.

1. Mining stock. The best looking mine in the world may prove a "white elephant." Mining is a very expensive undertaking and the risks are unusually great.

There are many good mining investments, of course, but this branch of the investment market is generally not for those who work for and depend upon a salary.

2. Oil stock. Drilling for oil is costly. The hazards are great. Oil investments are speculative and in a class with mining investments.

3. In the wake of every important discovery or invention there comes a host of schemes—"airplanes," "radio," "wireless." The promoters of these may have only the best of intentions, but frequently their enthusiasm is about all they have to sell. Look before you leap.

4. Investments in "real estate" situated in some distant place is sometimes as dangerous as mining stock. People have been known to buy swamps advertised as "seashore frontage." Know what you are buying before you invest.

5. "Land development" schemes frequently do not pan out. At best it is a long time before any money comes in from sales. Investment in "new companies" that are going to "sell by mail" should be generally avoided.

6. Patent rights and processes distribution. It is rarely the patentee who makes the money.

7. "New manufacturing methods" should always be closely checked and investigated.

8. An investment requiring a quick decision is often a fake. If there isn't sufficient time to "sleep over it," something is probably wrong.

9. "Special inducements" in cash discounts or stock bonuses urging you to be one of the first to invest are suspicious symptoms.

10. "Tips" alleged to land you "on the ground floor" are rarely to be taken. Those who are "on the ground floor" will monopolize the opportunity.

CHURCH AUTONOMY IN KOREA

Last June Korean leaders in every walk of life commemorated the "meritorious service rendered to the Korean people for the last thirty years along religious, educational and medical lines" by Dr. O. R. Avison. In his response to the Koreans, Dr. Avison said to his hearers:

"The missionaries and the board at home look for an early time when the Christian bodies of Chosen [i.e., Korea] will take upon themselves the responsibility for evangelizing the nation. . . . We look to them to take over the institutions we have founded and conduct them; and in the meantime we hope more or less to gradually withdraw from the position of authority and become helpers until such time as our co-operation can be entirely withdrawn."

How much such a statement means may be judged from the comment on it by the editor of the "Seoul Press." He wrote:

"Being as we are outside the ken of the Christian circle we are not in a position to say positively how far the Korean Christian leaders are prepared for taking over the intimated concession, but from the point of view of the laymen we cannot but rejoice at the prospective opening out to the Koreans of being given control of their own churches. . . . This means progress on the part of the Korean Christians, and is a most hopeful sign. The foreign missionaries have performed a good and great work in this peninsula, but it is for the Koreans themselves to reap the immense rewards to be obtained from that work. The Koreans understand themselves much better than the oldest and most sympathetic foreigner can ever hope to do, and will be able to place the truth before the people in such a manner that they cannot fail to grasp it. No one possessed of clear vision can justly deny that Chosen must and will ultimately take charge of her own church. We congratulate Dr. Avison upon the faith which has enabled him to pave the way for this felicitous consummation of missionary activity."

Eager though we may be to have the Church in all lands control itself, we must confess that in certain countries the indigenous churches have not maintained a very vital sort of Christianity. Can we expect that in the course of centuries the Koreans will succeed better with their Church than they did with their governments? We hope so, certainly.

DR. KELMAN, THE CHURCH, AND THE BIBLE

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

The December 1 weekly sermon by Dr. John Kelman is full of interest, but he seriously marred it by some old anti-Roman ideas lying in the back of his mind, it would seem. When he speaks of accepting the Bible it must be, he says, "on the spiritual experience of men," surely a dangerous conception unlimited or undefined. On the other hand, he pours scorn on the Bible having any authority from the Church of Christ, and he speaks of the Church in the same category as magic lantern slides among the heathen.

I am not a Romanist, not even a High Anglican, but to go to the Bible itself, how often and how exactly its writers speak of the Church. St. Paul, the great Apostle of the Church, to the Church says more than once that it is the Body of Christ. Shall a Christian minister liken with justice or charity the Body of Christ to magic lantern slides?

The New Testament was written by ministers of the Church to members of the Christian Church; it was read in the churches. Without the Church as writer, receiver, guardian, translator, where should we be to-day? There was a Christian Church long before there was a New Testament, and so when Dr. Kelman goes on to say that without the Bible we should know nothing of Jesus Christ, he is telling not facts, but his own theory.

It is a pity that a fine sermon should be marred by the relics of old controversy which come so readily to the preacher's mind.

God, in His wisdom, has seen fit to use the written word, the Bible, and the spoken word, the Church. It behooves us to accept them with thankfulness; to attempt to appreciate them and not to attack the one or the other, because both come through human and therefore faulty and weak channels. Yet, perhaps, by their very humanity they may be adapted the better to speak to us poor mortals.

Yours sincerely,

CHARLES E. FARRAR.

The World of To-day

"THE OBSERVER"

"The New York Observer" started its career one hundred years ago. We print in this issue two articles concerning its noble history. Eleven years ago last summer, on the death of Dr. John Bancroft Devins, THE CHRISTIAN WORK took over the famous old paper. "The Observer," in its day had tremendous influence. It had been truly a family paper, kept its readers informed as to what was going on in the secular world as well as in the religious. They tell this story of Dr. Prime, one of the famous men who made the paper the power that it was for much of its history. Dr. Prime was a man of dignity and presence. One very hot day as he sat in his office in his shirt sleeves, a lady called to see him. She was a stranger to him. He instantly rose and put on his coat. She begged him not to put himself to the trouble of doing so. "Madame," said Dr. Prime, "if I would not do this out of respect to you, allow me to do it out of respect to myself."

THE TREATY WITH TURKEY

On page 789 of this issue we print a memorandum which the American Committee for the Independence of Armenia has submitted to the State Department. Attached to it are the signatures of one hundred and ten prominent men, including Lawrence Abbott, editor of "The Outlook"; Newton Baker, ex-Secretary of War; Governor Channing Cox of Massachusetts; Charles W. Elliott, ex-president of Harvard; Abram I. Elkus and Oscar S. Straus, ex-Ambassadors to Turkey; William Guggenheim, the copper magnate; Professor Albert Bushnell Hart; Harry Pratt Judson; Henry Churchill King, president of Oberlin College; Charles H. Sablin, ex-president of the Guaranty Trust Company, and others of like caliber. So far as our inquiry has been able to gather, the memorandum is pretty accurate in its picture of conditions in Turkey. The other day a Constantinople Turkish paper reached this city with a picture of the famous Gulbenkian Khan on its front page and an account of the seizure of the Khan by the government. The Kemalist functionaries routed out the contents of the great building onto the sidewalk. The Khan is worth sixty thousand Turkish pounds. The Constantinople Y. W. C. A. occupies an attractive, great house, owned by Gabriel Noradounghian. Noradounghian was Foreign Minister of Turkey in 1908, prior to that he had been Minister of the Interior, later he was one of the Senators in Parliament. He is to-day President of the Armenian National Delegation at Paris. A Turkish official called one day recently on the Y. W. C. A. to ask to whom they paid their rent. They told him. "The next time you pay your rent, pay it to us," the official said. "But we have paid six months in advance," explained the Y. W. C. A. secretary. "Very well, at the end of six months, begin to pay it to us."

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

The property of Armenians is being seized constantly on one pretext or another or virtually without pretext. Such strong hints are being dropped to the Armenians that their room is better than their company in Constantinople that they are constantly leaving the city. The number of Armenians in Greece and Bulgaria has doubled in the past year. Dr. Barton and some others of the American Board officials are inclined to approve America's signing the treaty. But we have not hesitated as a nation to refuse to enter into diplomatic relations with Russia and with Mexico on account of what we call moral reasons. We have not entered into relations with Greece, for what reason is not quite clear to most of us. Not a few Armenians whose property has been seized by the Turks are American citizens. Why should we not be concerned that the Turks as well as the so-called Christian powers should deal justly with Americans? Under President Taft we refused to make a new treaty with Russia until her treatment of the Jews improved. If we can deal so with a Christian power in behalf of Jews, why should we not take the same stand with a Moslem power in behalf of abused human beings, even though they are Christians? We still talk of the moral leadership of America in the world. Let us practise it in regard to Turkey.

THE SENATE AND THE WORLD COURT

Most of us are amazed to find that part of the United States Senate is opposed to our entry into the World Court. Can superstitious fanaticism go further than in these Senators who regard the Court as unclean so long as it has about it the faintest suggestion of a connection with the League of Nations? Senators Lodge, Lenroot, Wadsworth and others seem to suffer from as violent a fear of taboo as could any uncivilized Hawaiian. They shake in fear at the thought of everything touched by the League—that dreadful League of Nations, genial restorer of Austria, preserver of peace between Italy and Greece, physician through whose ministrations alone, it seems, Germany can be restored. This organization which is bringing blessing upon blessing in the international life is to our Senatorial Pharisees nothing but a snake in the grass. As a matter of fact the situation in the Senate in regard to the Court to-day stands about as did that of the League of Nations four years ago. "Friends" of the Court are urging reservations, harmless in appearance, but fatal in effect. Senator Lenroot's plan for completely divorcing the Court from the League of Nations probably could not command the necessary two-thirds vote in our Senate and probably, also, would not be supported by the other nations attached to the Court. We trust that President Coolidge will recommend to the Senate such a plan as that which President Harding laid before it last February. Those of us who believe in America's entry into the Court must make our influence felt at Washington if the day is to be saved.

GIVING THE GREEK KING AN AIRING

The Liberals and the Republicans won an overwhelming victory last week in the election of the National Assembly in Greece. The Liberals claim 224 deputies and the Republicans 178 out of the total 402. But owing to the fact that many candidates in the recent election ran both as Liberals and Republicans, both sides now claim them. The real strength of the different parties will only be known when the Assembly convenes on January 2. The Assembly will act also as a constituent assembly and will decide on the future form of government for the country. As soon as it became clear that the Liberals and the Republicans had won, the military, naval and Republican political leaders urged that the government should remove the dynasty. The Cabinet adopted their point of view and ordered the King to leave. They charged that the Glucksburg dynasty prevented Greece from making a timely entry into the World War; that it was due to King Constantine that Greece did not keep its word to Serbia and that Greece surrendered Fort Rupel to the Germans and Bulgarians—a surrender which resulted in the death of eighty thousand people. The King and Queen of Greece made no resistance, but sailed for exile in Roumania. So, after reigning in Greece for sixty-one years, the rule of the Glucksburgs came to an end. The indications are that Greece will declare a republic.

OUR RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

President Coolidge in his message spoke of the possibility of recognizing Russia once it would acknowledge its just debts to American citizens, et cetera. The Soviet Government through a note to President Coolidge signed by Tchitcherin, People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, sent the following note on December 17:

It has been the constant endeavor of the Soviet Government to bring about a resumption of friendly relations with the United States of America based upon mutual trust. With this end in view it has repeatedly announced its readiness to enter into negotiations with the American Government and to remove all misunderstandings and differences between the two countries.

After reading your message to Congress, the Soviet Government, sincerely anxious to establish at last firm friendship with the people and Government of the United States, informs you of its complete readiness to discuss with your Government all problems mentioned in your message, these negotiations being based on the principle of mutual non-intervention in internal affairs. The Soviet Government will continue wholeheartedly to adhere to this principle, expecting the same attitude from the American Government.

As to the question of claims mentioned in your message, the Soviet Government is fully prepared to negotiate with a view toward its satisfactory settlement on the assumption that the principle of reciprocity will be recognized all around. On its part, the Soviet Government is ready to do all in its power so far as the dignity and interests of its country permit to bring about the desired end of renewal of friendship with the United States of America.

That answer seems to conform fully to President Coolidge's specifications. But Secretary Hughes replied:

There would seem to be at this time no reason for negotiations. The American Government, as the President said in his message to the Congress, is not proposing to barter away its principles.

If the Soviet authorities are ready to restore the confiscated property of American citizens or make effective compensation they can do so.

If the Soviet authorities are ready to repeal their decree repudiating Russia's obligations to this country and appropriately recognize them, they can do so.

It requires no conference or negotiations to accomplish these results, which can and should be achieved at Moscow as evidence of good faith.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

The American Government has not incurred liabilities to Russia or repudiated obligations.

Most serious is the continued propaganda to overthrow the institutions of this country. This Government can enter into no negotiations until these efforts directed from Moscow are abandoned.

The United States Consul at Reval will deliver this statement to the Soviet representative at that place for communication to Tchitcherin.

DR. JOWETT

Great Britain and America unite in mourning the passing of John Henry Jowett. Probably it is fair to say that he was the most beloved preacher of his generation. He was only fifty-nine years old. He had burned himself out by his ardent work. He took his university work at Edinburgh and Oxford. His first pastorate was at St. James Congregational Church, New Castle-on-Tyne, from 1889 to 1895. Then he went to the great Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham, England, where he spent sixteen years. The Fifth Avenue Church, after J. Ross Stevenson left it, sought the world around for the right man. Four times it called Dr. Jowett in vain. Then it sent a committee of three officers to Birmingham "to wait" until he did accept. It was in answer to a call of such urgency that he came to New York in 1911. During his pastorate of seven years, the Fifth Avenue Church was crowded Sunday after Sunday. Sometimes, especially during the last year of his ministry, as many people were turned away from the church as were admitted. And the church seats comfortably two thousand persons. From the first sermon to the last Dr. Jowett preached there, it was necessary to admit all members of the church by the side door in order that they might have opportunity of attending worship in their own church. He was one of the two non-conformist clergymen invited to the coronation of King George. He never quite felt that America was his country, and when in 1918 some of the great men of England, including Prime Minister Lloyd George, joined in urging him to return to his native land, he accepted a call to Westminster Chapel, London. While in New York, feeling acutely the need of sparing himself physically, he concentrated most of his energy in the preparation of his sermons. He denied himself generally to public occasions. But he called more or less on the sick in his own parish, and his attention to some of the obscure in that number was remarkable. He was, in many ways, the ideal minister. He possessed eminently that irenic spirit that brings peace and good-will. But that does not mean that there is not a place for ministers of very different qualities from those of John Henry Jowett. Dr. Jowett's great appeal to the Church, last year, to show its colors in regard to war is bearing permanent fruit in the new determination with which the churches not only in America but in most Protestant lands are bearing witness to-day as they have not for centuries that part of their mission is to bring peace on earth.

has suffered a great loss. Dr. Dunning was not only an indefatigable writer, but he wielded a very trenchant and vigorous pen. He was a good fighter for the causes in which he believed. Under his guidance, "The Congregationalist" came to be one of the most influential religious journals in the world. As an interpreter of the various movements in the Church, Dr. Dunning had few superiors. He also influenced the religious life of his denomination and the Church at large in many ways outside the channel of religious journalism. He was one of the most outstanding figures in his denomination and his counsel was sought upon all questions. He was in closest touch with the great missionary movements of the Congregational Boards and had much to do in determining their policy. Through the long years in which the conflict between Conservatism and Liberalism in the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions raged, he preserved a judicial mind that was in great contrast to the course pursued by some of his contemporaries. He was a great traveler and his letters from abroad were intensely interesting. He was very human himself and all that was human interested him. He is gone, but his influence will last long, both in the denomination which he loved and in whose polity he believed and in the religious life of the nation at large.

THE STRATON-POTTER DEBATE

John Roach Straton, the Baptist Fundamentalist of New York, something like a year ago threw out a challenge to William A. Brady, the theater manager, on the moral standards of the stage. Dr. Straton at that time expressed himself so ardently on the cowardice of refusing challenges to debate that when one of the young Unitarian clergymen of New York, Dr. Charles Francis Potter, challenged him to a series of debates on the infallibility of the Bible, the Virgin Birth, et cetera, Straton was forced by his previous record to accept. The first debate was on the infallibility of the Bible. It will probably not have any very great historical interest, but it has made the people of New York discuss the question as perhaps they never have before. Dr. Straton put his argument in very general terms. The preservation of the Bible, its wide sale, fulfillment of its prophecies, such were Dr. Straton's arguments for its infallibility. Dr. Potter showed definitely that in some places the Bible did not agree with science. For instance, Leviticus 11:6 refers to the hare as chewing the cud, which it does not do; Leviticus 11:20 to 22 refers to grasshoppers, crickets and locusts as going on all fours. The Bible makes an error of history, Dr. Potter says, in referring to the birth of Jesus as at the time when Quirinius was governor of Syria. He showed that in some places the Bible contradicts itself. The judges, one of whom was chosen by Dr. Straton and one by Dr. Potter, and the third by agreement of the first two, awarded the debate to Dr. Potter by a vote of two to one. Hundreds and hundreds of people were unable to gain entrance to the church. The debate should be useful in helping people to consider honestly what they mean when they say they believe in the Bible. Out of the Bible have come the greatest inspiration to righteousness and idealism, the noblest idea of God, the greatest help to the consecrated life. Certainly the Bible has in it words of life. But as Dr. Potter showed, its inspiration is not a matter of verbal inerrancy.

A REAL LOSS TO RELIGIOUS JOURNALISM

In the death of Dr. Albert E. Dunning, for so many years the editor of "The Congregationalist," religious journalism

The Christian Campaign for a Warless World

A Declaration of Ideals and Principles

By the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America

THE grim war-system grips the world. Enormous and expensive preparations for war still go on. Reliance upon war as the final resort for assuring national security, maintaining national honor, and settling international disputes still dominates the policies of the nations. This war-system blocks industry, hinders production, consumes capital, dooms millions to hopeless poverty, cripples all movements for the common good, and, worst of all, works spiritual havoc among men. It is the world's chief collective sin.

The task of establishing justice and goodwill between nations, and co-operation for the supremacy of law and abolition of war, is one of the most pressing of all the tasks that to-day confront the churches. The Christians of the whole world should seek with utmost determination to reconcile the nations, to remove their misunderstandings, to banish their hatreds, fears and suspicions, to remove dangerous economic causes of war, and to create among them the spirit of unity and of a noble purpose to work together. The Church Universal should mould the minds and wills of nations, no less than of individuals, to do justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with God.

We recognize that police force for restraint of lawlessness and crime, both national and international, is an obvious necessity. We realize that so long as there is no adequate co-operation of the nations for national security, each nation will rely on its own army and navy, or on alliances or secret agreements for obtaining this end.

But we are convinced that the whole war-system of the nations is unnecessary and un-Christian, that national security, honor and justice and every legitimate national ambition can be achieved and maintained by effective international law and effective agencies for international co-operation. We therefore seek the complete transformation of the spirit of the nations, the creation of the will to justice and peace and the early adoption of a Christian system of international relations. International disputes which involve the risk of war and cannot be solved by the regular processes of diplomacy should be submitted to impartial international tribunals. War should be outlawed by international law, endorsed by the legislatures of every civilized country.

We rejoice in the relief measures continued by our churches through many years in the Near East, Central Europe and Russia, and for the prompt response for the sufferers in the shattered cities of Japan. These works of mercy and Christian goodwill so creative of goodwill should still be carried forward. Appeals now come from the Christians in Japan to help rebuild their ruined churches, schools, hospitals and homes. The plight of half a million refugees in Greece makes an appealing demand upon our sympathy. And an urgent call for help comes from starving millions in Germany.

We believe that if the peoples and governments of the world were for a decade to devote even a fraction of the thought and energy, the men and the money, to practical measures for the establishment of justice, fair dealing, mutual aid and goodwill among the nations which they now devote to the maintenance of armies and navies and to preparations for submarine, aerial and chemical warfare, international fear and suspicion would disappear, war preparations would cease and constructive methods for the peaceful settlement of all disputes would displace the present war-system of the world.

Looking toward the achievement of these ends we earnestly urge:

1. That as a people we continue to give generously of our wealth to help the suffering peoples of other lands. Let us respond heartily to these cries of human need, thus bearing one another's burdens and fulfilling the law of Christ. And let us as a nation, in conference with our debtor nations, make whatever adjustments may be necessary, financial or otherwise, to bring about a friendly and ordered international life, and effective agreements to abandon the war-system and to outlaw war.

2. That the United States become a member of the Permanent Court of International Justice, under the terms stated by the late President Harding in his message to the Senate of February 24, 1923, and urged by President Coolidge in his message to Congress on December 6, 1923.

3. That the United States co-operate with other nations in an efficient international organization wherein all nations may take their full share in establishing world justice, in bearing world burdens and in maintaining world peace, either using for this purpose existing agencies like the League of Nations with such amendment to its Covenant as may be necessary, or proposing some more effective substitute.

4. That every church body in the United States consider the importance of creating a Commission on International Goodwill, composed of its strongest leaders, or make some other adequate provision in order that the Churches of America may take counsel together as churches for effective measures, both national and international, for the establishment of a Christian system of international relations.

AFFIRMATIONS

1. We hereby record our deep gratification upon the establishment of friendly relations between the governments of our own Republic and of our sister Republic Mexico and our earnest hope that the relations of our peoples and governments may grow increasingly friendly and mutually helpful.

2. We deeply feel the pressing importance of conference and co-operation of all nations for the further concerted reduction of armaments. We eagerly await the day when the military and naval forces of all the nations shall be no larger than may be needed for police service in the maintenance of law and order. We express the hope that our Government associating herself in some way with the family of nations. Not only was there no objecting voice from the floor of this meeting, but there was a very general feeling that the pronouncement really represented the convictions of all communions belonging to the Council.

We believe that practically all the communions represented in the Council feel at last that they have in it a common voice, an organ through which Protestants can speak as one great, united body, and that the time has come to openly and frankly recognize this and use it more and more as the mouthpiece of the churches. That this feeling has been greatly intensified during the last few years was distinctly evidenced in the unique session at Columbus, where the representatives of the various communions were given opportunity openly to criticize the Council or make suggestions as to any change that might be desired. There was no criticism except from one or two men, who criticized not for what it was doing, but because it did not make even greater claims to be the mouthpiece of the churches; assume more authority in leadership, not less; and begin now to press toward organic union as well as Christian unity in service. This is more than the Council desires to claim or do. As President Speer insisted, it wishes to be the servant of the churches, not their master. Yet the whole tone of the utterances at this particular meeting revealed the distinct feeling that at last the communions had an organ through which they could unitedly speak, and that that united voice carried greater weight than the voice of any single communion speaking to the world.

Here is the place to say, and say rather emphatically, that this is the greatest asset Protestantism has gained in its history in our country, and that that communion which refuses to participate in it is not only curtailing the power of any united service or message to the world, but is also greatly limiting its own opportunity to make itself felt in the great enterprises of the Kingdom. How much more meaning, on the one hand, the message on international good-will and sympathy would have had to the people of America, Europe and Asia if the three great Protestant communions not in the Council had shared in it, and how little weight, on the other hand, any message from any one of these three acting alone can have. They are virtually shutting themselves off from the universal influence they might have, while at the same time limiting the influence of the united efforts of the other communions.

It is time that these two or three communions not directly associated with the Council began to consider this matter very seriously. Their absence from the Council comes not primarily from distrust of the Federal Council itself, but from distrust of their brother communions. This is not only a serious thing: it is an unchristian thing. Furthermore, there is no ground for it. There is not the slightest basis in the world for believing that the communions in the Federal Council are any less evangelical, any less faithful to the one Lord, any less devoted to great fundamental truth of the Gospels, than those which remain without. We are sometimes moved to think that this distrust of one denomination by another is not because of fear of unfaithfulness to the Gospel, but because other communions do not emphasize some one particularistic feature of the common faith the suspecting communion holds. It is time all this distrust of one communion by another passed away. We say again, it is unchristian, and morally it is unlawful. No denomination has

The Federal Council and the Churches

NO ONE could have followed the meetings of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ, held in Columbus, December 12, 13 and 14, without being impressed with two facts, namely, that it has the confidence of the churches which it serves to a greater degree than ever, and that its work has reached that point where it is truly representative of American Protestantism.

As to the first point, it was significant that a question which has sometimes obtruded itself at previous gatherings, namely as to how far the Council was really representative of the churches, never was raised. It is at last taken for granted that while the Council has no desire to say that when it speaks on any subject it speaks authoritatively for all American Protestantism, yet in every instance at Columbus it was very evident that all the delegates present believed it was really voicing the feeling of American Protestantism, if not of American Christianity. This feeling was so strong that no delegate present insisted that any pronouncements be sent to his communion for ratification before he could pledge his communion to it. The most radical and far-reaching pronouncement of all, that relating to Christianizing our international relationships, was a significant instance. It is really an encyclical on international good-will addressed to the Christian people of America. It takes a very advanced stand on war, armament, the World Court, and America's a right to distrust another which in its creeds and confessions professes its allegiance to Christ and the Gospel. Dr. Speer never said a truer word than when in his great address he said that there could never be any hope of a great, united Protestant movement or success so long as the denominations could not learn to trust one another. In all kindness we call upon those two or three great communions still outside the Council to indulge in a season of strict self-examination, and to ask themselves, do they want forever to cripple the great united Protestant influence that has been created and to limit their own influence in every direction by remaining outside the great federation of Protestantism? Are they willing to stand before the world forever as distrustful of the vast majority of their faithful, evangelic, Christian brethren? Drop your un-Christian attitude and your provincialism and join the mighty army of the Lord, thereby strengthening it greatly, and thereby increasing your own powers a hundred-fold.

The Fundamentalist Controversy

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

INASMUCH as many of our readers do not see the great metropolitan dailies, where the Fundamentalist controversy is being reported in full in these days, it seemed wise to make a fairly comprehensive survey of the progress of the controversy during the last three or four weeks. It has suddenly assumed a really dramatic significance. One of the leading New York dailies devoted practically the whole front page to it last week. The whole controversy is so momentous and so indicative of a real interest in Christian doctrine that all our readers will be glad if we devote considerable space to a review of recent actions.

First of all, let us go back a little and trace some of the events leading up to the present controversy. In the first place, we should be careful in our definitions. There are many conservatives who are not Fundamentalists. Professor William H. Wood, of Dartmouth College, defines a "Fundamentalist" as a "belligerent conservative," and possibly no definition could be more fitting. A belligerent is one who believes in fighting, and that is the spirit and method which characterizes what is known as the "Fundamentalist" movement. As the "Presbyterian Advance" has remarked in a recent editorial, "The organization is not merely one of persons who hold conservative views: it is one of persons who propose that every other Christian must adopt their views." Professor Wood tells us that the movement grew out of a "prophetic conference held in 1918." "The group of men there assembled issued a call for a World Conference on Christian Fundamentals, which was held the next year." Their endeavor was to enroll as many members as possible; to send out teams of speakers all over the country, and to capture as far as possible all the missionary and educational machinery of the churches. These intentions have been pretty thoroughly carried out and at the recent week-long campaign of the Fundamentalists, carried on in Dr. John Roach Straton's church, New York City, practically all of the speakers attacked the secretaries of the missionary boards as being the instruments of the Modernists, and demanded their removal. Also, attempts have been made to reject the International Sunday School Lessons and prepare lessons which set forth the views of the Fundamentalists. So one is not a "Fundamentalist" necessarily because he is conservative, but as the term has come to be technically used, the Fundamentalist is a "fighting conservative"—one who is out on a crusade to compel all members of his denomination to hold his particular point of view.

This particular point of view has been summed up by Mr. Rollin Lynd Hart in an article in the "New York Times" of December 16th. It is the result of conference with many representatives of the movement and is perhaps as fair a summary as could be made:

1. Belief in a miraculously inspired Bible, absolutely without error and authoritative throughout.
2. Belief in a miraculously inspired Virgin Birth of Jesus of Nazareth.
3. Belief in a substitutionary atonement.
4. Belief in the bodily resurrection of Jesus.
5. Belief in His second coming. Many Fundamentalists explicitly declare their belief in "the literal, visible, bodily, imminent return of Jesus Christ to this earth as King." The majority believe that His second coming, though sure to occur, will be long delayed.

For some time the so-called "Modernists" in the Church paid little attention to the movement. Some dramatic incidents happened, such as attempts to pass legislation in some States forbidding the teaching of the doctrine of evolution in the schools and colleges. Mr. Bryan, meantime, was giving his famous lectures on the Bible and on Evolution, both of which took the strictest fundamentalist point of view. Mr. Bryan afterwards published a book, "In His Image," in which these lectures were included, but after a while some of the Liberal leaders in the Church awakened to the fact that a tremendously aggressive campaign was being conducted by the Fundamentalists and examined more closely into their literature and activities. It was found that vast sums of money were being furnished for the flooding of the country with Fundamentalist literature. One of the first to break out into protest, not against the Fundamentalists expressing their points of view, but against their saying that no one could be a Christian or be a member of a particular denomination who did not hold their point of view was Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, who came out in the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church, New York, with a tremendous protest against this sort of proceeding.

The sermon, which attracted wide attention, dealt largely with the question of the Virgin Birth. It did not deny the Virgin Birth, but it did insist that the divinity of Christ and the Incarnation did not necessarily rest upon the physical fact of the Virgin Birth, and that one might be an evangelical Christian if he was not sure of the particular manner in which Christ was born. At the same time others, becoming alarmed at the aggressiveness of the Fundamentalist movement, began to take exceptions to its literature and methods and its policy of excluding all from the fold who did not interpret the Bible and doctrines as did the Fundamentalists. President W. H. P. Faunce spoke out in a pamphlet which attracted much attention. Other leaders in the Presbyterian and Baptist churches also began to insist on the liberty of thought inside the denomination to which they belonged. It was then that the controversy began to assume large proportions and to be carried into the official councils of the churches. The Philadelphia Presbytery, under the leadership of Rev. Clarence E. Macartney, approached various presbyteries in the country looking toward the disciplining of the New York Presbytery for allowing Dr. Fosdick to preach such doctrines in a Presbyterian church. It finally came before the Assembly and ended with the New York Presbytery being asked to look into the matter, which it is now doing, but the debate upon the floor of the Assembly, led by such men as Mr. Bryan on the Fundamentalist side and such men as Dr. Alexander and Dr. Merrill on the Liberal side, showed how wide the chasm was and how bitter the feeling was on the part of the Fundamentalists. It was expected that the controversy would break out at the next convention of the Baptist Church at Atlantic City last spring, but the dramatic incident of Dr. Straton's rising in the public meeting and demanding that President W. H. P. Faunce, who was on the program, be not allowed to speak, aroused such indignation that the guns of the Fundamentalists were practically spiked so far as the convention was concerned. The Baptist Fundamentalists are now threatening to do everything in their power to capture the next convention. Since that time things have been reasonably quiet in the Baptist communion until recently, when Dr. John R. Straton demanded that Dr. James H. Franklin, Secretary of the Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Church, be dismissed because he was allowing missionaries of heretical tendencies to go into the foreign field. Also, Dr. Straton recently arranged for a week's series of meetings when leading Fundamentalists were brought from all over the country to address the public, which is understood to be the beginning of a very active and aggressive campaign on their part here in the East. A series of debates has also just been arranged between Dr. Straton and Dr. Potter of West Side Unitarian Church on the points listed above.

There has been no trouble in the Congregational fold because their ministry enjoy such individual liberty of thought and discussion that questions of heresy arouse no contention in the denomination.

In the Episcopal communion things had been fairly quiet until Dr. Percy Stickney Grant suddenly broke loose in the Church of the Ascension, New York, and stirred the Episcopal communion to its depths by asserting one Sunday morning that "Christ did not have the power of God." Nobody knew just what he meant, probably Dr. Grant did not know himself, but the assertion immediately brought down upon him an avalanche of protests which led him to unburden his heart, and it was revealed that he is in the foremost ranks of the Modernists. The Bishop of New York finally took up the matter and there was considerable correspondence between the Bishop and Dr. Grant, which finally ended with matters resting practically where they were. Meantime, Dr. Grant has been expressing himself freely on doctrinal matters.

The next incident in the Episcopal Church which attracted universal attention was an address by Dr. Lawrence, Bishop of Massachusetts, to the clergy of his diocese. This address has since been published in a little book entitled, "Fifty Years." It is the story of the theological transformation going on in the Bishop's mind during the last thirty years and is an exceedingly interesting little volume, but the passage which thoroughly shocked the conservative membership of the Protestant Episcopal communion was that which dealt with the question of the Virgin Birth. Bishop Lawrence took practically the same view as that taken by Dr. Fosdick, that there is no essential connection between the belief in the Virgin Birth and the belief in the Incarnation. Bishop Lawrence's words on this particular point have attracted so much attention and mean so much in this present controversy that we are quoting them here in full:

"I was brought up to believe that 'Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord, was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary;' and in my earlier ministry assumed, as has been assumed throughout a large part of the Christian era and in Christian theology, that this fact was an essential element in the Incarnation. It is now well recognized that scholars are divided upon the question of the Virgin Birth, as to whether the stronger evidence leads to the confirmation of this as a fact, or whether it is a tradition which must be re-examined. These scholars are not mere critics and sceptics, but are upon either side men of equal reverence, faith and belief in the Incarnation. With the conservatism of my nature, I have always acceded to the tradition, but with a mind open to further light. Some thirty years ago, however, I was convinced that there is no essential connection between the belief in the Virgin Birth and a belief in the Incarnation. In giving expression to that conviction, which was founded on the careful study of a few American scholars, I was charged by friends dear to me, with heresy. It is now a source of satisfaction to read in Bishop Gore's later works, wherein he is defending the doctrine of the Virgin Birth, that he has come to the same conclusion. There are, as we well know, clergymen, a number of them, who find it difficult, if not impossible, to accept the doctrine of the Virgin Birth, whose belief in the Incarnation is sincere and firm; indeed, whose belief has been made the firmer by their release from this doctrine. Their reasons are to them convincing, and inasmuch as the two creeds stand for the essentials of the faith, and as belief in the Virgin Birth is not to them an essential, I am clear that with an honest heart they may join in the recital of the creeds. I well know that this position may bring sorrow to those whose faith in the Incarnation, whose habits of thought and worship have been interwoven with the doctrine of the Virgin Birth. But their interpretation of the creeds and their comfort in them are in no way affected by the different interpretations of others."

In the meantime the case of Rev. L. W. Heaton, rector of Trinity Episcopal Church, Fort Worth, Texas, began to attract national attention. Mr. Heaton had made statements about the Virgin Birth of the same purport as those of Bishop Lawrence. He said: "For instance, there are those who cling with unquestioning minds to the doctrine of the Virgin Birth as a statement of physical fact, while others have been moved to analyze it and have discovered new spiritual truths that transcend what the form of words thus imperfectly express. There are those among us who believe that Jesus was in all things and in every way both God and man; the incarnation of God and the son of Joseph. This is my own opinion, and there is room in the Church for those who must reconcile theology with religion." This utterance was brought to the attention of his bishop and after several conferences and considerable correspondence between Bishop Moore and Mr. Heaton it is generally understood that Mr. Heaton will be brought to trial for his words. The moment this probability arose the Modern Churchmen's Union, an organization comprising about five hundred Protestant Episcopal ministers of liberal views, rallied to Mr. Heaton's defense, and this organization is now collecting funds for the trial and expects to stand behind him with the full weight of their endorsement. Meantime, on November 14th and 15th, the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church met in Dallas, Texas, to formulate a pastoral letter, which was read in all of the Protestant Episcopal churches of the country. It is quite generally felt that this letter was called forth by the expressions of the Bishop of Massachusetts. It takes particular pains to state that objections to the doctrine of the Virgin Birth are contrary to the Christian tradition and to the creeds. This letter is so important that we are quoting that part of it that bears directly upon the present controversy:

A clergyman, whether deacon, priest or bishop, is required as a condition of receiving his ministerial commission to promise conformity to the doctrine, discipline and worship of this Church. Among the offenses for which he is liable to be presented for trial is the holding and teaching, publicly or privately and advisedly, doctrine contrary to that of this Church, individual aberrations, in teaching or practice, however, are regrettable and censurable, but should not be taken to supersede the deliberate and written standards of the Church. It is irreconcilable with the vows voluntarily made at ordination for a minister of this Church to deny, or to suggest doubt as to, the facts and truths declared in the Apostles' Creed.

To deny, or to treat as immaterial, belief in the creeds in which at every regular service of the Church both minister and congregation profess to believe is to trifle with words and cannot but expose us to the suspicion and danger of dishonesty and unreality. Honesty in the use of language—to say what we mean and mean what we say—is not least important with regard to religious language, and especially in our approach to Almighty God, however imperfect to express divine realities we may recognize human words to be. To explain away the statement, "Conceived by the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary," as if it referred to a birth in the ordinary way, of two human parents, under, perhaps, exceptionally holy conditions, is plainly an abuse of language. An ordinary birth could not have been so described, nor can the words of the Creed fairly be so understood.

Objections to the doctrine of the Virgin Birth or to the bodily resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ are not only contrary to the Christians tradition, but have been abundantly answered by the best scholarship of the day.

It is not the fact of the Virgin Birth that makes us believe in our Lord as God; but our belief in Him as God makes reasonable and natural our acceptance of the fact of the Virgin Birth as declared in the Scriptures and as confessed in the Creed from the earliest times.

The Creed witnesses to the deliberate and determined purpose of the Church not to explain but to proclaim the fact that the Jesus of history is none other than God and Saviour, on whom, and on faith in whom, depends the whole world's hope of redemption and salvation.

So far from imposing fetters on our thought, the Creeds with their simple statement of great truths and facts without elaborate philosophical disquisition, give us a point of departure for free thought and speculation on the meaning and consequences of the facts revealed by God. The truth is never a barrier to thought. In belief, as in life, it is the truth that makes us free.

The letter was received by the various rectors of the churches, but upon one of them, Dr. Leighton Parks, rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, one of the most prominent churches, it produced a very marked effect. Dr. Parks became so enraged by it after the letter was read in his church on Sunday morning by one of the curates that he took off his regular vestments, and in his doctor's gown returned to the pulpit and freed his mind in most impassioned manner. The sermon fell like a thunder-bolt into the ranks of the Episcopal Church. It is all right to try a comparatively unknown preacher from Fort Worth, Texas, for heresy, but it is another thing to bring to trial one of the most outstanding figures in the communion and the rector of one of the richest parishes in the United States. Dr. Parks even demanded that they try him for heresy instead of Mr. Heaton. Dr. Parks's sermon is so interesting that we print it on page 781.

Of course, the accession of such men as Bishop Lawrence and Dr. Parks to the ranks of the Modernists has given them great courage. The thing that stirred Dr. Parks to the depths was the apparent questioning in the Bishops' pastoral of the integrity of the clergy. He insists that the Bishops are not the sole defenders of the doctrines of the Church. In matters of doctrine their power is carefully restricted, and not one jot or tittle of the doctrine of the Church may be added to or subtracted from by all the bishops in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Doctrine can only be changed by a concurrent vote of the bishops with the clerical and lay deputies to the General Convention. For the Bishops to speak as if they were the sole defenders of the faith is contrary to the constitution of the Episcopal Church. Dr. Parks insists that the Protestant Reformation gave to every priest equal power with the bishops, in matters of faith. He insists that he is just as responsible for the purity of the doctrine taught in his parish as the bishop of the diocese is in his larger field. He says: "For almost fifty years I have tried by the help of God to be diligent in prayer and in the reading of the Holy Scriptures. Now, then, after passing many hours in that study, when I come before my people to teach them in the light of that prayer and study, am I to be told that I am 'dishonest' because I do not happen to agree with what those good bishops say?" Dr. Parks takes the same ground on the Virgin Birth as that taken by Bishop Lawrence and Dr. Fosdick. He said that there was a widespread belief that this letter of the Bishops is directed against the Bishop of Massachusetts, but that they would not dare to bring the Bishop to trial. It would shake the church to its foundation. Then he said: "I will now ask why they don't bring me to trial. I am not a distinguished rector, but for many years I have been preaching things which the Bishops condemn." (Dr. Parks is a very distinguished rector in spite of his denial, and this is one of the reasons he will not be brought to trial.) He said that he would consider it an honor to be deposed from the Church for anything he has said publicly or privately. He said that the Rev. Dr. W. Russell Bowie, of Grace Church, New York, and Rev. Elwood Worcester, of Emmanuel Church, Boston, held the same views as Bishop Lawrence, and then he asked why they did not bring Lawrence and Bowie and Worcester and himself to trial. "They will not do that, but there is a poor, friendless, but not altogether helpless man whom it is proposed to bring to trial for saying the same things that Lawrence and Worcester and Bowie and many others have been saying for many years." He referred, of course, to Mr. Heaton.

On Sunday, December 16th, Dr. Percy Stickney Grant, of the Church of the Ascension, New York City, assailed the Bishops' pastoral in his morning sermon. He believed that a great many clergymen and even bishops in the Protestant Episcopal Church did not accept the point of view of this pastoral. He also insisted that the Bishops have no right to define doctrine; that "our Church can only undertake something like that in General Convention, that meets every three years and consists of the House of Bishops and other members, who may be clergymen delegates or lay delegates."

On this same morning Dr. William P. Merrill, the well-known pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York, warned the public that in no sense should the debates which are to be held by Dr. Straton and Dr. Potter be taken as a debate or a series of debates between a representative conservative and a representative liberal. He said:

It should be clearly understood that each of the parties is representing only his own point of view. Particularly, it should be emphasized that neither of these extremists represents the great body of evangelical liberals who are loyal to the great evangelical doctrines in a way which makes it quite impossible for a Unitarian minister to represent their attitude and yet do not hold these doctrines in the extreme and narrow form in which Dr. Straton holds them.

Also, on this same Sunday morning Dr. Karl Reiland, of St. George's Episcopal Church, New York City, preaching to Princeton undergraduates in Alexander Hall, took the side of the Modernists. He defined the Fundamentalist as one who stood for fixity in belief, whereas the Modernist stood for flexibility, or, to quote his own words:

The Fundamentalist represents a type of mind. The fundamentalist attitude of mind has existed in every age. So has the modernist. The Fundamentalist stands for fixity. The Modernist stands for flexibility. The first stands for antiquity of tradition. The latter stands for achievement of truth. Jesus was a Modernist in conflict with the fundamentalist Jews. Paul was a Modernist in conflict with the fundamentalist apostles. So was Galileo with the Inquisition; Pasteur with the Academy of Science. To-day modernist and scientific scholars are in conflict with Fundamentalists who contend for inerrant Scriptures and a literal Bible; or the fundamentalist bishops with their literal and fixed interpretation of the creeds. The objects of this attitude of mind differ, but the static attitude and temperament of fixity remains the same.

The laymen have also joined the controversy. Mr. Glenn Frank, the brilliant editor of "The Century" magazine, has come out boldly for modernism in two recent issues. In the "Presbyterian Advance" for December 6 there is a two-page letter from Mr. Bryan, who has not only restated his own position in a letter to Dr. James E. Clark, but says, in referring to the Liberals, whom he claims were defeated in the late General Assembly: "Ever since their defeat the Liberals (you among them) have been doing everything possible to disturb the harmony of the Church. Men like yourself, who hold the Christian masses in contempt, will either have to come back to the Bible and fellowship with them or herd by themselves under the name of Josephites or some other name which will indicate the difference between them and Christians."

According to Dr. Curtis Lee Laws, editor of "The Watchman-Examiner," which is a national Baptist organ with Fundamentalist leanings, a crisis in the case of the Board of Foreign Missions has developed as a result of the doctrinal controversy between Fundamentalists and Modernists:

It involves the sum of more than twelve million dollars which the Baptists have pledged themselves to raise to meet missionary deficits before May 1 of next year. Fear is expressed that if the present controversy continues to rage, all Baptist missionary enterprises will be ruined and may cease altogether by the end of next year, except on a very limited scale.

Unwillingness of those on one side to put up money for the spread of the kind of gospel preached by their antagonists has resulted in a financial pinch that threatens the whole missionary enterprise. In the case of the Baptists the situation has become so serious that I freely admit that I am fearful that those whose views I represent may go too far without recognizing the damage done. Recently I issued a warning that Baptists' foreign mission work must not be wrecked and ruined by those who think that others are wrecking and ruining it. I have asked that those who have made pledges should not withdraw, diminish or divert their contributions elsewhere. To meet the deficit and take up the slack of the New World Movement we must raise $12,-161,521 within the next five months.

In this article we have recorded the stages of the controversy up to date. What may happen between this writing and the appearance of THE CHRISTIAN WORK we do not know, but the controversy has reached the stage where a good many things are bound to happen in the next few days. Perhaps everybody is most interested just now as to what steps the Bishop of New York will take in regard to Dr. Parks's challenging sermon.

NYILAK AND OTHER AFRICAN SKETCHES

By MABEL EASTON. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. pp. 95. $1.00.

Miss Easton is a missionary of the African Inland Mission, stationed at Dungu, in the Belgian Congo. Miss Easton adds to a happy style a very real love for her African brothers and sisters. She lets us see the real people with whom the missionaries deal. She writes with something of the charm of Miss Jean McKenzie. That the missionaries bring greater sweetness, greater peace, better ideals into the lives of the Africans is, of course, beyond question. But we are glad of the incidental evidence in what Miss Easton has written that she and her fellows had some recognition of the Africans' own arts. For instance, at Christmas they gave aprons of native bark cloth to the women. We are only sorry that even missionaries who appear in many ways to have so just an attitude toward the native life should at the same time be so insistent upon dressing the school children in European clothes. Miss Easton recognizes—as who must not?—the lovely beauty of the human body. She writes of a bronze African Mercury. Then why cannot she and her fellow workers have enough faith in God to let dear little boys and girls and their fathers and mothers dress in their healthy "undress" of brief loin cloth or bark cloth aprons? Let us not bring to the Negro the mistaken ideas of the white man at the same time that we are casting out old demons.

By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE. Duffield and Company, New York. pp. 240.

A story from the author of the "Book of Golden Deeds" is a rare gift and this book is a classic. Parents who wish their children to have books which are not only thrilling but also accurate and in good English will look on this book as a treasure. Why the fields of Normandy were rich while France was marsh or waste, why monasteries were needed to protect farmers, how the King of France had only one set of glass windows for all his houses, how the Northmen lived in France, how they built castles with niches three feet deep to keep out the rain—such things are mentioned incidentally, but mean that the author studied the period for months. The type is large and clear. The hero is Richard of Normandy, who in 943 at the age of eight became Duke. He was father-in-law of King Canute.

The Books of 1923 I Have Liked Best

PART II—BIOGRAPHIES AND NOVELS.

LAST week I listed the religious books of 1923, and some dealing with social problems, that I had enjoyed most in 1923. To-day I am naming the biographies and one or two novels. I suppose that everybody will expect me to begin this list with Papini's "Life of Christ." I shall not, for, to be perfectly frank, I did not find much in it. It was interesting as an example of how an agnostic found Christ, and found Him so wonderful and lovely that he had to share Him with his fellow-countrymen. But the book itself threw no new light on the Master and I soon tired of the rhetoric and rhapsody. Bishop Headlam's "Life of Christ" was much more scholarly and really threw light on some aspects of the eternal, inexhaustible personality of Jesus.

To begin, then, early in the year one of the most charming bits of autobiography I have seen for years fell into my hands—"Old Memories," by Sir Henry Jones (The Doran Company). Sir Harry, as everybody called him in Glasgow, was the professor of philosophy in Glasgow for many years. His last book, "A Faith That Enquires," was his greatest and was a very remarkable book. Some of my readers will remember his visit to this country five years ago with the group of British professors who came as the guests of the Institute of Education. Everybody hung upon the words of this dear old man with his white locks and great white beard falling far down on his bosom. He left this short but perfectly charming story of his boyhood. I never read a more entrancing picture of childhood life in humblest circumstances nor a more encouraging story of the securing of an education amidst scenes of extreme poverty. Yet the whole setting is beautiful in spite of the poverty and hardship. Everyone to whom I have recommended this little book has thanked me. It is a classic to put on the shelf beside "Margaret Ogilvy."

Jumping from the beginning of the year to the close, Scribner's have just published another story of how a boy found his way from humblest circumstances to greatness, "From Immigrant to Inventor," by Michael Pupin. This book is on a large scale, but holds one spellbound to the end. Talk about romance—here one has it. A shepherd boy of Serbia finds his way all alone to America; knowing no English and with five cents in his pocket, he finds work after much hardship; eventually works his way through Columbia University; wins scholarships and studies mathematics and physics at Cambridge and Berlin; becomes one of our greatest scientists and publicists. The book is full of most illuminating comment upon American institutions, education and ideals. It is also full of the poetry of science. I spent a whole night with the book.

To go back to the beginning of the year, one of the most delightful books of reminiscences I have read for years is that by my good friend, Arthur Porritt, editor of "The Christian World," London. Porritt has known everybody in Great Britain during the thirty years of his working life, and they all walk through the pages of "The Best I Remember" (The Doran Company). The book is full of delightful gossip and one meets the great preachers, statesmen, editors and publicists face to face. It is like having personal interviews with them. It is also full of delightful stories.

"My Musical Memories" (Scribner's), by Walter Damrosch, the great orchestral conductor, is another book full of reminiscences, but from an entirely different world than Porritt's or any of the others. Hence its charm for me. Here one meets all the musical celebrities of the last fifty years; gets glimpses into the world of symphony orchestras, Wagner operas, meets great composers and great artists. In addition to all this, it is the story of a tremendously brave and courageous struggle, the story of pioneer work in the field of music. It broadens the horizon of the average reader wonderfully.

A strange story, but one of great religious and psychological interest, came out early in the year from the Macmillan Company, "Religious Experience of John Humphrey Noyes," by George Wallingford Noyes. Noyes was the founder of the Oneida Community, which grew out of the great religious revival of 1830-1834. Noyes was converted in that revival and became the chief apostle of the "Perfectionists," as they came to be called. I suppose it is difficult for the people of this generation to take either sin or salvation so seriously as Noyes did, and the doctrine of "Perfection," in its strict doctrinal sense, is not widely held. But the book is one of the most interesting human documents of recent years and the student of unique religious experiences and of psychology will revel in it. I would not have missed it for anything.

In the early spring two large volumes fell into my hands and I read them with amazement. I have known David Starr Jordan for twenty years, known how he had touched life at innumerable points, but until I read this great autobiography, "The Days of a Man" (The World Book Company), I had not quite realized how extensively he had delved into the secrets of the universe—especially the depths of the sea. Probably no man living has so wide acquaintance with the fishes of the sea, and the fossil fishes of the rocks, and with all the strange animals that haunt the depths of the ocean. The story of his scientific research and travels is fascinating. Even more so is the story of Leland Stanford University and education. Even more so still the story of how he became interested in international peace—as a biologist. War is the foolishlest thing man ever invented, he shows us, for it is always taking off the best, leaving the weak and unfit to breed and to carry on the world. Thus, war not only contradicts Christianity, it contradicts nature.

Dr. Jordan has not only summed up his life work in this great book, but also his philosophy.

The end of 1923 has brought two most interesting autobiographies with it—two quite different types of books. One is Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst's "My Forty Years in New York" (Macmillan Company), which is a story of activities and crusade, and "Fifty Years" (Houghton, Mifflin Company), by Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts, which is a story of spiritual and religious development and change. Dr. Parkhurst's autobiography has some extremely interesting pictures of a New England boyhood with much comment on religious education and training of children. The whole story just exudes wisdom. The chapter in which he tells how he defeated Tammany stir one's blood. The extracts from the sermons he preached at that time are about the best things since Amos got after the politicians of his day. Can anything be lovelier than this sentence: "'The wicked flee when no man pursueth,' and they make still better time when somebody is after them." "Fifty Years" is an expansion of a paper read by Bishop Lawrence before the clergy of his diocese. It made a great impression and caused much comment because of some of its rather radical statements about creedal interpretation. I will not go into that and the book will soon receive full review in THE CHRISTIAN WORK. The reason it so deeply interested me was that it is not only a remarkable story of spiritual experience and of the passing through doubt into a larger but firmer faith, but because it is also the story of the theological transition of hundreds during the last fifty years.

I have no space left to talk about the novels I have most enjoyed. I will merely mention the five—I do not say they are the best novels of the year. Many would say they are not. They are merely the five I read with most engrossment. The first was "The Cathedral" (Doran Company), by Hugh Walpole, a tremendous story of fatalism and of pride going before a fall, with the great cathedral (Durham?) overshadowing all; "The Church on the Avenue" (Dodd, Mead and Company), by Helen Martin: a story of a conservative minister and church facing refractory and reactionary kings of industry in a great mill town; "Men Like Gods" (The Macmillan Company), by H. G. Wells: a story of an Englishman's experience in Utopia; "A Son at the Front" (Scribner's), by Edith Wharton: a story of the war, with all the reserve and the exquisite art that characterizes all of Mrs. Wharton's stories; and "Bread" (E. P. Dutton and Company), by Charles G. Norris: a remarkably sympathetic picture of the life of the working girls (the stenographers especially) of New York City and the conflict between love and the craving for independence.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Intellectual Integrity, or the Equal Rights of Fundamentalist and Modernist in a Comprehensive Church

[By Rev. Leighton Parks, D.D.

Rector of St. Bartholomew's (Episcopal) Church, New York]

[The following is the great sermon in which Dr. Parks, a week ago last Sunday, took up the gauge of battle flung out by the Protestant Episcopal Bishops in their Pastoral Letter, quoted on page 778 of this issue.]

"Moreover, it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful."—1 Corinthians 4:2.

AS the services for the second Sunday in Advent call attention to the Bible, so do the services for this day call attention to the ministry, and in the Epistle you have just heard read the Apostle says that the most important thing is the intellectual integrity of the ministry. His intellectual integrity had been called in question, if not by the Apostles at Jerusalem, certainly by those who were close to them, who were telling the people whom Paul was giving his life to save that he was a deceitful man and that they ought not to trust him. And his answer is, "It is a small matter with me to be judged of you or of any man's judgment. He that judgeth me is the Lord."

I did not wish to call your attention to such a question as this, especially as we draw near to the Christmas season, but I am required by the Canons of the Church to see that the Pastoral Letter is read to the congregation, and inasmuch as that Pastoral Letter does more than suggest that there are clergy preaching from our pulpits and ministering at our altars who are guilty of dishonesty, I feel it my duty to enter an emphatic protest.

I can understand that some good man or woman, having learned that this was to be the subject brought before you this morning, may have said, "It is a pity that our rector should put himself in opposition to the teachings of the Church." But I would have you remember that I am not only the minister of this particular congregation, but that at my ordination I solemnly promised to "use all faithful diligence to banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrines contrary to God's Word, and to use both public and private monitions and exhortations, as well to the sick as to the whole, within my cures, as need shall require, and occasion shall be given." I come before you, therefore, this morning as a doctor of theology, fulfilling the duty which I undertook to perform at my ordination.

There are several things in this letter which must meet with the approval of all good and intelligent people, and certain parts of it cannot fail to rejoice the heart of the Modernist. I am sure that the Bishops are good men, and that they have put forth this letter in the sincere hope that thereby they might serve the Church. It is, therefore, to be considered as sympathetically as possible, and to be protested against only if it shall be found to contain "strange" doctrine.

I. Is this a "Pastor Letter"? [Dr. Parks questions the validity of the Bishop's communication as a "Pastoral Letter."]

II. The Modernism of the Bishops. This letter is one of the effects produced by the tidal wave of modernism sweeping through all the churches; and the attempt of those who call themselves Fundamentalists to check the rising tide of knowledge, and as I believe, of spiritual life in the churches, has manifested itself in ways that must distress refined and intelligent people. In the Baptist Church the Fundamentalists have manifested a spirit of vulgarity which is shocking. I do not think Dr. Grant has overstated the case in his comments upon the controversy in that church. In the Presbyterian Church a spirit of obscurantism, identifying religion with exploded theories of the origin of the universe and of man, has made the late meeting of the General Assembly of that venerable Church ridiculous.

Our Bishops have not been guilty either of vulgarity or obscurantism. Indeed, they show evidence of the spirit of modernism. The statement that "the Christian faith may be distinguished from the forms in which it is expressed as something deeper and higher and more personal" could not have been found in any letter put forth by the House of Bishops forty or even twenty years ago. Also, that they should call in the "best scholars" to bear witness is deeply significant. But perhaps the most significant illustration of the spirit of modernism is found in the fact that they have abandoned the old orthodox position which insisted that the divinity of Christ was dependent upon the miracles, and recognize the miracles to be the natural effects produced by a Divine Personality.

They also show the spirit of modernism by recognizing that human words are inadequate to express divine realities. When, however, they deny the liberty which they enjoy in the interpretation of ten of the articles of the Creed, to the interpretation of the two articles which refer to the Incarnation and the Resurrection, it will seem to some that they are inconsistent in logic and show signs of what may be called "arrested development" in their modernism. Certainly, those who have entered into the larger liberty which has come as the result of years of struggle have no desire to point the finger of scorn at those who have not gone the whole way on the journey. They should recognize that this "arrested development" of the Bishops probably means no more than they are resting. They have been wearied by the journey, and however much it is to be regretted that their weariness should manifest itself in denunciation of those who have gone further along on the road to freedom, the "progressives" should rejoice as they note how great has been the advance of the whole army of the faithful.

As we look back over the history of the Church in the past sixty years we see what advance has been made. When Dr. Temple publicly asserted that the Holy Scriptures showed a gradual development in knowledge, in morality, in the conception of the character of God, he was denounced and would have been put out of the English Church had he not been protected by the laity. Yet that man lived to become the Archbishop of Canterbury, honored in all the churches; and that which was deemed his heresy is now a commonplace. When Bishop Colenso questioned the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch and called attention to the fact that the numbers used in that ancient document were grossly exaggerated, he was deposed by the Synod of the South African Church, but on appeal was justified by the Church of England. Some of us can remember when his name was coupled with that of Arius, almost with that of Judas. Yet his "heresy" is now admitted probably by all the Bishops. Frederick Dennison Maurice, one of the greatest prophets and philosophers and saints of the English Church, was inhibited from preaching for a long period because he denied that the word "aconian" was equivalent to "everlasting." When Dr. William R. Huntington and the late Dr. McKim accepted that teaching and refused to declare that they believed in the everlasting torture of the lost, the one was refused ordination for a long time and the other was denied the honor of the Episcopate. Yet how many of the Bishops feel themselves called upon to preach the old doctrine of "hell fire"? Bishop Clark, ultimately the Presiding Bishop of this Church, told me that his ordination to the diaconate was held up for months because he could not get the Bishop to agree that a man who was unable to accept the orthodox teaching concerning the nature of the resurrection of the body would be a faithful minister of the Church. Yet which of the Bishops believes in the resurrection of the body as it had been believed from early times? Phillips Brooks was denounced as a heretic because he would not fall into the heresy of Apollinarius! Every one of the "heresies" of the past the Bishops have found means of incorporating into their interpretations of the orthodox faith of the Church, and therefore we rejoice.

But now we come to the consideration of questions which are vital. The first is this:

III. Are the Bishops the sole defenders and definers of doctrine? If they are, then certainly I have no right to speak to you, and all you have to do is to listen to what the Bishops say. Now, that question is not to be tested by emotion nor decided by prejudice. We are to find out, if we can, what is the opinion of our Church in regard to this matter. When, then, we turn to the Constitution of this Church we see that the power and authority of the Bishops in matters of doctrine is carefully restricted. How could it have been otherwise? We know that some of the men who collaborated in the formation of the Constitution of the United States lent their aid in drawing up a constitution for the Protestant Episcopal Church. Every student of American history knows that one of the things the founders of the Federal Constitution felt it most necessary to do was to limit the power of the executive lest it encroach upon the legislative and judicial branches of the Government. They set up a balance of power, so that the executive could never encroach upon the other departments of the Government. Is it to be supposed that when those same men drew a constitution for a democratic, constitutional church they would have given unlimited power to the Bishops? We know that the political suspicion of the encroachment of the executive but faintly reflects the deep suspicion of the American people at the close of the Revolution concerning the introduction of the Episcopate. We know that even Bishop White, the father of our American Church, seriously considered the substitution of a Presbyterian for an Episcopal ministry. When, now, we examine the Constitution we find that not one jot or tittle of the statement of the doctrine of this Church may be added to or subtracted from by any individual bishop or all the bishops combined. They cannot change a single line or word of our formularies without the concurrent action of the Lower House, composed of clergy and laity, voting separately in regard to every such proposed change and at two separate conventions. The Bishops are carefully restricted by the Constitution of the Church, and for them to speak as if they were the sole definers of the faith is contrary to the very constitutional provision under which they live.

Of course, the Bishops recognize this. But what some of them are inclined to say is that "While the Constitution is careful to limit our authority so that we may not do certain things, it can in no way limit that authority which from the early days of the Church has always been granted to the Bishops. It is a fundamental element," they say, "of the Catholic tradition that all questions of doctrine shall finally be decided by the bishop of the diocese or by the united voice of the Episcopate." I do not propose to discuss the origin or the continuance of the Catholic tradition, nor what it means for various reasons. . . . We do not know when it began; we do not know exactly what it says. But one thing we do know: that is, when it came to an end. It came to an end at the Protestant Reformation, when the English Church deliberately broke with the Catholic tradition, and in the ordination of priests did that which no other Church had ever done—gave to each priest of this Church co-ordinate authority with the bishop for the defense and definition of the faith. When I was presented to the bishop to be ordained I was asked these questions: "Will you be ready, with all faithful diligence, to banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrines contrary to God's Word?" "Are you persuaded that the Holy Scriptures contain all doctrine required as necessary for eternal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ? And are you determined, out of the said Scriptures, to instruct the people committed to your charge; and to teach nothing as necessary to eternal salvation but that which you shall be persuaded may be concluded and proved by the Scriptures?" I was also asked this question, "Will you be diligent in prayers and in reading the Holy Scriptures, and in such studies as help to the knowledge of the same, laying aside the study of the world and the flesh?" Now, if you will turn to the office for the Consecration of Bishops you will note that the Bishops make the same pledges in regard to the Scriptures and doctrine which they made at their ordination as priests; that no authority is given to them which had not been given to them as priests, with one exception: In the fourth question to the Bishops this clause is added: "And both privately and openly to call upon and encourage others to the same." This gives added authority in matters of discipline, but none in questions of doctrine. Am I to be told after almost fifty years of labor in this Church that I am a dishonest man unless I am prepared to accept a statement of doctrine put forth by the Bishops, acting perhaps under the authority of the Catholic tradition but contrary to the Constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church and the ordination vows of the individual ministers? . . .

All this talk about the Catholic tradition is having a very subtle and, in my judgment, very dangerous effect upon the Church. How frequently we hear good and intelligent people say, "Why does not the bishop put out of the Church this or that man with whose opinions I do not agree, whose manners I do not admire, and whose practices I think undignified?" It would be just as sensible to ask, "Why does not Governor Smith put in jail the editors of some of the yellow journals who seem to be preaching anarchy, fanning the flame of envy, encouraging revolution?" The answer is that if Governor Smith were to put any of those men in jail without due process of law he would find himself in jail. If the bishop of this diocese were to attempt to remove from the ministry of the Church men whom you and I do not approve of or like, he himself would be removed from the Church. This is a constitutional Church, and bishops and clergy can be deposed only by due process of law. . . .

IV. The Authority of the Creed. The next question to which I would call your attention is, What is the authority on which the Apostles' Creed rests? The Bishops in their letter tell us that it is to be interpreted by the Nicene Creed. Inasmuch as they appeal to the Nicene Creed, it might be remembered that the Apostles' Creed in the form in which we now have it was not crystallized until centuries after the meeting of the Council of Nicaea in 325 A. D. The Apostles' Creed is the expression of a slow evolution which went on for centuries. Therefore, a creed set forth in 325 cannot be the interpreter of a creed which was not finished until centuries later.

1. But in my judgment they have been more unfortunate still when they come to deal with those two articles which they say can be interpreted only in one way. For when we turn to the Nicene Creed we find that the article which deals with the Resurrection of our Lord says, "And the third day he rose again, according to the Scriptures." I am well aware that many scholars interpret this to mean that he rose from the dead as had been prophesied in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, but I know no reason why it should not be interpreted as meaning that he rose from the dead as the New Testament declares. But leaving that question aside, in regard to which I do not pretend to speak with authority, let me remind you that the Nicene Creed itself refers us back to the Scriptures, declines to deal with the case, saying, "This court has no jurisdiction to try that case. It must be tried in the court of the Scriptures."

2. When the appeal is made to the Nicene Creed to show that the Virgin Birth is a "historical fact," the Bishops have evidently forgotten what they all must know, namely, that the Nicene Creed made no allusion to the Virgin Birth; nor did the Creed of Eusebius, which the Council had before it. The Council considered this creed carefully before putting forth its statement of what it believed to be the faith of the Church; and as a result this is what they said about the Incarnation: "Who for us men and for our salvation came down and was made man and dwelt as Man amongst men."

If in a police court an attorney were to say, "I propose to prove by the testimony of William Smith that such and such a thing took place," and when he called William Smith, found that William Smith knew nothing about it, would he be at liberty then to say to the jury, "When I said William Smith I meant Henry Jones?" And when he calls Henry Jones and finds that Henry Jones lived far away from the occurrence to which he is called upon to bear witness, what would the jury think, what would the judge say, of such a presentation of a case as that?

That is exactly what the Bishops have done. I do not wish to press this point, because this is not a debating society, and I do not wish to score a verbal or technical victory. If I did, I think I could rest my case here. But something far deeper than any verbal or technical victory is concerned with this matter, my brethren. And therefore I will not press that point. Of course, the Bishops would answer that when they said the "Nicene" Creed, they did not mean the creed put forth by the Council of Nicaea, but that they were using the term in the sense in which it is popularly understood; that is, that they meant the creed which we have just repeated in this morning's service. They are aware that that creed was not put forth by the Council of Nicaea; that it was recited at the Council of Constantinople more than fifty years later, and that in the meantime, as the "best scholars" tell us, some copyist, who knowing that it was the opinion of the whole Church at that time that our Saviour was born of a virgin, put that in on his own authority. The Council of Constantinople never considered the question. They were engaged on an entirely different problem, namely, the question of the priority of the Bishop of Rome and the Bishop of Constantinople, and they simply took the creed which was handed them by the copyist and recited it as satisfactory to them without any discussion. It was not until the Council of Chalcedon, more than one hundred and twenty-five years after the Council of Nicaea, that the creed which we have just repeated was set forth with the authority of a council.

Is there any lawyer here who, if he wished to illustrate the teaching of the framers of the Constitution of the United States, would say that the fifteenth, sixteenth and eighteenth amendments to the Constitution, passed over a hundred years after the formal establishment of it, represented the minds of the fathers of the country? We have no more right to quote the Creed of Chalcedon as representing the minds of the fathers of Nicaea than we have to quote the eighteenth amendment as representing the minds of Hamilton and Madison and Jefferson. Nicaea, like the imaginary "William Smith," bears no testimony, and Chalcedon, like "Henry Jones," was far from the scene! But even though what is popularly called the "Nicene" Creed was set forth with the authority of a General Council, that does not make it the final court of appeal nor an infallible interpreter, because the standards of the English Church from which our Church derives; the same standards that our Church deliberately set up, say distinctly that "General Councils . . . (forasmuch as they be an assembly of men, whereof all be not governed with the Spirit and Word of God), may err and sometimes have erred." In other words, the English Church not only absolutely refused to allow the Bishops to be the sole definers of doctrine, but also to have the authority of the creed referred back to any General Council.

Then to what did they refer it? They referred it to the Holy Scriptures. . . . We turn away from the Catholic tradition. We turn away from the General Councils, and we take these two doctrines back to the Scriptures. What do we find?

1. We find, first of all, in regard to the resurrection of our Lord that the record is exceedingly confusing. Sometimes it would seem as if we were in the presence of a natural body which had been reanimated, and at other times it seems as if we saw a ghost. Now, then, to assert that no man is justified in reciting the article concerning the resurrection of our Lord unless he is prepared to say that it is a "bodily" resurrection is believed by many earnest ministers in this Church to be a "strange" doctrine. They turn to St. Paul's account of the vision of our Lord which converted him and they see no sign of any physical body. They study St. Paul's epistles and learn from them that in his judgment all of us shall rise as Christ rose. As long as the Christian Church believed that the same body which was laid in the grave arose at the Last Day, it was inevitable that the Church should believe that Christ arose in the same way. But now that no intelligent man believes that the dead bodies rise from the grave, why should we insist that the essential thing in the resurrection of our Lord is "bodily"? Does not this expression in the Pastoral teach the fundamental philosophic heresy which declares the physical to be more real than the spiritual? I believe that to be an "erroneous" doctrine. May the Fundamentalist unchurch the Modernist who believes in the spiritual resurrection of our Lord? No more than the Modernist may unchurch the Fundamentalist who believes in the "bodily" resurrection of our Lord. Both can find justification for their interpretation in the Holy Scriptures.

This point is of great importance. In ten of the articles of the creed the Fundamentalists, or many of them, have spiritualized the doctrines. What right have they so to do? There is not one of the bishops who believes the article concerning our Lord's ascension as it has been believed from early days. In a Ptolemaic universe it was inevitable that the ascension should be conceived as a physical fact. There seemed no incongruity in supposing that the physical body of our Lord was lifted from the Mount of Olives to the throne of God at some point in space above the visible firmament. But every bishop to-day has abandoned that notion. They are living in another universe. They know that if our Lord's body had begun to ascend into space forty days after His resurrection it would not to-day have reached the farthest star revealed by the telescope. Yet Stephen saw Him standing at the right hand of God soon after His ascension. What justification have the Bishops for changing the interpretation which has come down to them through the Catholic tradition? If they base it upon the knowledge that has come through astronomy, they are Rationalists. The knowledge may lead them to doubt the traditional interpretation, but it does not justify them in remaining ministers of a church which has inherited the tradition, unless they are able to show by the Holy Scriptures that another interpretation is justified. The position of the Modernist is exactly the same, only he is applying the same method to the two articles to which the Bishops declare that it may not be applied. It will not do to unchurch the Modernist on the ground that he is a Rationalist and the Fundamentalist is not, if the Modernist appeals to the Scriptures and is convinced that they justify him in a more spiritual interpretation of the articles concerning the Incarnation and the Resurrection than the Catholic tradition approves.

2. And so we come to a far more living question, because it touches emotion and because it is of a nature that we do not care to discuss before a general congregation, and that is whether or not our Lord was born of a virgin or of a married woman. Of course, those who say that he was born of a virgin are justified by the Scriptures, though as far as I know there are only three passages which do justify that belief, but they are enough. Now, the vital question is, Can the Modernist find justification in the Scriptures themselves for his interpretation of the article in the creed which treats of the Incarnation? I believe he can. In the first place, he reads the very passages on which the Fundamentalist bases his interpretation and he questions if they can bear the weight. There is a passage in the prophecy of Isaiah, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." But the "best scholars" tell us that the Hebrew word almah translated parthenos in the Greek version and "virgin" in the English really means a young married woman. They ask why, if Isaiah meant "virgin" he did not use the Hebrew word bethulah instead of almah. Moreover, they learn from the prophecy of Isaiah that the child who was to be born and called Immanuel was born in the very year in which the prophet spoke; that possibly the "young woman" was the wife of the prophet. The Modernist recognizes that it was natural that the early Christians who turned back to the only Bible they had, the Old Testament, should find in such a prophecy a beautiful suggestion of the birth of our Saviour. But they do not feel that it is conclusive. And when we come to the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke we see that it is stated that our Saviour was born of a virgin, and all who feel that that is a part of the Christian faith are justified by the Scriptures in so asserting their belief.

But if that were all, then there are many in the church, both laity and clergy, who would be bound as honest men to withdraw. But it is not all. Another man turns to the Scriptures and he is told by the "best scholars," not the radical minds but conservative scholars, that those two chapters, one in St. Matthew and one in St. Luke, belong to the introductions of those Gospels which were added after the original authors, whom we call Matthew and Luke, had finished their work; in other words, that that record represents a theory in regard to our Saviour's birth which came into the Church after those Gospels were written.

But this is not the whole of the story. Men turn to the Epistles of St. Paul, written long before any of the Gospels, and they find St. Paul saying, "Jesus Christ . . . was made of the seed of David according to the flesh." Then they turn to the genealogical table in the Gospel of Matthew and find that the descendant of David is Joseph and that there is no mention of Mary as descended from David. If I wished to bring a railing accusation, I should say that the attempts which have been made to prove that this really refers to Mary are unworthy of scholarly men. But I do not say this. I do not even say that it is disingenuous. I only say that it is ingenious and that it would never have been attempted had it not been necessary to make the facts accord with a theory, instead of deducing a theory from the facts. And when we turn to the Gospel of Luke we read that "Jesus was supposed to be the son of Joseph, . . . who was the son of Adam, the son of God." They turn to the Epistle to the Galatians and find Paul saying, "Jesus Christ was made of a woman." Does that mean born of a virgin? Most scholars agree that it was a familiar Hebrew saying which simply meant to express the birth of every man. Job says, "Man that is born of woman is of few days, and full of trouble." Does that mean that the "changes and chances of this mortal life" come only upon those who are virgin-born? Our Lord himself says, speaking of John the Baptist, "Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist." Does that mean that John was born of a virgin? We turn to the Gospel of Mark, which Catholic tradition says was dictated by the Apostle Peter, and there is not one word about the Virgin Birth in it. We turn to the Fourth Gospel, which paints the portrait of the glorified Christ, and we find the author saying that when our patron saint, Bartholomew, was urged by Philip to come to Jesus, he tells him that he is to meet the son of Joseph, though the same author has just declared that John the Baptist said that Jesus was the Son of God. In other words, many Modernists believe that they are justified by the Scriptures in denying that the Virgin Birth is a "historical fact."

How, then, it is asked, can they repeat the words of the creed? They turn once more to John and they hear these words: "Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." But that does not refer to the Word of which John has just been speaking; it refers to every soul that has received Him. Our natural birth is not the expression of our real life. It is the birth from above which is "not of blood, nor of the will of man, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God." Now, then, there are men and women and ministers of the church who say the historic words of the creed, and while they cannot affirm that the Virgin Birth is a "historical fact," do believe that they are justified by the Scripture in using the old language to express their belief that in a way that is true of none of us, he was born "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." And because they believe Him to be the Incarnate Word of God; God from God, Light from Light, Life from Life, Very God from Very God; because they look to Him for health and salvation; because they believe that "there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved;" and because they believe that that faith in their Saviour may be expressed in the historic words which to them mean His pure innocence, His uniqueness, and His essential divinity, though to the men of old the words expressed a historic fact, are they to be called dishonest men? They have their warrant in the Scriptures.

V. Intellectual Integrity. Now it may be asked, "Who has been called a dishonest man?" I think that is the most serious blot on this document. The very fact that nobody is named cannot fail to sow the seed of suspicion in the minds of many congregations that the Bishops may refer to their minister. There is a widespread belief, whether it be justified or not, that this letter of the Bishops is directed against the Bishop of Massachusetts; that his book called "Fifty Years," which I again advise every one of you to read, is one of those "recent utterances" which have disturbed the minds of certain "eminent laymen." Very well. If in a meeting of the Board of Aldermen the Mayor were to come in and say, "There are grafters at this table," instantly he would be called on to name them. In no company of honorable men may anonymous accusations be thrown broadcast without insistence that the name of the man referred to shall be heard. Why do not the Bishops name Bishop Lawrence? Because if they did, it would be necessary to bring him to trial. And why is he not brought to trial? Because it would shake this Church to its foundations. There is not a poor clergyman in this church who does not daily thank God for what that man has done to relieve their poverty. There is not a layman who has ever been brought into contact with him who not only has been profoundly impressed by the simplicity of his character, by the sanity of his judgment, by his grasp of business principles, but who also has not been convinced that "his righteousness is as clear as the light and his just dealing as the noon day." They cannot bring him to trial.

I will ask why they do not bring me to trial. I am not a distinguished person. I do not for one moment put myself on a level with the Bishop of Massachusetts, but for many years I have been teaching two things which the Pastoral declares to be unsound and suggests that the minister who so teaches is a dishonest man. I have never said privately anything I have not said publicly; I have said nothing in this church that I have not published in a book which any one who cares to may read; and in all, I have said that while belief in the Incarnation is essential, and while unquestionably at the time the Apostles' Creed was set forth, the only way of expressing the belief of the Church in the Incarnation was by the assertion that Jesus was born of a virgin, I have denied that belief in the Incarnation necessitated the acceptance of the Virgin Birth as a "historical fact." I have justified my younger brethren in continuing in the ministry though they could not accept the Virgin Birth as a "historical fact" or the "bodily" Resurrection of our Lord. I have urged men and women to come to the Communion who could not so accept the Creed. And I would call particular attention to the fact that if it is unlawful or dishonest for a minister of our Church to teach as I have taught, it is also unlawful and dishonest for those who have accepted my teaching to come to the Communion. There cannot be one law for the clergy and another for the laity. So that this letter, which at first might have seemed to be the condemnation of a few ministers, will be found to be the condemnation of a very large number of the thoughtful laity as well.

I think, if I may be allowed to say so without offense, that the Bishops are confused. I know of no man who pretends that the expression in the Apostles' Creed "born of the Virgin Mary," was used in any except a most literal sense by the early Church, any more than he denies that the words "the Resurrection of the Body," had anything but a physical significance to the men of old; and while it would be dishonest, or at least show ignorance for any man so to assert, he cannot be called dishonest if, admitting that the fact of the Incarnation could only have been expressed in the Apostles' Creed in the words with which we are familiar, continues to use them with a spiritual significance which no physical fact can adequately reveal. And if it be thought that this is dishonest, why am I not brought to trial?

I can imagine that if that were suggested to my Bishop—and I have no doubt it has been suggested to him—he might say in a most kindly spirit, "He is the last man in this Diocese whom I should desire to bring to trial; first, because he used every legitimate effort to prevent my election to the Episcopate. He is reported to have said that 'he would vote for any respectable clergyman rather than for me.' If then I bring him to trial, shall I not lay myself open to the suspicion that I am actuated by unworthy motives?" No one who knows him would think that of him, I least of all. He might go on to say more than that: "Since my election he has endeavored to show himself a loyal friend, and I look on him as my friend and I should be very loath to bring such trouble upon him." But if it were urged that it was his duty, as I believe it is his duty if he believes me to be dishonest or heretical, he might say, "Well, possibly, and if he were a younger man, it might be desirable, but he is an old man. The time left for him to do harm to the church is very short. I would not bring down his gray hairs to the grave in disgrace. Wait and after a little while some one will come and take his place, and all will be forgotten that he has said." I venture to suggest that if this were the thought of the Bishop he would be mistaken in regard to two facts. I am an old man and the time of my departure is at hand, but I should not consider it a disgrace to be deposed from the ministry of this church for anything I have said either privately or publicly; I should consider it an honor to be led off from the stage where I have tried to serve my Lord for half a century, escorted by a committee of dignified clergy and the Bishop himself! And another mistake would be to forget that while the sere and yellow leaf falls to the ground, it is not alone because the sap no longer flows through it nor because the inevitable action of the law of gravitation drags it from the twig. It is because each leaf is pushed off by the bud that has been forming to take its place. So when they have gotten rid of me, they will find that there is another just as bad—perhaps five, perhaps twenty. Indeed, when I note how the spirit of modernism has penetrated the House of Bishops as shown in this letter, I believe that that spirit will animate the direction of the Church in the years to come.

If they do not bring Bishop Lawrence; if they do not bring me; if they do not bring Dr. Worcester of Emmanuel Church, Boston, whose name is illustrious in all the churches of this country and Europe as well, who has signed a public protest against this Pastoral; if they do not bring these men to trial, whom will they bring to trial? I would not say one word to misrepresent the Bishops or to stir up feeling against them. I believe them good and earnest, even if mistaken, men; but I will put a hypothetical case to you. Suppose any judge in this city were to feel that men of the standing of Mr. Root or Mr. Wickersham or Judge Parker or Judge Seabury had been guilty of contempt of court by some public utterance and yet did nothing about it, but dragged some poor friendless, almost unknown attorney before the awful judgment seat and disbarred him, what would the righteous public opinion of this country say? Now, then, there is a poor, helpless but not altogether friendless man in another Diocese whom it is proposed to bring to trial for saying the same things that Lawrence and Worcester and I and many others have said for years. The Bishop of that Diocese said in regard to the man whom he proposes to try (I would not believe it when I first heard it; I thought it was either a slander or a gross exaggeration, but I have in my possession the sworn affidavit of an attorney in that Diocese, witnessed to by a notary public that the Bishop said in his presence) that unless a certain clergyman in the Diocese retracted the statement that the Virgin Birth was not a "historical fact" he would be brought to trial, in which case he would stand "about as much chance of acquittal as a snowball in hell." It only shows to what theological excitement will lead a good man. Is it possible that a fair trial can be obtained in a court constituted by a Bishop who would say such a thing as that?

Now, it may be that in this controversy and in every particular of it, the Fundamentalist may be right and the Modernist wrong, but in that case, the Modernist must be convinced by reason, by sound scholarship, and the Holy Scriptures, and not by any dogmatic fulmination issuing from Dallas, Texas. Attention has already been called to the fact that the Bishops call in the "best scholars" to bear witness to their interpretation of the creed, but they do not tell us who those "best scholars" are nor what has been the result of their study. Possibly they do not know.

VI. Effects. Now let us ask what is to be the result of this letter.

1. I do not believe this man to whom I have alluded will be brought to trial. I doubt if anyone will be brought to trial. I think that already the protest that has come out from the church, not only from the laity, but from the clergy and from a number of bishops, will make it impossible to carry the threats in this Pastoral into effect.

2. But the dreadful thing is that anybody should be threatened. I wonder that the Fathers of the Church who come into contact with the poor clergy should not have asked themselves whether or not a threat was not likely to be a temptation to intellectual dishonesty. They know that many of the clergy are dependent upon the goodwill of their bishop not only for preferment but even for the support of their families. If, then, in the fulfillment of their ordination vow they seek by the help of the best scholars to learn the truth about the Bible, haunted by the fear that the result may not be in accordance with the opinion of the Bishops, how can they fail to be tempted to that insincerity which manifests itself in suppressio veri.

3. What can be the effect of this suspicion upon the work of the church? . . .

There is such need, with the nations of the world in perplexity; with anarchy undermining our social life following the Volstead Act; with men and women who ought to be the future teachers of the Church driven from the altar and

The Centenary of the Observer

The Early Days of the Observer

BY RICHARD CARY MORSE

[Richard Cary Morse was the assistant editor of "The Observer" from 1867 to 1869, from 1869 to 1915 he was the International Secretary of the Committee of the Young Men's Christian Associations, and since 1915 he has been Consulting General Secretary to that committee.]

IT was a hundred years ago, in 1823, that the "New York Observer" began its life in this city as the first newspaper of its class in this State. It was in this year, 1823, that my father, whose name I bear, came here to establish such a paper, which was then a great novelty. He was a young clergyman, twenty-eight years of age, a graduate of Yale and Andover Theological Seminary, of which seminary his father, Rev. Dr. Jedidiah Morse, was one of the founders. My father came from the home of his father and older brother Sidney in New Haven. His errand grew out of the fact that seven years before this time, in 1816, at Boston his father and brother had founded and for a year conducted the "Boston Recorder," now "The Congregationalist," one of the first of that class of periodicals called "religious newspapers." It was so successful that during 1816 as many as twenty newspapers in different parts of the country, by devoting several columns each week to religious intelligence, attempted to become religious papers, while the "Boston Recorder" itself, later merged into "The Congregationalist," like THE CHRISTIAN WORK, continues until this day.

But the effect on Sidney Morse of this first year's experience as an editor was, to use his own words, "an enthusiastic desire to carry out my plan of a 'religious newspaper' more perfectly and on a larger scale than was possible in Boston, and at a center where all the leading religious denominations were evangelical and would give me a cordial and generous support. Accordingly, I communicated the plan in a letter to my friend, Rev. Lyman Beecher, of Litchfield, Connecticut. He was enthusiastic about the plan and assured me that all the leading clergy and laymen of his acquaintance would zealously aid me in the execution of it. Circumstances prevented immediate action on my part."

These "circumstances" included a growing absorption in the geographical and other enterprises of his father, with which his brother Richard, however, was fortunately less absorbed and preoccupied. For the latter felt a deeper and more enthusiastic interest in reproducing and enlarging the interdenominational "religious newspaper" enterprise of his father and older brother. Accordingly, with the consent of both of them, he left them early in 1823 and went to New York City to embark upon the proposed undertaking. His honored father had many friends among the clergy and laity of the various denominations. They received him cordially. In response to his urgent initiative, his brother in New Haven prepared a prospectus, and with varied material from him and others the first numbers of the paper were issued under the name of "The New York Observer."

Sidney Morse slowly yielded to the importunity in both word and deed of Richard and finally removed his residence from New Haven to New York earlier than he had thought it possible to separate himself from other obligations. Thus his essential leadership at the place of publication was secured. My father was released to equally needed laborious effort in increasing the circulation of the new paper. Since the success of "The Recorder" in Boston in 1816, every prior attempt to establish a religious paper in the State of New York had failed. But "The Observer" was so edited and its circulation so vigorously promoted by the sons of Dr. Morse that under their management, for a considerable period, it became the most widely circulated religious newspaper in the land. Soon the number of subscribers was two or three times as large as that of "The Recorder," which continued to be the leading religious newspaper in New England, and both papers during the generation following the death of Dr. Morse, in 1826, were conducted on the basis, and in the promotion of that interdenominational, evangelical fellowship—also manifested in the growth of the Bible and Tract Societies. Dr. Morse was equally identified with the origin of both of these societies. This broad Christian fellowship it was the lifelong industrious endeavor of the founders of "The Observer" to foster and extend. Many years after they were both strongly identified also with successful efforts to establish the Evangelical Alliance, formed in 1846.

"The Observer" was founded when the news of the day was carried to the public in weekly papers. The founders, for some years, published such a paper, carrying a religious tract and religious intelligence in every issue. Chancellor Kent at this time said: "When I have read 'The Observer' I have no need of any other newspaper." With the advent of the penny press and the modern daily paper a change to a daily was favored by one of the founders of "The Observer"—so he once told me. In that event, the paper in due time and in accord with its original design would have become a member of the New York Associated Press.

It continued, however, a weekly religious periodical and in due time was joined by its younger representatives of the religious and denominational press, until it was merged in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, with its broad interdenominational constituency.

"The Observer" During the Seventies

BY REV. FRANKLIN B. DWIGHT

[Dr. Franklin B. Dwight has been intimately related to both the Presbytery of New York and THE CHRISTIAN WORK for a period of fifty years. In the old days his contributions frequently appeared in "The Observer" and in "The Evangelist," and when they were combined with THE CHRISTIAN WORK he transferred his allegiance to that paper. During all these years he has been on most friendly terms with all the editors.]

"The Observer" is one hundred years old. Certainly it has had a most honorable career, and the paper as well as all its old readers ought to be heartily congratulated.

I cannot tell of its early years, but I can vividly remember more than fifty years ago when the two brothers, Iranaeus Prime and "Eusebius," Dr. Edward Prime, were at the height of their activity and influence. The paper circulated among the religious aristocracy of New York and was read in every part of this country and in many reading rooms of Europe. In a vast number of homes its coming was eagerly looked forward to from week to week, and the range of topics which it covered made it a liberal education to its regular readers. Its letters of travel by both the brothers Prime, its beautiful homilies by Dr. John Hall, Dr. E. P. Rogers and old Dr. Vermilye of the Dutch Church were from time to time a leading feature. Its editorials, beginning with some allusion to a passing event and generally closing with a distinct religious appeal—how vividly all these memories come back to me, as they will to all old readers of this dear old family paper.

I distinctly remember a letter printed in 1870, wherein "Eusebius" (we loved to call him by that distinguished name) describes his passing the one hundred and eightieth meridian on a voyage westward across the Pacific. He tells how they lost one day, and there is an editorial note explaining how often more than one day is lost, not through physical necessity, but through moral failure.

The paper was strongly, even rigidly, orthodox and had no patience with the slightest hint of liberalism; and yet Dr. Prime had a warm heart and was no heresy hunter. Indeed, heresy hunting was not in vogue at the era of Dr. Prime's greatest activity.

The paper was also very strong in its Protestantism and unsparing in its denunciation of the Pope and all his works. I wish that its editor could have lived long enough to hear Cardinal Farley's prayer at the laying of the corner stone of the New York Public Library. I am sure that he would have realized that "the communion of saints" goes far beyond the circle of the Protestant denominations with which he was in doctrinal sympathy.

In my own boyhood home "The Evangelist" was also taken as a weekly newspaper, and as my father was an active supporter of Dr. William Adams, our sympathies were with the more progressive new school wing of the Presbyterian Church.

But in "the era of good feeling" which followed the reunion of 1870 the best men of both wings of the Church got together, and there was a period of earnest work wherein differences were forgotten, and when a united host,

"One army of the living God," pressed forward to carry the standard of the Cross into every land and to make the influence of Christ's Gospel felt in every part of our national and civic life. To this end the "New York Observer" made a splendid contribution. After Iranaeus came "Augustus," Dr. Stoddard, the son-in-law of Dr. Prime, and his wholesome and kindly letters continued till the end of the separate existence of "The Observer."

One feature of the paper which appeared every week was a report of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, and this is an illustration of the earnest effort of Dr. Prime to make the paper an influence for good throughout the community. The editor was first of all a Christian minister, and his purpose was to preach the Gospel through the printed page.

And yet Dr. Prime was a man of broad sympathies, and he took a wide and varied interest in all the great popular educational and religious movements of the time. For many years he was secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, and the readers of his paper were kept well informed concerning the work of that body.

My old professor, Dr. Philip Schaff, has summed up the character of his life-long friend, Dr. Prime, in these words:

"His genial humor, generous sympathy and inexhaustible fund of illustrations and anecdotes made him one of the most agreeable of friends and companions; and his company will long be missed in the social circles which he used to grace and delight with his presence."

will take early steps to secure the co-operation of other nations in bringing about this result.

3. We respectfully and earnestly urge our Government to co-operate fully with all committees and commissions of the League of Nations which deal with humanitarian interests and with all similar committees and commissions.

4. We respectfully yet urgently request our Government to accept the invitation of the League of Nations to co-operate in preparing "a new convention or conventions to replace that of St. Germain for control of the traffic in arms" and earnestly hope that our Government will do everything in its power to remove the danger to the world from the unrestricted production and traffic in arms and munitions of war.

5. We hold that the United States should take no course that would invalidate the pledges made by our Government to the people of the Philippine Islands for their ultimate independence.

6. We authorize and request the Administrative Committee to take every possible step on behalf of the Churches in the support of our Government in all efforts to establish complete international control of the production of opium and other narcotics, effective regulation of the manufacture of derivatives and suppression of the manufacture and use of heroin.

7. We record our conviction that in the laws necessary for the regulation and limitation of immigration the greatest possible care should be taken to conform to the ideals and principles of justice and humanity. Authority for clemency in individual cases of special hardship should be entrusted to the Secretary of Labor or to a suitable Federal Immigration Board. Our immigration laws should be administered with courtesy and consideration.

8. We declare our conviction that all persons residing within the United States and subject to its jurisdiction should be given friendly and equal treatment under just and equal laws, regardless of race, color or religion. We deplore as unpatriotic and un-Christian movements, policies and programs in many sections that discriminate against and humiliate aliens, merely as aliens, or as aliens ineligible to naturalization, and that single out certain races and religious groups for discriminatory and unfriendly treatment. We urge a federal law raising the standards for naturalization and granting the privilege of citizenship to all persons lawfully residing in the United States who duly qualify, regardless of their race, color or nationality.

9. We realize that the awakening of Asia and her rapid acquisition of important elements of Occidental civilization inaugurates a new era in world-wide history in which Asia is to play a new and increasingly important role. Whether that role shall be one of peace, goodwill and mutual co-operation, or one controlled by increasing suspicion and fear between the East and the West, will depend largely on the attitude of the Western nations themselves and especially of the United States. It has seemed to many of our citizens who have become familiar with the question raised by this more intimate and ever increasing contact with the Orient that the United States might well adopt a more adequate Oriental policy.

We therefore respectfully request our Government to establish a commission to study afresh the whole question of the relations of America with China and with Japan, empowered to confer with corresponding commissions established by the governments of these countries, on all matters mutually deemed advisable.

10. We rejoice in the awakening conscience of the churches of America concerning the problem of war and peace, and in the growing conviction of religious people that the ancient, pagan war-system can be replaced by a Christian system of international relations. We welcome the increasing activities of many organization and groups, and particularly those of the Church Peace Union and of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches in all of its many branches in many lands.

RESOLUTIONS

Resolved, That this Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America calls upon the Christian people in America, in every church and every home—

I. To pray. Let us pray as a people for forgiveness for our long apathy to the continuance of the war-system, forgiveness for our blindness to the utterly un-Christian character of war, forgiveness for our national selfishness, for our lack of love to enemies, for our self-satisfaction and self-righteousness, for our race pride and arrogance. Let us pray for fresh enlightenment of our minds that we may see clearly where the pathway lies, for a new spirit of devotion to Jesus Christ, our Lord, for a new desire and a fixed will to do His will in our international relations.

II. To study. The ancient war-system of the world will never be abandoned nor the war-spirit cast out by mere emotional condemnation. Let us therefore devote ourselves to the conscientious study of these great and terrible questions of modern life. Let us learn to think clearly, accurately, and sanely on these problems and tasks. And let us educate our youth and our children to have faith in the possibility of achieving a Christian international life and to find constructive methods for its realization. For permanent world peace can come only from justice, justice from impartial law, and impartial law only from orderly society, organized on the principles of universal goodwill, revealed to us in Jesus Christ.

III. To work. Let us unite with fellow-thinkers and fellow-workers of all lands and nations. Let Christians by the million, consciously and definitely join the ranks of those who seek first of all the Kingdom of God and His righteousness in international life. Let us all move forward together. Separate individuals and unrelated companies cannot win a great victory.

Resolved; That in order to carry forward with vigor the Christian Crusade for a Warless World, this Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America earnestly urges:

1. That each constituent body of this Council at its next regular session pass a clear and ringing declaration on the responsibility of the Church and of individual Christians in helping establish a system of international relations that will secure world justice world order and world peace.

2. That each City Federation or Council of Churches and each Ministers' Association in all cities and towns establish a Department or Committee on International Justice and Goodwill and report the names of chairman and secretary to the Federal Council's Commission.

3. That theological schools and seminaries provide adequate courses for their students on international questions, as an essential part of their theological instruction. Let them also open special, short courses for laymen, equipping them for public work in the new realm of endeavor for establishing the Kingdom of God in the relations of nations.

4. That all organizations, groups and regular study classes within or affiliated with the churches and all Sunday-schools, promote the use of suitable study and reading courses on problems of world justice and peace.

5. That local churches and congregations be encouraged to keep in touch with the Federal Council's Commission on International Justice and Goodwill.

6. That church members be zealous in the performance of their duties as citizens, regarding this as a vital part of their Christian obligation to secure the supremacy of the spirit and ideals of Jesus in national and international life.

Resolved, That the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America hereby requests and authorizes the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill to enlarge the scope and program of its work under the direction of the Administrative Committee, and as a part of this program to prepare:

a. A Message to pastors and Christian leaders in our constituent bodies, urging them to make their churches centers of accurate information on the bearing of Christian principles on international questions, centers of constructive international righteousness and goodwill, and centers of courageous antagonism to the war-spirit and the war-system, placing loyalty to Christ and His will above local prejudice, race hatred, partisan politics and divisive nationalism.

b. A Message of greetings and goodwill to all Federations of Churches and Christian bodies in other lands, declaring our desire to co-operate with them and to have their co-operation with us in the crucial task facing the modern church, the reconciliation of the nations and races, and the achievement of world-justice and world-peace. We recommend that the Administrative Committee arrange in co-operation with the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, that this Message be conveyed during the coming year by suitable messengers going two by two, delivering it in the most impressive way to the churches and Christians in many lands.

The Soviet Government in Russia has turned the homes for orphan children into "school communes." In the Urai district, for instance, in the nine school communes, eleven hundred and forty-one children are growing up. Workshops form a main feature of the schools. Boys learn carpentry, machine work, toolmaking and tailoring. In some communes they run smithies and hand forges. The girls learn knitting, tailoring and canning. In Turgiak, children installed a complete plumbing sanitation system and built their own gasoline-driven electric plant, which supplies light and power in the nearby sanitarium.

A Memorandum Against Ratification by the Senate of the Lausanne Treaty, Negotiated Between the United States and Turkey, at Lausanne on August 6, 1923

THE Lausanne Treaty surrenders the legitimate and essential rights and interests of America in Turkey, and nullifies President Harding's pledge to Armenia.

On October 30, 1923, the Department of State laid down seven subjects in which America was interested in respect of Turkey. They were:

1. Capitulations. They are relinquished by the Lausanne Treaty. Our nationals in Turkey are to be deprived of the protection of the American Consular Courts—a prerogative which they have enjoyed since 1832—and are made subject to the jurisdiction of the notoriously corrupt Turkish police and courts. (The Near East Relief Society has already found it necessary to transfer its center of activities—headquarters, orphanages and stores—from Turkey to a “more sympathetic” environment.)

2. Our Missionary Institutions in Turkey are to be likewise subject to Turkish laws.

3. The question of indemnity for damages suffered by Americans, “through arbitrary and illegal acts,” has been left for later discussion.

4. Freedom of the Straits. Our merchant vessels may, as in the past, pass through the Dardanelles, which, however, may be closed at the will of the Turks, as was done in 1914, and on many other occasions.

5. Archeological Research. Our archeologists enjoy the same rights that are enjoyed by Turkish archeologists. This only requires the comment that there have never been any Turkish archeologists.

6. Open Door. We resume our former privilege to trade with and invest in Turkey. The importance of that privilege may be gauged by the fact that in 1913 American exports to Turkey amounted to $3,313,821, or sixteen cents per capita for the Turkish Empire. In that year Turkey had an estimated population of 17,500,000—since reduced to 5,000,000.

7. Protection of Minorities. These are to “enjoy the protection” of Turkish laws—as in the past. Since 1774, Turkey has solemnly agreed, in twenty-one international documents, to protect the Christians.

In a letter, dated November 8, 1922, President Harding said that “. . . everything which may be done will be done to protect the Armenian people and preserve to them the rights which the Sevres Treaty undertook to bestow.”

This commitment on the part of the President constituted a renewed recognition and an affirmation of the responsibility of America to Armenia—a responsibility arising from the formal pronouncements and acts of both the former and the present Administrations and of Congress. The Sevres Treaty, concluded on August 10, 1920, recognized the unity and independence of Armenia, and the President of the United States, at the instance of the Allies (including Armenia), defined its southwestern boundaries with Turkey.

On December 10, 1922, Lord Curzon informed the Turkish delegation at Lausanne that the Allies would insist upon the erection of a “national home” for the Armenians. The American delegation expressed itself as being in favor, in principle, of assigning a “refuge” to the Armenians; and on the following day it made public an official notice that its statement of the previous day regarding Armenia was unofficial, and nothing more. The Turkish press of Constantinople expressed profound “gratitude to America for the benevolent attitude of her representatives at Lausanne.”

What, then, it may be asked, did America accomplish at Lausanne?

Supported by the Turks, the American delegation, under the formula of the open door, sought to secure recognition for the so-called Chester Concession, parts of which were held by England and France to infringe upon the prior rights of their nationals, and succeeded only in leaving out of the Allied-Turkish Treaty any definitive provision concerning this matter. The chief concern of the Turks in this entire transaction was to secure a large loan from America, using the Chester Concession as an inducement to American capital. The situation was well described in the following words of the “New York Evening Post”: “. . . We refused to associate ourselves with the Allies or to act with vigor . . . [in regard to Armenia]. . . . Our principal display of energy was in asserting certain American commercial rights which struck Europe as showing that the open door policy can be made to cover a wonderfully wide field. . . .”

The value of the Chester Concession is problematical. Even before 1914, when Turkey had a population nearly four times as great as at present, Turkish railways, with the exception of one very short line, paid no dividends. Since the Lausanne Conference the Turks have cancelled that part of the Chester scheme which provided for the furnishing by the concessionnaires of agricultural machinery. Moreover, on August 29, 1923, the Chester group transferred its rights in the concessions to a Canadian group for $300,000, plus ten per cent. of any possible profits. According to a Constantinople dispatch, dated October 20, 1923, the newcomers “. . . are about to transfer [these concessions] to a London and Paris financial group.” The past experience of European investors in Turkey has not been a happy one. Turkey has never redeemed any part of her foreign obligations (she has repudiated her domestic debts), now amounting to over $700,000,000. However, the interests of the great European powers in Turkey are really political, and economic projects are always made to promote those interests. Professor Earle, in his recent book on Turkey, very pertinently observes that “. . . to lend governmental assistance to American business men against their European competitors in Turkey . . . will be to destroy the great prestige which America now possesses in the Levant by reason of disinterested social and educational service . . . and involve the United States in foreign entanglements more portentous than those connected with the League of Nations. . . .”

If, as appears, the Chester Concession was the inducement leading to the sacrifice of American rights and interests in Turkey, and to the abandonment of Armenia, then, in the light of our fuller knowledge of the illusory nature of this concession—no longer even in American hands—the only plausible argument in favor of the Lausanne Treaty becomes untenable.

In the light of the foregoing facts, it is scarcely to be seriously contended that the Lausanne Treaty is a good treaty. It is, however, put forward that, in view of disturbed conditions existent in many parts of the world, even a bad treaty is better than none. In order to ascertain the merit of this contention—if it have any merit at all—we must examine, briefly:

1-2. The record of the Kemalists before and since the signing of the Lausanne Treaty.

3. The conditions which obtain in Turkey.

4. The question of whether a resumption of relations by America with Turkey would promote either peace or justice.

1. The Turks admit that in 1914 there were no less than 2,500,000 Greeks in Turkey. According to Ambassador Morgenthau, about 300,000 of them were destroyed between 1914 and the conclusion of the Armistice in 1918. According to official figures, there are now 1,000,000 Greek refugees and exiles from Turkey in Greece, and less than 200,000 Greeks still remaining in Turkey. The missing 1,000,000 Greeks would appear to have been murdered by the Kemalists. Also, according to French reports, the Kemalists, in the spring of 1920, slaughtered some twenty thousand Christians in Cilicia, and, according to the report of a Russian commission of inquiry, in November, 1920, they slaughtered another thirty thousand Armenian men, women and children, and laid waste to 140 towns and hamlets in the region of Kars. It is a matter of recent history that the Kemalists, upon entering Smyrna, for four days gave themselves over to the unrestrained practise of murder, lust and plunder, and then set fire to the Armenian and Greek quarters, completely destroying them, but leaving the Turkish quarters unharmed.

2. The Lausanne Treaty, like the Treaties of Vienna (1815), Paris (1856) and Berlin (1878), contains prima facie generous provisions in favor of the Christians. But history has demonstrated that any agreement which depends for its execution upon the good faith of the Turks alone is devoid of merit. Under Article 38 of the Lausanne Treaty, "The Turkish government undertakes to assure full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Turkey without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race or religion." There is no evidence that the Kemalists are making the slightest pretense of observing these terms, and past experience offers no guarantee that they ever will.

Since the signing of the Lausanne Treaty (according to a dispatch to "The New York Times," dated August 20, 1923): ". . . All the Greeks and Armenians remaining in the interior are being rounded up for deportation, and 20,000 Armenians, after a long trek, have reached the border of Erivan, Russian Armenia. They were in a pitiable condition. All the property of those that have been expelled and of those that are being expelled has been seized or is being seized by the government. The government has, by decree, made it obligatory upon all foreign and native non-Turk business houses to use the Turkish language. Rumanian students in American schools in Constantinople have been summarily expelled. The Turkish Minister of Public Education has issued a decree providing that students under fifteen years of age shall not enter foreign schools; that students from other countries, who study in American schools in Turkey, shall pursue courses in Turkish history and geography under Turkish teachers; that foreign schools in Turkey shall employ as teachers subjects of Turkey only, and that these schools shall pay the salaries of Turkish inspectors. Dr. Ednan Bey, Governor of Constantinople, has expressed himself as being opposed to the continuance of American medical work, claiming that there are already too many physicians in Turkey. The government has forbidden all news agencies to receive and all newspapers to publish any foreign news whatsoever, except that which is furnished by the Anatolian Agency (a government news bureau). For no stated cause, and with no defense permitted, over one hundred Armenians and Greeks have been summarily executed at Ismit by order of Nur-eddin Pasha. The government has seized 1,770 Armenian and Greek children in Efkere and Bogazli, in the region of Cesarea. The Stambul branch of the Y. M. C. A. has been ordered closed. Hoodlums, instigated by the government, have plundered all the sacred objects and furniture of the ancient Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, the dignitaries of the Synod have been dispersed and a peasant priest from Anatolia, named Eftim, a tool of Kemal, has been installed by the government as Patriarch of the Orthodox Church. Haidar Bey, Governor-General of Constantinople, has ordered (November 7, 1923) foreign business houses in Constantinople to furnish suitable employment to fifty retired army officers, under penalty of forfeiting the right to continue their business. All non-Moslem employees in the service of the government have been removed, and the surface car companies of Constantinople and Smyrna have been ordered to dismiss their non-Moslem employees," etc. . . . Not only are the Kemalists the grateful beneficiaries of the crimes of their predecessors, but they are now openly engaged in completing the extirpation of the Christians. These facts scarcely show that the Kemalist government is inclined to respect either the usages of international law or observe even the terms of the treaty which it has just signed.

3. Kemal's government is in a precarious condition, and according to cumulative information, its downfall is only a question of a short time. According to a recent census taken by the government the Turks now number 4,000,000, widely dispersed, with few and primitive means of communication; abjectly poor and utterly lacking in the means or the will for self-improvement. The sources of revenue are practically gone, as a result of the elimination of the Christians—the only productive factors. The government cannot collect taxes, as the people have no money, and the cost of collection is greater than the tax collected. The government has no money with which to pay its employees, and it has no credit abroad. Internecine strife and armed banditry have reached alarming proportions. The government has no remedy for this situation and must maintain a large army to prevent its own overthrow. Faction is arrayed against faction: the adherents of the deposed Sultan against the Kemalists; the Orthodox Moslems against the Modernists; the pro-Soviets against the anti-Soviets; the Kemalists against the Union and Progress Party; and, within Kemal's own party, the powerful Nureddin-Reouf (the latter is a former Premier) group against Kemal. Kemal has had three Premiers in four months. According to a dispatch from Ahmed Rustem Bey, formerly Turkish Ambassador in Washington, dated Constantinople, September 26, 1923, ". . . a revolutionary outbreak took place in Turkey to-day. The rebels, led by a former Deputy, issued a proclamation opposing the government. The episode foreshadows an era of internal trouble. Discontent is spreading rapidly. Food is scarce, rents are high and money is scarce. Taxes are higher than ever before. Government officials admit that the task of setting Turkey on her feet is almost a superhuman one."

The mis-called Turkish "Republic" is more truly a military oligarchy. As "Ikdam," a Turkish daily of Constantinople, aptly remarks, "The same old people with new titles will govern in the same old way." Kemal is head of the "Popular Party." This party nominated and "elected" all of the 280 members of the National Assembly. Under the constitution of the "Republic," this packed body "elects" a President, who appoints a Premier and designates all the members of an Upper House, known as the Council of State, which is to exercise veto power over all the acts of the Assembly.

The word "Republic" in these days is subject to many abuses. When it is suggested that the old pirate crew, with its new name of a "Republic," be given a fresh chance, we are reminded that our first duty is obviously to ourselves and to our faithful allies, who alone have been deprived of all the fruits of victory. At any rate, our recognition or non-recognition will neither help nor hinder the political "experiment" now said to be in progress in Turkey. But one thing is certain, Kemal's government must fall in the near future; and equally certain is it that Kemal's successor will seek to retain all the rights and advantages which Kemal himself may have secured for Turkey. Manifestly, the only honorable and wise course for America to pursue would be to stand on her rights and await the demonstration in Turkey of greater stability than now exists or seems promised. Thus, Kemal's truculence will soon be moderated under the increasing pressure of stern realities, and his successor will know precisely the terms upon which America will resume relations with Turkey.

4. The Lausanne Treaty promotes neither peace nor justice. It recognizes and sanctions, in effect, the expulsion from their homes of the entire original populations and confirms the enslavement of hundreds of thousands of Christian—Greek and Armenian—women and children. And, in so far as America is concerned, there is no necessity for a peace of expediency. Our European allies, for political and military reasons of their own, which have no applicability whatever to America, have found it advisable to effect what many of their spokesmen frankly admit is merely a truce with Turkey, although important groups in England and France, led, respectively, by Lloyd George and André Tardieu, are advocating the rejection of what they denominate "this purposeless and humiliating treaty."

America did not participate in the war with Turkey. She only severed diplomatic relations, and may continue to be represented by a High Commissioner in Constantinople, in the same manner as since the Armistice. But it is by no means clear that the resumption of formal relations would have any beneficent effect whatever upon conditions in the Near East, nor is it clear that it would contribute to the stabilization of world conditions.

Rejection by the Senate of the Lausanne Treaty would not prejudice what little interest America now has in Turkey. On the contrary, it would compel that country to prove as much by acts as by promises its worthiness to be included in the family of nations.

The Turks abrogated the capitulations in 1914, and, in consequence, our nationals and missionary institutions there became subject to Turkish laws. We cannot, obviously, improve their position by formally acquiescing in an arbitrary act. The Near East Relief Society has already withdrawn from Turkey and four-fifths of the work of our missionaries has been suspended, following the elimination of the Christians from Asia Minor.* Their work is now confined to Constantinople. The withdrawal of our missionaries from this region could not imperil or affect the remaining native Christians. As for the remnants of the Armenians in Turkey—possibly 150,000—we have, unhappily, made it clear that we are unable to influence the Turkish government in their behalf any more now than in the past. The eight hundred thousand Armenian exiles and refugees, who are not allowed to return to their homes, and hundreds of thousands of women and children, now enslaved in Turkish harems, should engage our greater concern. By rejecting the Lausanne Treaty we shall also have served notice on the Turks and the world as well that no settlement of the Turkish problem that fails to settle the Armenian question on the basis of the unity and independence of Armenia, as provided in the Sevres Treaty, will be acceptable to the United States. Apart from the consideration of our duty to Armenia, we have a right to speak for her because the greater share of the burden of furnishing funds for the relief of tens of thousands of her orphans and refugees has been borne by the American people. So long as the Armenians are denied a home and the opportunity to take care of themselves, so long must America play the increasingly heavy role of Good Samaritan. Four million Turks occupy an area of three hundred thousand square miles. There are now three million Armenians, 1,200 of whom inhabit Russian Armenia, known as the Armenian Republic (about fifteen thousand square miles), and the remainder of whom are a people without a country. The Sevres Treaty, for the benefit of the Armenian people, allotted forty thousand square miles of Turkish Armenia (only about forty per cent. of Turkish Armenia) to the Armenian Republic. But the Kemalists would not yield one square mile of this territory, whose frontiers were drawn by the President of the United States as arbiter, although there are now, according to Turkish reports, no more than sixty thousand Turks within those boundaries.

Our paramount interests in Turkey are, and have ever been, humanitarian, and it is the manifest duty of our government to safeguard these interests. We are confronted with a moral issue of supreme importance which cannot, with honor, be compromised. We believe that the American people, who have shown their great interest in Armenia, and who, for ninety-two years, have supported the philanthropic and educational efforts of the missionaries in behalf of the Christians of the Near East, expect their government to subordinate other considerations to these primary interests.

The case against the Lausanne Treaty may be summed up as follows:

It is morally an indefensible treaty. It is an utterly humiliating and purposeless treaty. It surrenders all and every American right in Turkey. It renders very difficult the continuance of American educational and philanthropic enterprises in that country. It ignores our solemn pledges to Armenia. The economic concessions which it purports to secure for a few Americans are now admitted to be of dubious value and have already been transferred into alien hands. The Turks have broken thus early their promises of good behavior and their guarantees to our missionaries and to the remnants of the Christians in Turkey. All reports which have recently reached the outside world from Turkish and foreign sources show that factional armed conflicts, widespread banditry and hopeless economic chaos seriously threaten Kemal's régime, and that the task which confronts his government is, according to the admission of its own leaders, a truly impossible one. America stands to gain absolutely nothing by resuming relations with a Turkey in this state, and can lose nothing further by maintaining the status quo and awaiting developments. The downfall of the Kemalists appears inevitable and imminent. By now surrendering our rights to Kemal we shall find it difficult to reassert them against any régime which may overthrow and succeed him.

We believe that the honor of America, no less than every dictate of reason, demands that the Senate reject the Lausanne Treaty.

*This is not correct.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

The Book of the Lover and Beloved

Ramon Lull (so Professor Peers spells his first name), first great Christian missionary to the Moslems, was born at Palma, the capital of the little Spanish Island of Majorca, in 1235. That is to say he lived in one of the great centuries of our era. Of distinguished family, a page in the royal court of Majorca, for a little while he went the way of the world. Shocked to himself by the sudden discovery that the Genoese lady of whom he was enamored, was being consumed by a malignant cancer of the breast, he became taciturn and sombre in place of his old gaiety. He turned to the Church and became a disciple of Francis of Assisi. From the first he was set upon the conversion of the Jews and the Mohammedans. He was a man of tremendous energy. As he went about, he stirred kings and Popes to the founding of college after college for the training of men in sciences and language, in order that they might reach the infidel. Three colleges and a plan for a chain of institutions sprang from his work. He traveled to Egypt, Ethiopia, Morocco. When he was fifty-six he started out for Africa, to be himself an Apostle of the Faith. At Tunis he argued publicly with the Mohammedans, saying that he had only the desire to learn the truth, to convert or be converted as events might prove. Many of the Mohammedans embraced Christianity. Lull was condemned to death, but was reprieved and left Tunis amid insults and blows. He is off for a campaign in Cyprus and Armenia at the age of sixty-five. Soon after he is urging the Pope to undertake a new Crusade for the Holy Land, but the crusading impulse had grown dull in Christendom by 1300. At seventy-one he is back in Africa, preaching Christianity, only to be exiled once more. In his eightieth year, he goes to Bougie (Bugia) and Tunis a third time. He throws prudence to the winds, assembles a vast concourse, proclaims himself the same Ramon who had formerly been condemned in Bougie itself. This time the crowd broke loose, swept him out of the city and stoned him to death.

Lull wrote four hundred and eighty-six treatises. Among them was the great romance of "Blanquerna," written when Lull was forty-eight years old. The book is not in Latin, but in Catalan. It was meant for the people. The story is of a boy born in answer to prayer, whose bride becomes a nun at his own persuasion and who himself goes on to the priesthood, the abbotcy, the bishopric and the papacy, only in his last days to renounce his high office and repair to a hermitage to give himself to contemplation and prayer. In this last phase of Blanquerna's life, we come upon the "Book of the Lover and the Beloved" and the "Art of Contemplation." "The Book of the Lover and the Beloved" is a revelation of Lull's inmost soul. It is amazing to learn that it has never in the past been put into English. Yet such is the fact according to the present translator, Professor F. Allison Peers of the University of Liverpool. Professor Peers, while taking but very few liberties with his text, has made his translation real English. "The Book of the Lover and the Beloved" consists of three hundred and sixty-six "verses" averaging twice the length of our Bible verses. The lover is none less than Lull himself; the Beloved is God, God in Christ and God Himself. The book is labelled mystical. Perhaps it is. But here is not the mysticism that is far from the world. If it has in it, at times, something of the flavor of the Transfiguration, it has just as truly the sense of the categorical imperative of the service of man. Lull cares about others. Let us quote:

"The Lover wept and said: 'Tow long shall it be till the darkness of the world is past, that the mad rush of men towards hell may cease? When comes the hour in which water, that flows downwards, shall change its nature and mount upwards. When shall the innocent be more in number than the guilty? Ah! When shall the Lover with joy lay down his life for the Beloved? And when shall the Beloved see the Lover grow faint for love of Him?"

What a picture of the touch of God on a man is this:

"The Lover fell sick and thought on the Beloved, who fed him on His merits, quenched his thirst with love, made him to rest in patience, clothed him with humility, and as medicine gave him truth."

Of course the struggle and stress of Lull's life leave their mark on this most intimate revelation of his thinking. And here is what he comes to out of affliction and conflict.

"The Beloved filled His lover with gifts of love, and grieved not for his tribulations, for they would but make him love the more deeply; and the greater the Lover's tribulations, the greater was his joy and delight."

Take this glimpse of the sense of the inadequacy of man to show forth God:

The Lover said: "The secrets of my Beloved torture me, for my deeds reveal them not, and my mouth keeps silence and reveals them to none."

Here is no lop-sided idea of life that ignores the virtues of this world:

"The keys of the gates of love are gilded with cares and desires, sighs and tears; the cord which binds them is woven of conscience, devotion, contrition and atonement; the door is kept by justice and mercy."

Or take this:

"The heart of the Lover soared to the heights of the Beloved's abode, so that he might not lose his love for Him in the deep places of this world. And when he reached his Beloved he contemplated Him with joy and delight. But the Beloved led him down again to this world to make trial of him with tribulations and adversities."

It is a book from which one might quote and quote and quote. In trials and sorrows he sees "the very increase of love." He is John reincarnate.

The Lover cried aloud to all men, and said: "Love bids you ever love: in walking and sitting, in sleeping and waking, in buying and selling, in weeping and laughing, in speech and in silence, in gain and in loss—in short, in whatsoever you do, for this is Love's commandment."

Here is the secret of the courage of this marvelous Spaniard:

"He who fears not my Beloved must fear everything, and he who fears Him may be bold and fervent in all things beside."

He knew how Jesus Christ really manifested forth his glory:

"The Lover drank of love at the fountain of the Beloved, and there the Beloved washed the Lover's feet, though many a time he had despised and forgotten His greatness, and the world had suffered thereby."

"The Lover and the Beloved" takes its place with the lovely letters of St. Lawrence and with Thomas à Kempis's "Imitation of Christ." It is a little book for the guest room alongside the New Testament. It is a little book to put under the pillow and read before one goes to sleep and when he opens his eyes in the morning, before he bestirs himself for those activities which, if he be happy, shall run in the succession of Ramon Lull inwardly, no matter how they may appear without.

International Sunday-School Lesson

January 6, 1923

A Chosen Leader and a Chosen Land

GOLDEN TEXT: "In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."—Genesis 12:3.

LESSON TEXT: Genesis 12:1; 25:10.

THE lessons for the first quarter of 1924 attempt an outline of Old Testament history from Abraham to Solomon. They sometimes embrace several chapters, which will necessitate careful reading by the pupils before coming to the school and unusually careful preparation by the teacher. It is often going to be difficult to cover the long lesson in a half-hour's session of teaching. Let us suggest at the beginning that one way of compassing this difficulty will be to emphasize the great hero or leader about whom the incidents gather. If you will glance over the subjects for this quarter you will see that conspicuous emphasis is laid upon these leaders. Endeavor in each case to discover the outstanding trait of each leader; what special revelation or promise he received from God; what contribution in religion he made in the progressive revelation of the Old Testament; what message he had for his people, and the permanent element in the message, and, finally, what great thing he did for the people.

In to-day's lesson we have the first outstanding leader of Israel, one who was in a sense the father of Israel. He was also the first who had large consciousness of the goodness and holiness of God and the first to realize the Divine leadership in human affairs. Affairs were very simple in those days, and God was in them and they issued successfully for those who put their trust in God.

1. Abraham was a great pioneer. When God commanded him to go out from his own country, he went willingly and bravely. As the Epistle to the Hebrews says: "He went out not knowing whither he went." This sublime courage stands out strikingly throughout Abraham's whole career.

2. He was a man of great faith. God commanded him to go into strange lands, pulling up stakes, leaving his home land and friends behind him and undertake great enterprises. To be sure, God held out great promises to him—he would be the founder of a great nation, his name would be great, and in him all future families and nations would be blessed—but all this was in the unknown future and had to be taken in faith. He hesitated not at all.

3. The communion with God begins and never ends. As Abraham passes through the land and draws near to Shechem "unto the oak of Moreh," God appears unto him. Again and again we shall find God appearing to him and him seeking God. Note how he considers the appearing of God as so great an event that he builds an altar to Him. God is so impressed with this absolute faith of Abraham that He determines to take him into full confidence (18:17). "For I have known him." This beautiful friendship, almost familiarity, between God and His chosen friend is very significant, not only because it is the first outstanding, but because of its revelation of the possibility for all the future.

4. Growing out of this intimacy with God comes a partnership with God in fulfilling the divine purposes. God tells him what these great purposes are and asks Abraham to work with Him in building the future. Abraham is enjoined, not only to work with God himself, but to train his children and descendants to exercise this same partnership with God. How thoroughly this was done appears in all the future history of Israel until at the end St. Paul echoes the same refrain. We are workers together with God. It is the highest ambition of the real Christian to-day to learn God's will and help Him to fulfill His purposes for men.

The great lesson for us from Abraham's life is, to quote Dr. R. C. Gillie, "God is the powerful ally of the believing man. He identifies Himself with the man who identifies his will with the Higher Will. The man of faith and all who help him are one with the Universe, and will prosper. This is the final truth when you foster long views, and without long views you are particularly blind."

Golden Rule Sunday

Our readers will be interested in knowing that thousands of families all over the United States observed Golden Rule Sunday. They confined themselves to a four-cent meal and sent in the balance of what their meals would generally cost to the Near East Fund for the feeding of the fifty thousand children in their orphanages. It was a stroke of genius upon the part of the man who first thought of this Golden Rule Sunday. If every family in the United States had observed it the six million dollar budget, which the Near East Relief must raise to carry on their established work for 1924, would have been all cared for before 1924 came, but it will be cared for somehow, because the American people are not going to let these fifty thousand orphans perish. In this connection I am sure that Mr. Vickrey, the Secretary of the Near East Relief, will not object to our printing here a little letter which he received concerning Golden Rule Sunday, from Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr. The letter follows:

"December 4, 1923.

"Dear Dr. Vickrey:

"You will be interested. I am sure, to know that our family, both in the city and in the country, observed Golden Rule Sunday, and ate the prescribed luncheon to the extent of forty-four persons. The family had agreed to follow this program, and when the household heard what we were doing, they all volunteered to do the same. We are figuring that the average saving over our regular meal will be $1.50 each, which would make sixty-six dollars. Since our boys in the Lincoln School are working to get as large a fund as possible for the Near East in the school, we are making the payment of sixty-six dollars by them through the school. I am writing you these facts simply for your information.

"Very sincerely,

from the ministry because they cannot accept the dogmatic statements in the way in which the Fundamentalists would interpret them. I would that the Bishops had found some word of comfort to say to their brethren of the clergy who would gladly serve God in their day and generation, and suggest that we were dishonest men.

He himself suggested that in years to come the yellowed pages of the Church will turn over to the hands of this forgotten Pastoral and ask, "What was it all about?" It cannot be, a comforting thought to the sixty-five boys to reflect that his conclusion may be that his Pastoral was conceived in panic and brought forth in haste.

WHERE WILL THE WHITE RACE GO?

North America is destined by climate and resources to be the world's great center of white population and civilization within two or three centuries, says Professor Griffith Taylor, Australian teacher and man of science. The results of his remarkable studies are embodied in an article by Ransom Carpenter in the December issue of "Our World."

"The author's vision, in moments when he leaves aside the cold display of methods, discloses a world, say two or three centuries hence, with five great regions of white population, similar in density to the Europe of to-day centering in city clusters or 'conurbations' around Chicago, London, Sydney, Buenos Ayres, and Durban in South Africa.

"The North American region will loom over the others. Food for the vast populations will be the world's greatest problem.

"In trying to find out why one place is better than another for the white settler, it is easier first to consider what keeps him out of some places. Obviously, the regions he will seek in crowds will not be too dry.

Plainly enough, also, they will not be too high or remote for easy access from the trade routes of the sea. Thus temperature, rainfall and location are three of Professor Taylor's main controls. As a fourth, for reasons that perhaps require more explanation, he counts ease of access to reserve supplies of coal.

"In the course of his discussion Professor Taylor says:

"The more one studies the resources of the world the more astounding is the position of the United States. That country is the most highly favored in respect of temperature, rainfall, coal—so that the center of the world's industry and of the white population will inevitably move across the Atlantic from Europe to North America."

THE KNIGHTS OF KING ARTHUR

The Order of the Knights of King Arthur, a church fraternity for boys, has been conducted by its founder, Dr. William Byron Forbush, and his family for nearly the whole of the thirty-one years of its existence. It is now to be controlled by a board of directors, each member of which is personally in charge of a group of church boys. The order as locally conducted is really an organized Sunday school class, with certain romantic and picturesque features which appeal strongly to boys. It has enrolled over 140,000 members, and the leaders reckon that it has brought into church membership upwards of fifty thousand boys. People who are interested in boys will find it worth while to become acquainted with the movement. Its new address is Box 169, Boston, Mass.

FORCING THE MORAL

"You will never amount to anything," said the father, "unless you turn over a new leaf. Remember, it's the early bird that catches the worm."

"Ha, ha!" laughed Cuthbert. "How about the worm? What did he get for turning out so early?"

"My son," replied the father, "that worm hadn't been to bed all night; he was on his way home."—Richmond Christian Advocate.
